The SPEAKER. It is not competent for the House, except by an order made by unanimous consent, or upon a suspension of the rules, or upon a report from the Committee on Rules, to vacate the order setting apart this day for the consideration of business reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia. But it is in order for any gentleman on the floor of the House to raise the question of consideration on any bill called up by the committee, just as may be done on Friday when, though private business may not be dispensed with, the question of consideration can be raised with reference to any private bill. The House might desire to go on with the consideration of business reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia but may not want to consider this particular bill; and the Chair has always held that the question of consideration can be raised against each bill.

The Chair overrules the point of order.

The question is, Will the House now proceed to consider the bill called up by the gentleman from South Carolina?

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 73, noes 33.

Mr. BLANCHARD. No quorum.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. BLANCHARD and Mr. HEMPHILL.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 98, noes 43.

So (no further count being demanded) the House determined to consider the bill.

TEMPORARY OCCUPATION OF CERTAIN STREETS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCCREARY in the chair). The House having determined to proceed with the consideration of the bill called up by the gentleman from South Carolina, the bill will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to issue to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company a permit to lay and use, for a period commencing February 20, 1889, and extending to and including March 10, 1889, temporary tracks on the following streets and avenues:

First. Commencing at the east side of North Capitol street, and crossing said North Capitol street to D street, and down the bed of D street, occupying it with two tracks to its intersection with New Jersey avenue.

Second. Commencing at the south side of Massachusetts avenue, and extending in a southerly direction across E street at or about the building line into square 681, the property of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, and running parallel with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company's freight warehouse to North Capitol street.

Third. To cross the unnamed street running north and south through square 678, between F and G streets, with five tracks, being the extension of the five tracks now in use in the southeast portion of square 678, with the privilege of closing this street to travel from the 1st to the 6th of March, inclusive.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEMPHILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EDUCATION IN THE MANUFACTURE OF SUGAR.

Mr. FUNSTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H.R.12152) to establish a sugar station for education in the manufacture of sugar; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, LAWRENCE, MASS.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 12153) for the erection of a public building at Lawrence, Mass.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN PROPERTY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I now call up for present consideration the bill (S. 1092) for the relief of certain property in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That the provisions of section 1 of the act of the late legislative assembly of the District of Columbia, entitled "An act regulating assessments for improvements," approved December 19, 1871, shall be construed to apply to all cases where the work was done after February 21, 1871, and that the commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby directed to make the necessary reductions in assessment for such work.

SEC. 2. That drawback certificates for the amount of such reductions, with interest thereon to the date of the passage of this act, shall be issued to the holders of the liens the security for which is reduced by the operation of this act, and to such other persons as may be found to have paid in excess of one-third of the cost of such work drawback certificates shall be issued for the amount of such excessive payment. All such drawback certificates shall be receivable for arrears of general taxes due the District of Columbia and unpaid June 30, 1887.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. HEMPHILL said: Mr. Speaker, I am informed that in passing the Senate bill 1092 a moment ago an amendment which the committee recommended was omitted, and I now ask unanimous consent to recur to that bill for the purpose of including that amendment. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I now move to amend the bill by changing the date at the end from 1887 to 1888.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEMPHILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVIGATION OF THE POTOMAC RIVER.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, I now ask consideration of the bill (H. R. 12009) to provide for keeping open the Potomac River.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the purpose of keeping open the Potomac River during the winter of 1889 and 1890, the same to be expended under the direction of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, one half to be charged to the United States, and the other half to the District of Columbia, and to be immediately available.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move to amend by adding the letter "s" after "winter," in the sixth line. It has been omitted in printing the bill.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina in charge of this bill if such an appropriation as this has ever been made heretofore; whether this is following in the line of precedent, or whether it is entirely new legislation on the subject.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will state to the gentleman that so far as my knowledge extends there has not heretofore been an appropriation made for this purpose. There was a bill introduced here for the construction of an ice-boat to keep the river clear during the winter, but when we found that that could not make any headway so as to obtain the use of it during this season, we asked this appropriation for this winter and next. Only so much of it is to be used as may in the discretion of the commissioners be found to be necessary.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I simply call attention to this fact, that in keeping open the rivers and harbors elsewhere in the United States the money used in building ice-boats has either been furnished by private individuals or corporations. I am not aware that anywhere else in the United States the Government has entered into keeping channels of communication open during the winter season.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Do you mean the city government or State government?

Mr. FARQUHAR. I mean the city governments take care of this matter; and, in many cases, railroad corporations take care of it, as they do in Detroit River. I was not aware that the United States Government was entering into the practice of keeping open these channels of communication until this bill appeared.

Mr. HEMPHILL. But the gentleman will remember that we are legislating for this city. We are doing here what the corporation of Baltimore City does for that city.

Mr. FARQUHAR. By this bill you make the United States do that.

Mr. HEMPHILL. These matters have been taken from the city of Washington by the action of Congress itself, and the city can not do anything towards keeping open the channels.

Mr. FARQUHAR. In other words, you ask the people of my district to pay for keeping the Potomac open.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Oh, no.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Oh, certainly. Now, I wish to say to the gentleman from South Carolina that I am willing to vote everything for the District that is necessary; but I think this is going a little outside of proper requirements. I do not know how accommodating it may be to any one. Is it to keep the channel open between this city and Alexandria, for instance, or is it to extend beyond the limit of the District?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Well, it is to keep the river open so far as it is necessary to keep up navigation.

Mr. FARQUHAR. From Washington to the mouth of the river?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. FARQUHAR. While I do not want to make any particular objection, as the District is somewhat the infant of the United States, yet it seems to me that those who are interested in it ought to attend to this matter, and that individuals or business men in the city ought to take care of such a matter as this without doing it out of the general tax funds of the United States.

Mr. SPINOLA. The item under consideration is a very small one, I admit, but it is like the edge of a wedge. It is proposed to start in with a small appropriation and to continue that probably year after year. If started it will continue to grow in magnitude as time rolls by until the whole matter is laid wide open. Now, sir, I do not think this is a proper appropriation to be made. I am willing to go as far as any member of this House towards appropriations for the District of Columbia; but when we are to commence upon a new question and introduce a new class of appropriations for an entirely new purpose I must oppose it. It is a purpose heretofore unknown in this House of Representatives. It is a proposition which may have been made, but has never been granted, according to the statement of the chairman of the committee, and is one which, in my judgment, will establish a very dangerous precedent. I must oppose it, for in another year you will probably find in the river and harbor bill appropriations for similar purposes for other cities.

Mr. BLANCHARD. There have been none.

Mr. SPINOLA. There have been none, the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors says; but you can not tell what will come.

Mr. BLANCHARD. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Mr. SPINOLA. I admit that; but there has got to be a starting point for this new class of legislation and this new character of expenditure. Therefore I trust that the appropriation may not be made.

Mr. LEE. I do not think that my worthy friend from New York [Mr. SPINOLA] altogether understands the question. The city of Washington has been for many years, and oftentimes, subjected to great inconvenience and great expense by the Potomac River becoming blocked with ice. There have been efforts made from year to year to obtain an ice-boat to keep the river open, in which we have failed; and this is a measure simply and solely to provide for contingencies which may occur during this winter. The Potomac River furnishes the city of Washington with its fuel in a large part, and with its food in a large part. It is often the case that at some little reefs within 20 miles of Washington there are ice blocks which have prevented navigation for a period of six weeks or two months, as the case may be. The United States stands in the same relation to the city of Washington that the municipality of the city of New York does to the harbor of New York; and it is just as important to the United States because of the comfort of this city, and for the material which is used, that this river should be kept open, as it is for the harbor of New York or Baltimore, Philadelphia or Detroit, or any other great city of this country.

Mr. O'FERRALL. And Congress is the legislature of the District.

Mr. LEE. Congress is the legislature of the District, as my friend suggests. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this proposition is a fair, moderate, and proper one. The fact that this appropriation has not been made heretofore is, in my judgment, simply an additional reason why it should be made now and why we should begin to keep open the harbor of this great city, the capital of this ccountry, and I hope that my friend from New York will withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINOLA] raises a point of order, which the Chair will decide. Subsection 3 of Rule XXI refers to general appropriation bills. The bill now under consideration is not a general appropriation bill, but is a bill to provide for keeping open the Potomac River. The point of order is therefore overruled.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, I think that gentlemen have not exactly understood the character of this proposition. It is not a proposition to commit the United States to keeping open the rivers and harbors of this country. Gentlemen are all aware of the fact that every particle of legislation that is enacted for this District has to be done by Congress, and we are now simply proposing to do for this city what is done by other municipal corporations all over the country, as I am informed. Certainly it is done in Baltimore, and there the work of keeping open the harbor is provided for by the city council. This bill appropriates $10,000 for this purpose, to be paid one half by the District and the other half by the United States Government, just like any other public improvement in this District. If we were making provision for the erection of a new post-office for this city (which every one of us will admit ought to be provided for), the cost of the structure would be paid one half by the General Government and one-half by the people of the District, in accordance with the provisions of the general law under which all appropriations are made for the District, which rests upon the theory that the Government owns one-half of the property here. Therefore, for Congress to make this appropriation is just the same as for the city council of Baltimore to make an appropriation for keeping that harbor open. Now as to the necessity of this, if Baltimore finds it necessary to keep two boats for the purpose of keeping open its harbor, we certainly can safely appropriate $10,000 for one boat to keep open the harbor of Washington. There has not been any such appropriation as this heretofore, so far as I know, but that is no reason why it should not be made now if the expenditure is a proper one.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Can the gentleman inform us out of what fund the money has been taken for this purpose heretofore?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not know that any money has been used for this purpose heretofore. So far as I know there has been no such appropriation made, but ever since the District government was abolished and Congress took control of District affairs we have been appropriating the money for similar expenditures exactly in the same way. Therefore this is not anything extraordinary. The only thing extra or unusual about it is that it is an appropriation for the clearing of the harbor, a work which has not been provided for heretofore, so far as my knowledge goes, during the time that I have been in Congress; what was done before I came here I am not able to say.

Mr. FARQUHAR. But the work has been done before, has it not?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I say I do not know about that.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Well, I take very much the position of my colleague from New York [Mr. SPINOLA], that you are proposing here to vote an appropriation, and to continue it annually, for this purpose, whereas, heretofore, in all probability, the money for this work has been taken out of the contingent fund of the District, and now, that fund being exhausted, they come here for a special appropriation.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The gentleman does not seem to understand that the District commissioners do not have any contingent fund at their disposal. They do not have a dollar at their command that is not raised under an act of Congress, one half of it being paid by the people of this District and the other half by the Government.

Mr. FARQUHAR. We all understand that.

Mr. HEMPHILL. So that if this work has been paid for at all heretofore, it has been paid for out of the funds of the District.

Mr. FARQUHAR. And the question I want answered is, by what authority the money has been expended for this purpose heretofore?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I have said that, so far as I know, no such expenditure has been made.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Well, it has been, as every member knows.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I have no information of it.

Mr. LEE. I will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR] that I have no knowledge of any money having ever been expended for this purpose.

Mr. FARQUHAR. How did they get the ice out of the harbor when there was a flood here which was sending the water back over the low lands of the District?

Mr. LEE. I say it may have been done before, but I have no knowledge of it.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Well, it has been done.

Mr. McCOMAS. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that out of several contingent funds money has been expended from time to time in clearing the harbor of ice and perhaps clearing the river to some extent below, and, as I understand it, the object of the committee is to provide regularly for clearing the harbor and keeping it open. Certainly that is a work of necessity for this great capital city of over a quarter of a million of people, and the reasons for this appropriation are just as strong and just as urgent as they are for an appropriation for sweeping or paving the streets.

Mr. FARQUHAR. As the streets are inside of the District I do not see that the cases are parallel.

Mr. McCOMAS. So is the harbor and so is a portion of the river.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Well, I simply say, as I said before, that I do not object to the amount, but rather to the character of the precedent that it is proposed to establish. This bill proposes that we shall go into the municipal work of clearing the harbor of this city, although other cities all over the country provide for clearing their own harbors, and where there are railroad corporations interested, as, for instance, at Detroit, they keep the harbor clear.

Mr. LEE. What good would it do to clear the harbor of Washington if the river 20 miles below was blocked with ice?

Mr. FARQUHAR. I agree that it would not do any good; but other parties ought to co-operate in a case of that kind.

Mr. LEE. What other parties?

Mr. FARQUHAR. The railroad companies; as they do at Detroit, for instance.

A MEMBER. But if they do not do it, then people can not get into the harbor.

Mr. FARQUHAR. If they do not do it, they do not have any of the advantages.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. But we want the people to have the advantages.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I would greatly prefer to vote this money into any contingent fund rather than have a precedent of this kind established.

Mr. HEMPHILL. This expenditure is left entirely in the discretion of the commissioners, and they will hardly go to work to clear out the ice here at Washington unless the river below is clear so that vessels can get in and out. I call for a vote.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEMPHILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROTECTION OF GIRLS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I call up the bill (H. R. 5870) to amend the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia.

The bill as proposed to be amended by the Senate was read, as follows:

That every person who shall carnally and unlawfully know any female under the age of sixteen years, or who shall be accessory to such carnal and unlawful knowledge before the fact in any Territory, District of Columbia, or other place over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction, or on any vessel within the admiralty or maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and out of the jurisdiction of any State, shall be guilty of a felony, and when convicted thereof shall be punished by imprisonment at hard labor, for the first offense not more than five years, and for the second or other offense for not more than ten years.

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to amend the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, for the protection of girls under sixteen years of age in any Territory, the District of Columbia, or other place over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction, and for other purposes."

Mr. HEMPHILL. I am instructed by the committee to move that the House non-concur in the amendment of the Senate and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

PURCHASE OF REAL ESTATE FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The resolution offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] (Miscellaneous Document No. 22) in relation to the purchase of real estate for the District, and the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, I am directed by that committee to report back with a substitute therefor, which, in effect, is the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] with amendments, which will appear by the report I ask to be read. Let the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] be read first.

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be directed to furnish the House with a statement of all matters relating to the purchase of sites for public schools erected within the District of Columbia under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1887, and July 18, 1888, embracing in such statement the location of said site, the amount paid therefor, and whether such amount was the fair market price of said site at the time of said purchase; whether the sites in question were purchased from the owners thereof directly or through the intervention of agents, and if agents were employed upon what terms such employment was made, and if any sum was paid for the services rendered by such agent by the commissioners or with their knowledge, and also whether the deeds for such sites were made in all cases directly from the owners of such sites, or in any and what case by the intervention of third parties or middlemen, and if by third parties or middlemen why such method was resorted to, and generally, all information touching the purchase of said sites and the conveyance thereof to said commissioners which they may have in their power other than such as is asked for specially in this resolution, and which may be needed for a full understanding of the subject-matter referred to, together with such recommendations as to them may seem best for the conduct of the purchase of such sites in future, to the end that proper legislation may be effected for that purpose.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Now let the report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the resolution of January 5, 1889, introduced by Mr. TOWNSHEND, relating to the purchase of school sites in the District, having had the matter under careful consideration, respectfully report:

In the opinion of your committee it is but right that the commissioners should be allowed to make a full statement of all their actings and doings and to put the House in full possession of all the facts in the matter. The committee have suggested the following amendments with the view of extending the scope of the statement called for: After the date "1888," in the fifth line of the resolution, insert the words "station-houses and all other public structures." After the word "purchase," in the seventh line, insert the words "and what price the actual owners received." After the word "knowledge," in the eleventh line, insert the words "and the amount so paid." After the word "to," in the eighteenth line, insert, "the amount of profit realized by middlemen." As thus amended your committee recommend that the resolution pass.

Mr. ATKINSON. I ask for the reading of the resolution referred to in the report.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The substitute that is offered by the committee, Mr. Speaker, is simply intended——

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve the point of order for the present against the substitute.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, the object of the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE], which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, was an investigation of the purchase of certain sites for public institutions made by the commissioners of the District. The District Committee considered the subject and reported the resolution favorably to the House. Subsequently, however, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] submitted another resolution calling upon the commissioners for all the information they had with reference to the purchase of these sites. The District Committee considered the matter and concluded that it was but fair and just to the commissioners to allow them to make their statement to the House, as embodied in the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, before action was taken looking to an investigation; and if this resolution is adopted asking for that information, I will ask unanimous consent that the resolution offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] stand upon the Calendar in its present order, so that it may be passed by the House at the next District day in case the response of the commissioners is not satisfactory.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, I think the reason assigned by the gentleman from South Carolina for his motion to substitute this resolution of inquiry for the resolution of investigation submitted by myself is a sufficient argument why it should not be done.

So far as my purpose in the introduction of the resolution looking to an investigation was concerned, I had for my prime object the recovery of whatever money might have been erroneously paid, if any, out of the funds belonging to the District of Columbia. This resolution of inquiry furnishes no information whatever upon which proceedings might be instituted looking to such recovery.

So far as the question of the rights of the commissioners of the District of Columbia to be heard is concerned, there has been no allegation against them of an official character, hence their answer is unnecessary. It might, I think, with reason be assumed that during the course of an investigation to ascertain facts with reference to any of their acts they could be heard by witnesses and by documents, and whatever vindication they might rely on for their conduct in regard to the matter could be fully heard and determined. There is, in my judgment, no danger whatever of our passing any law authorizing an institution of suits against the District commissioners, except upon the fullest and most thorough investigation.

I believe, sir, that the adoption of the resolution offered as a substitute will defer the consideration of this subject until such time as the House will be unable to pass any legislation whatever looking to the reimbursement of the District funds for the moneys erroneously taken from them, if such has been the case.

Now, I believe if we need any information at all it will be such as will enable us to understand how much money, if any, has been wrongfully expended, and who have been the beneficiaries of the transactions; and then I presume we will be able to determine what proceedings will be proper looking to the recovery of the money.

So far as I am concerned I am willing that the House shall take the matter as it is and vote upon it without further delay or the consumption of unnecessary time. I hope the substitute will be voted down, and that the resolution will be passed as it was reported originally by the committee, and in the concurrence in which I understand they are practically unanimous.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. HEMPHILL. There seems to be some little misapprehension, I understand. I desire to have the House pass the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], which calls upon the commissioners for all the information in regard to the matter. That gives their statement of the case. When this is done, if that answer is not sufficient we can pass the resolution for an investigation, and in the mean time I will ask the House that the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky may remain on the Calendar where it can be reached the next District day.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Certainly.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Has not this matter been investigated to some extent elsewhere?

Mr. HEMPHILL. All I know is that Mr. TAULBEE'S resolution was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and we heard some statements from the commissioners there. But that statement was not in writing, nor was it taken down by a stenographer. It was simply a verbal statement.

Mr. GROUT. And not of record.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does not this statement show that in some cases the owners of real estate had been paid a sum larger than the asking price?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Well, it showed this, as far as the statement went, that there were certain persons engaged by the commissioners as agents who bought property at one price and sold at a higher price.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Higher than was originally asked by the original owners?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not know that the price was higher than that which was paid to the owners; but the object of this resolution is, if it passes, to get from the commissioners a full and complete statement of all of these matters. Then if it is not sufficient, as I have said, we can incur the expense of appointing a committee to investigate it and see what is necessary to be done.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Meantime the session expires.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Oh, no. I will state to the gentleman from New Jersey, as I stated a moment ago, that this resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky will, if the House agrees to my proposition, stand upon the Calendar to be acted upon at the next District day.

Mr. BUCHANAN. When will that be?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Two weeks from to-day.

Mr. TAULBEE. Will the gentleman from South Carolina allow me a question?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAULBEE. I am not certain that I caught correctly the reading of the resolution which he proposes as a substitute. What I wish to ask him is, whether or not under the resolution as he asks the House to pass upon it calls for such facts as will enable the House to ascertain to whom these amounts were paid, if any, and how much was realized as profit by these intervening parties?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir; it does.

Mr. TAULBEE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask this further question of the gentleman from South Carolina——

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will tell the gentleman, if he will allow me to answer, that every amendment he suggested to the committee was adopted by the committee with a view of obtaining all necessary information on this subject.

Mr. TAULBEE. I only recommended such amendments as I thought were necessary, or which would in some measure answer the purpose; provided the resolution authorizing the investigation can not be reached and passed by the House, it was thought to be necessary to accomplish something in the direction in which the original resolution looked.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from South Carolina another question, and that is based upon what I understood to be his statement, that one of the objects of this resolution which his motion substitutes for the resolution of inquiry is to give to the commissioners an opportunity to be heard. My question is whether the commissioners were not fully heard by the committee of which he is chairman, and did not that full hearing by the committee influence the belief that the resolution which I introduced ought to pass as introduced and amended by the committee?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman from South Carolina permit me a question?

Mr. TAULBEE. Will the gentleman from New Jersey pardon me? I was asking the gentleman from South Carolina a question.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not know that I ought to reveal the secrets of the committee.

Mr. TAULBEE. Certainly. I do not ask that.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will state for the information of the House that the committee did invite the commissioners before them, and that after some consultation and talk with them they reported Mr. TAULBEE'S resolution back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass. Subsequently this other resolution was introduced in the House and referred to that committee, and they came to the conclusion that Mr. TAULBEE'S resolution should be adopted in case there was necessity for an investigation, but that it was fair to any public officer that he should have an opportunity to make a statement which the House could have before it before we appointed a committee of investigation. An investigation proceeds upon the theory that there is some grave suspicion as to the proper conduct of public business, and it is but fair to a man, whether he be a commissioner or holds a portfolio in the Cabinet, or anywhere else where he occupies any official position, that he should have an opportunity to make a proper showing before the House should enter upon an investigation. That is the whole object we have in passing this resolution, because the members of the committee, and I think I may say I believe every member on the floor, would like to get at the truth of this thing; and there is no other purpose in view.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Is it not a fact that the term of one of these commissioners has already expired, and that of another expires the 1st of next month?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Well, I do not know that of my knowledge, but I may say I understand the commission of one of them expired yesterday, I believe, but I know nothing about that except what I see in the press. The other will not expire until some time in the spring, two or three months hence.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am told that it expires at the end of the present month.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not know positively.

Mr. MCCOMAS. That is an error.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I am told by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] that that is an error.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Let me ask one more question. Is it not the belief from what was produced before the committee of the gentleman from South Carolina that there should be a deep, thorough, and searching investigation into this matter?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I can not say that I am thoroughly satisfied about that. I think it is fair and just to all that these gentlemen should be permitted to make their statements, and if they are not satisfactory we have the other resolution here. It will not take three days to investigate the whole subject, I think.

Mr. TAULBEE rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the gentleman from South Carolina to say that he desired the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky should remain on the Calendar, and action should be had on what he has offered as a substitute.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the Chair understands the committee report this resolution as an independent resolution.

Mr. TAULBEE. Which one is reported as an independent resolution?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution reported by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. TAULBEE. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAULBEE. My point of order is that the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] is not before the House except on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, as a substitute for the resolution which I introduced and which was called up. That resolution was before the House before the substitute was offered; and it is now proposed that my resolution shall keep its place on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the chairman of the District Committee has the right as chairman to call up whichever resolution he desires. He offered the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] as a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE]. Before any action had been taken on the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky he announced that he offered the resolution, which he has called a substitute, as an independent resolution, and asks the House to pass that resolution. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from South Carolina has the right, before any action is taken on a resolution called up, to introduce any resolution as an independent resolution that he desires.

Mr. TAULBEE. My point of order is that the gentleman from South Carolina called up the resolution which I introduced. That brought the resolution before the House, and not the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND]. He then announced his purpose to modify it by an amendment to the resolution which was then pending, and of which the House has never disposed. My point of order is that the resolution which I introduced is the resolution now pending.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Before any action was had on the resolution heretofore introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia withdrew that and introduced the other resolution as an independent resolution. The Chair thinks that he has that right, as no action had been taken upon the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. TAULBEE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAULBEE. I wish to be understood plainly, and not misunderstood. Do I understand the Chair to say that when the gentleman from South Carolina had called up the resolution which I introduced that he could then withdraw it without the consent of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks he had the right to withdraw it until some action had been taken upon it; and the Chair thinks no action has been taken upon it. No vote had been taken upon it, and therefore the Chair thinks that the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia had the right to withdraw it.

Mr. TAULBEE. If I understood the gentleman from South Carolina, he asked to modify that resolution by another, which would, in my judgment, amount to consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There was no vote taken. The Chair decides that the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia withdrew the resolution which was called up by himself, and that he has the right to do so.

Mr. TAULBEE. I simply rose that I might understand clearly what has been stated by the Chair and to know whether I was mistaken. My understanding was we had proceeded to the consideration of the resolution which the gentleman first called up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There had been no vote upon a pending amendment and no action of the House. The Chair holds that the gentleman from South Carolina has the right to withdraw his resolution.

Mr. TAULBEE. Then the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Illinois is pending?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. TAULBEE. Then I will offer as a substitute the resolution which I introduced, as amended by the committee, and which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution is as follows:

Whereas it is stated in certain newspapers that the commissioners of the District of Columbia have in recent purchases of real estate within and for the use of the District of Columbia paid to and through certain agents appointed or employed by them prices above that asked or received by the vendors or owners of such property, contrary to law: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives appoint a special committee of five members to investigate the matter of the purchases of real estate by the commissioners of the District, and report to the House in writing, at any time, by bill or otherwise; and that said committee be furnished a stenographer by assignment by the Speaker from the roll of stenographers now in the employ of the House, and that they be authorized to employ a clerk at a compensation of $6 per day, and that said committee be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House and authorized to administer oaths and send for persons and papers. That the expenses of said investigation be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in regard to this proposed investigation I have the further fact to state that until the introduction into this House of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] I had heard but little said among citizens of the District with reference to the proposed investigation, but when that resolution of inquiry was introduced a meeting was held of citizens representing many thousands of dollars of tax-paying property in the District, and they appointed a delegation who waited upon me and furnished me with a copy of resolutions which they had adopted expressing the belief that the resolution of inquiry could effect nothing except to "sidetrack" the matter and avoid such an investigation as my resolution looked to.

From what I know of the sentiment of the tax-payers of this District I believe that they are almost universally of the opinion that this resolution of inquiry should not be substituted in any way for the resolution which I introduced and which would bring about a real investigation of the facts. The tax-payers of this District have rights. I pay some taxes in the District myself, and I believe, with due regard to all the public officials connected with this business, that the reports printed in the newspapers and the documents read by a member of this House during the consideration of the District appropriation bill were and are sufficient to authorize the House to proceed to the investigation in a proper and orderly manner, in a manner which will bring out the facts. I have in my possession the statement of a citizen of this District who has taken some pains to inquire into the facts, and who is a reliable gentleman, to the effect that in more than twenty instances of the purchase of sites, relatives of the commissioners of the District have been employed as middlemen to purchase the property of the owners and then have sold it to the commissioners for much greater prices than were advertised on the bulletin-boards of the real-estate men who had the property for sale. I believe that such will be found to be the fact, but I can not hope that these facts will be reached by an ex parte statement from the commissioners, even if their statement before the Committee on the District of Columbia was such as to justify that committee in recommending the passage of my resolution.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. What is the difference between the two propositions?

Mr. TAULBEE. The difference between the two propositions is this: The resolution of inquiry calls for an ex parte statement, or explanation, of such charges as have been made by the newspapers and in discussions upon this floor. That, I believe, would be the whole effect of the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND]. The effect of the resolution which I introduced would be to give us a committee——

Mr. GROUT. To raise a new committee?

Mr. TAULBEE. Yes, sir; to raise a new committee, and to give the employés of the District, and all the persons connected officially with this business, an opportunity to be heard, while at the same time it would afford to the commissioners themselves every opportunity to explain or justify whatever they have done, and to give the House any information which they might desire to offer. So, Mr. Speaker, I think the resolution which I introduced is a proper one, and while I have all due respect for the conduct of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and while I believe that they are sincerely desirous of this investigation, I give it now as my belief that the passage of this resolution of inquiry and the postponement of the resolution authorizing an investigation will deprive us of an opportunity to carry into effect some of the possible remedies for these evils and to enact such legislation as will result in the recovery of this money.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I raise the point of order against the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] that he can not take up a resolution reported by a committee and offer it as a substitute for a measure that is pending.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Kentucky has the right to offer a substitute that is germane to the pending proposition, and the gentleman sends up a resolution which may be in substance the same as the resolution which was pending before the Committee on the District of Columbia, but which is germane to the pending proposition. The point of order is therefore overruled.

Mr. HEMPHILL. One of the charges of which the gentleman [Mr. TAULBEE] says he has evidence in his possession is that a number of pieces of property, twenty, I think, have been bought by relatives of the commissioners as middlemen, and sold to the commissioners. Now, that is one of charges made in the newspapers, and, so far as the proofs went that were before the committee, there is not a particle of foundation for any such statement. That is one reason why the committee thought it was proper to give the commissioners an opportunity to make a statement for themselves before voting for an investigation. We all know that when such charges get started there are always people in the world who, whether they are rascals themselves or not, always take the ground that everybody else is a rascal. Nobody pretends that the commissioners have made a single cent out of any of these transactions.

Mr. TAULBEE. I do not charge that.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The gentleman from Kentucky has not made any such charge; nobody has made it. The whole object is to get at the truth, to put the House in a position where, if things have been done in a disorderly or unbecoming manner, they can be properly regulated for the future by appropriate legislation. Therefore if the commissioners give a statement that is fair, and clear, and honest, and full, and will satisfy the House, that will be the end of the transaction. On the other hand, if two weeks from to-day they have not made that statement, then we can pass the resolution providing for an investigation and go on with the work which the gentleman from Kentucky seems so anxious to have done.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HEMHPILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understood the gentleman to say that this investigation could be made in two or three days.

Mr. HEMPHILL. In three days.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is it not a fact that the subject of this inquiry has been a matter of public knowledge for several weeks, through the press and through the resolution offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE]?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Have the commissioners of the District of Columbia made haste to answer, or have they in any way answered, or made any communication as to their notions about what the facts really are?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will say to the gentleman that so far as my knowledge goes the statement which they made before the committee is the only statement they have made. But I will state also that I suppose the commissioners of the District, like other public officers, can not devote their entire time to explaining charges against them. The gentleman knows as well as I do that if members of Congress should undertake to explain everything that is said about them in the newspapers, they would be drawing their salaries simply for taking care of their own individual characters. I think the commissioners will make a statement to this House, and if they do not, then we can pass the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE].

Mr. GROSVENOR. I wish to ask the gentleman another question. If this whole matter can be investigated in two or three days, why can not the commissioners answer the questions immediately instead of postponing the matter until the next District day?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I am perfectly willing that they shall answer it within five days, or within any other reasonable time which the House may agree upon. I named next District day, because I thought it probable that we should not have an opportunity before that time to consider business from the District Committee.

Mr. COMPTON. Mr. Speaker, if I understand the decision of the Chair, it is that the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] is in order as a substitute for the resolution reported by the committee, and that that is the proposition now before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE].

Mr. COMPTON. As a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I desire, for my own sake, to state briefly what my position is on this question. On the 10th of December a resolution was introduced into this House by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] which was considered sufficiently grave to justify its reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia. The committee took that resolution into consideration and made inquiry enough to satisfy them that it was their duty to report the resolution back favorably to this House, providing for an investigation. I so voted in the committee, and I divulge no secrets when I say that that was a unanimous vote. That resolution was reported back here after proper consideration, in the judgment of the committee which reported it to this House, and is on the Calendar in proper form.

A resolution was offered by my friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] covering the same ground, and it also was referred to the District Committee for consideration. I have not seen the time in the committee when I felt, and I do not now feel that I can, in justice to myself or to the committee, vote to substitute the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois for that originally recommended by the committee. I took that position in the committee, and I take it here. If this is a matter of sufficient consequence to deserve the attention of this House, if there are grave questions involved affecting the business interests of the community, or the conduct of the District commissioners, then I maintain that it is the duty—not simply the right, but the duty—of this House to investigate that matter properly to the bottom; and I maintain further, that of all men living within the limits of this District the commissioners are the men who should, most of all, desire a thorough investigation by an impartial committee.

The committee that will be appointed to investigate this charge will be appointed by the Speaker of this House. That fact in itself is a guaranty, an absolute guaranty, that that committee will be one which will do justice to all the parties concerned, and, for one, I shall cast my vote in favor of the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, when the question was before the House in December last, at the time the District appropriation was under consideration, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE], by his remarks then, as well as those made by him to-day, indicated that he had no supposition that the conduct of the commissioners in connection with this matter was censurable, at least so far as their integrity is concerned. It seems, sir, from what I could learn, that his desire was to inquire whether a better method could not be found than the one heretofore adopted for the purchase of sites for schools and police station-houses.

It seems to be his desire to elicit information so as to enable this House to legislate judiciously and intelligently on the subject. The resolution reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia was delayed by the objections which have been made from time to time. Therefore, in order that the real facts might be elicted and that the House might be fully and thoroughly informed as to the facts, I offered the resolution of inquiry which has been adopted by the committee, and which was intended to cover the entire field of investigation. That was introduced a week or more ago. The Committee on the District of Columbia had the right to report that resolution back at any time. If it had done so promptly it could have been passed and answered in time for action by the House on the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky to-day, and then we could more intelligently determine whether we should incur the expense of appointing a new and special committee of investigation, and the employment of a stenographer, etc. It is probable in this way all the information desired could be ascertained without making any appropriation.

Mr. TAULBEE rose.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Do not interrupt me now. The gentleman has said some one or more persons in the District of Columbia informed him that the resolution I introduced had the tendency to side-track the investigation which was intended by his resolution. Let me say to the gentleman from Kentucky that his informants, whoever they may be, are entirely mistaken, and that they had no warrant for making any such remark. My resolution was intended to obtain all the facts in regard to the matter and to spread them before this House, but it was not in any sense intended for the purpose of side-tracking his resolution or to conflict with it.

Mr. TAULBEE. I do not wish the gentleman from Illinois to misunderstand me. What I think I said, and what I meant to say, was that citizens of the District of Columbia had expressed that belief to me, that the adoption of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois could have no other effect. I meant to cast no reflection upon the gentleman's purpose in offering the resolution, nor do I intend to do so at this time. If he understood me to say anything of that sort, I can only say that I am sorry for it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I did not understand the gentleman to impute such a purpose to me. I merely intended to say to the gentleman from Kentucky that those who stated that would be the effect of my resolution or that it was so intended in any sense were mistaken. My resolution was intended to elicit information pending the consideration of his resolution for investigation, in order that we might more intelligently act upon his motion when it could be reached.

My purpose was to do everything I could for the purpose of reaching a just conclusion in regard to this matter. I supposed my resolution of inquiry could be answered before action on his resolution could be had. I sought thereby to put the House in possession of all the facts which it would have brought out.

The gentleman has himself disclaimed any intention of reflecting upon the commissioners of the District of Columbia. Now, Mr. Speaker, so far as my observation has gone, extending over some years in reference to these matters, I believe we have never had more honest and capable commissioners for the District than we have to-day. I am glad to hear the gentleman from Kentucky say that he does not reflect on them. I understood him to say his purpose is to provide for the purchase of sites for school-houses and station-houses by the very best method and upon the most advantageous terms to the District of Columbia, and that if money has been paid out unlawfully to agents in securing the purchases it should be recovered. I heartily join hands with him on that proposition, but I think the Committee on the District of Columbia have taken the right view of this subject in determining that before the committee of investigation is appointed all the facts obtainable without investigation should be presented to the House, and then we can more judiciously determine whether a special committee should be appointed to investigate.

So far as I am concerned, I do not object to the adoption of the resolution of investigation. I introduced mine as an independent proposition. I repeat that it was not intended to conflict with that of the gentleman from Kentucky, but to stand on its own merits as a resolution of inquiry for the purpose of bringing fully and thoroughly all the facts involved before the House.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to join hands with the gentleman from Illinois in his effort to obtain all the facts that would lead to the recovery of money paid out to gentlemen in this District unlawfully. Now, I wish to call his attention to the fact that his resolution as introduced into the House did not look to that result. There was nothing in that resolution which would justify the commissioners, in answering the resolution, to give one single intimation as to who were the parties, or how much of the people's money had been paid to parties not entitled to any.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My friend is entirely mistaken.

Mr. TAULBEE. Well, let it be read.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My resolution was intended for the purpose of naming the parties and the amount. It included everything, as the resolution will show. Now, the gentleman has made it more specific by suggesting amendments which I think ought to be adopted; and if he has other amendments which will unearth other features, I beg that he will introduce them, so that we may get at the very bottom facts of the case.

Mr. TAULBEE. The difference between the gentleman and myself is simply one of fact, which the resolution will determine without bandying words. I read the resolution and went before the Committee on the District of Columbia and suggested an amendment, which they adopted, which would call for the information as to how much money has been realized by the middlemen. His resolution did not call for any such information, and I ask that the resolution now on the desk be read, leaving out the amendment recommended by the committee; and the reading of the resolution will demonstrate that what I have said is absolutely correct.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will not my friend from Kentucky do me the justice to state that when he said the resolution I introduced would not elicit all the information desired, I said, while differing in opinion, I desired him to present such suggestions as would meet the object he had in view, did I not?

Mr. TAULBEE. You did.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And I was gratified to learn that the committee adopted the gentleman's suggestions.

Mr. TAULBEE. And I have suggested an amendment in the nature of this resolution which will answer the object fully.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, in order to bring this matter to a conclusion, I will state that if this resolution is adopted it simply gives each member of the House the information upon which the committee had to act, and then it will be for every man to act upon his own responsibility. Otherwise, if you adopt Mr. TAULBEE'S resolution, it is simply adopting it upon our recommendation solely, and without a report as to what the commissioners said; for, as I have stated, we had no stenographer, and we think it but fair to the commissioners to have their statement in writing. I will then, if this is adopted, at the proper time move that the resolution be reported in one week after its passage, so that it will come back to the House in time to adopt any legislation that may be deemed necessary before the adjournment.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman also incorporate in his resolution a provision that upon the reception of this information, if deemed unsatisfactory by the Committee on the District of Columbia, the committee may at once proceed to investigate?

Mr. HEMPHILL. The original resolution provides for a special committee of three.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I know, and to that feature I am opposed. I think the Committee on the District of Columbia is amply able to attend to that matter.

Mr. HEMPHILL. We have more work than we can possibly attend to now.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Well, I do not notice a very haggard look on the faces of its members. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that, so that we can have a vote on this question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well, I will withdraw it.

Mr. ROGERS. Let the resolution be again reported.

The resolution of Mr. TAULBEE was again read.

Mr. ATKINSON. I move to strike out so much of this resolution as provides for the appointment of a clerk at a compensation of $6 per day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman refer to the substitute now?

Mr. ATKINSON. Yes, I refer to the resolution just read, offered by the gentleman from Kentucky as a substitute, and I desire to be heard briefly.

One of the objections, sir, which I have to this resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky is that by reason of this provision that a clerk shall be employed at a compensation of $6 per day, the investigation would be unnecessarily protracted and hence unreasonably expensive. So far as I can see there would be no work for that clerk to do. A stenographer is provided for in the resolution also, and no man living can tell you how long this investigation will run or how much it may be protracted at the instance of that clerk, who desires to retain the very handsome salary provided by the resolution.

I believe, sir, that the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois will develop all the facts in the case in controversy here that are desired, and if after the commissioners have answered that inquiry and all of the facts are developed, then this investigation provided for by the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky can go on if deemed necessary.

I am perfectly satisfied that the gentleman from Kentucky has offered his resolution in good faith, but I know that after the resolution was offered and referred to the District Committee, and after it was reported it became a matter of common knowledge that war was being made upon the commissioners of the District of Columbia, not on account of school sites, but because they had refused licenses to certain liquor-sellers here because they had been violating the provisions of the license law of the District, and whether that delegation of people of the District of Columbia that called upon the gentleman from Kentucky were applicants for license who had been refused or not, I do not know.

Mr. TAULBEE. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? The first question I asked of them was whether any of the parties participating in the transaction had anything to do with the traffic in intoxicating liquors in this District, and the answer was that they had not. So far as I am concerned, I have never asked the commissioners to grant licenses to anybody, nor have I ever been engaged in the business myself, and I disclaim any such motive or purpose. I know nothing of the war upon the commissioners of which the gentleman speaks.

Mr. ATKINSON. I was careful in my statement to say that I did not believe the gentleman from Kentucky was actuated by any such motives or influences; but if he reads the daily papers here, if he reads the Sunday papers especially, that seem to be sent gratuitously to us, he will learn that there is war being made upon the commissioners because they have refused to renew liquor licenses to men who have abused the privileges that had previously been given to them.

And whether this proposed investigation is intended to cast an aspersion upon these commissioners, and the liquor-dealers are back of it or not, I am not prepared to say. I can not tell. It may be that these men are under two fires instead of one; but nevertheless I do believe that this resolution presented by the gentleman from Illinois, which will give to these commissioners an opportunity to answer fully all the allegations that have been made against them, should first be adopted, and after that, if this House should deem a further investigation necessary, it could go on with all the paraphernalia of a stenographer, clerk, if you please, or anybody else, and make this investigation, but until then I believe that the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois should be adopted. To remove the objectionable feature in the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky, however, I adhere to my motion that so much of the resolution as provides for the appointment of a clerk at $6 a day shall be stricken out. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. BREWER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard for three minutes. I do this being a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia. The resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky was referred to that committee to investigate as to whether there was occasion for the investigation of the subject-matter referred to in the resolution. The committee called the commissioners before them. They gave them the privilege of bringing before the committee just such witnesses as they saw fit to explain the transactions referred to; and after the committee had deliberately heard the statements of the commissioners, and heard the statements of those they desired to bring before us, we reported in favor of an investigation; and that report has been in the hands of the chairman of our committee, who has been unable to present it or call it up in this House. That was the condition of things when the resolution was introduced by the gentleman from Illinois. I do not know why this House, nor do I understand why our committee, after its deliberate consideration of that resolution and its report, should go back on it here to-day.

I voted against reporting back the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, because I believed from the lips of the commissioners themselves, every member on that committee believed, there ought to be an investigation, and that there were transactions that ought to be explained, transactions that could not be explained by an answer to the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois. And there is not one transaction, but there are many of these transactions, as was developed before that committee.

Now, in regard to the clerkship, I care nothing about that. I am in favor of the substitute of the gentleman from Kentucky, and I believe the committee, if that is the usual course, should have its clerk, and that it should proceed with this investigation in order that such legislation should be had at the present Congress as may be found to be necessary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. TAULBEE. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 34, noes 39.

So the amendment of Mr. ATKINSON was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is now on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SOWDEN. I would like to have the substitute reported, so that we may know what we are voting upon.

The substitute was again read.

Mr. TAULBEE. I ask to amend the resolution, simply to correct a typographical error and have the word "vendees" changed to "vendors."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The correction will be made.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the substitute; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 21.

So the substitute was adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. TAULBEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SPINOLA. I ask the gentleman to withhold that for one moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the House some personal requests of members.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I withdraw the motion to adjourn at the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINOLA].

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ROWLAND, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, until Thursday next.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. HATCH was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the pension case of William C. Ebert.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPINOLA rose.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, what has become of the motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. THOMPSON] withdrew it.

LIGHT-SHIP AND FOG-SIGNAL, SANDY HOOK.

Mr. SPINOLA. I have been requested by all the commercial interests of the city of New York to ask the House to give favorable consideration at this time to a short bill which I send to the desk. I ask the Clerk to read the report, which is very brief, and which will explain the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be established off Sandy Hook, entrance to New York Harbor, a new light-ship, with a steam fog-signal, the entire cost of which shall not exceed the sum of $60,000.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that this bill is in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SPINOLA. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be now considered in the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that at this hour and under these circumstances the House ought to undertake to pass a bill appropriating $60,000.

Mr. SPINOLA. I will say to the gentleman that this bill passed both Houses before, and failed to become a law only because it did not reach the President in time.

Mr. MILLS. I suggest that the bill lie over until to-morrow as unfinished business.

Mr. SPINOLA. I have no objection to that.

Mr. MILLS. I now move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, that order is closed, and the Calendar, under Rule VIII, being in order, the Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

Mr. ALLISON. I will not object unless it should take time.

Mr. VOORHEES. I would not ask it if I thought it would take time.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 205) for the relief of the State National Bank of Louisiana.

Mr. VOORHEES. I wish simply to say that the bill was reported from the Committee on Claims by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] not now in his seat, and I have his permission to call it up in this way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length for information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Mr. PLATT. No, sir.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5870) to amend the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia for the protection of girls and for the punishment of the crime of rape, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HEMPHILL, Mr. COMPTON, and Mr. GROUT managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5349) for the relief of James Trabue, Thornton Thatcher, Michael Callahan, and the widow of John Waters.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. 11683) for the establishment of a light-ship with a fog-signal at Sandy Hook, New York Harbor; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

THE REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 9051.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. VEST, in line 2206, paragraph 670, of the free-list, to strike out "Ottar of roses" and insert "Salt;" so as to read:

670. Salt.

Mr. VANCE. Yesterday I stated upon the authority of the tariff compilation which has been placed upon the desks of Senators that there was no duty upon salt from 1846 to 1860. I find by a visit to the Bureau of Statistics that I was mistaken; that although there was no duty imposed in the statute, and the tariff duty of 1842 had been repealed, yet under the general clause taxing non-enumerated articles there was a duty of 20 per cent. collected upon salt until 1857, when the duty was reduced to 15 per cent.

I desire to make that correction, merely remarking that the force of the argument, such as it was, that I presented as applicable to free salt would be equally or very nearly equally applicable to salt at a very low rate of duty.

I have received the following telephonic dispatch from the Bureau of Statistics:

JANUARY 15, 1889.

Senator VANCE:

The duty on salt under the act of 1846 was 20 per cent.; under the act of 1857 the duty on all salt was 15 per cent.

THE BUREAU OF STATISTICS.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has the floor upon this amendment, so I will delay any observations I may have to make.

Mr. VEST. Go on; I yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. ALLISON. No, I prefer that the Senator should go on.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I desire to supplement what has been said by the Senator from North Carolina in regard to salt having been on the free-list by stating that I relied upon the compilation to which he has referred, and also upon the testimony taken before the Tariff Commission in 1882, when Mr. E. P. Wheeler, of New York, stated emphatically that salt had been upon the free-list from 1846 to 1861, and also the statements——

Mr. TELLER. Who stated that?

Mr. VEST. Mr. E. P. Wheeler, of New York, on page 221.

Mr. TELLER. He is president of the New York Free Trade Club?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. TELLER. Very likely. I should expect such a statement from him.

Mr. VEST. I might retort by saying that I should expect a statement on the other side equally erroneous, judging from a good many statements that have been made here in this debate. But that does not prove anything. Mr. Wheeler is a man of high character, and generally accurate in his statements. Besides his statement, the same thing was stated in the debate in the House of Representatives, by Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, and not contradicted, and that debate was a most acrimonious one.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I will say that it was contradicted on the floor of the House.

Mr. VEST. I can not hear the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. I say it has been contradicted on the floor of the House more than once, and if the Senator had read some of the speeches on the subject he would have found that the duty was specifically given year by year.

Mr. VEST. I think that I have read——

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLPH in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. VEST. I prefer to go on. Senators can take their own time. However, I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. PALMER. I merely wish the Senator from Missouri to repeat his statement. I could not hear it, there was so much confusion on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. VEST. I can hardly hear myself.

My last statement was, that in the House of Representatives during the debate upon the salt item in the Mills bill Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, made the statement that salt had been put on the free-list from 1846 to 1861, and without going back to the statistical or official tables, I took it for granted that such was the case, and have always so understood.

As to reading all the speeches in the House of Representatives or anywhere else upon the tariff question, life is too short, and unless put in solitary confinement for life I hardly think that any human being will ever accomplish that feat.

For all practical purposes it does not matter, or, to speak more correctly, for all the purposes of this discussion it does not matter whether I was absolutely correct in that statement or not. I have before me the statement of a gentleman about whom I think the Senator from Colorado will not make the statement he did about Mr. Wheeler, that he would expect that sort of a statement; in other words, that a man who differed with him politically as to the tariff question would not state the truth. That was the substance of it.

Mr. TELLER. No, I did not say that.

Mr. VEST. I leave that for proper deduction. Here is the statement of Mr. David H. Mason, of Chicago, Ill., representing the Michigan Salt Association before the Tariff Commission in 1882. After giving a summary of the legislation on the subject of the salt duty he proceeds to say:

After four and one-third years under the duty of 8 cents, followed the tariff of 1846, going into effect December 1 of the same year, and fixing the duty on salt at 20 per cent. ad valorem, equal, during the period of its continuance, to a specific rate of only 2.43 cents per bushel on a general average. Almost simultaneously with this reduction of the import charge New York reduced her tax to 1 cent per bushel, at which figure it has remained ever since; consequently, so long as the tariff of 1846 was in force, or ten years and seven months, the New York manufacturers, who then produced the bulk of our domestic salt, had only the mockery of protection contained in the excess of 1.43 cents of import duty over the State tax. Then came the act of 1857 further diminishing the tariff rate to 15 per cent. ad valorem. This rate lasted three years and nine months. Taking the average for that time, it was equivalent to a specific duty of 1.58 cents per bushel, leaving for protection, if anybody can venture to call it such, not quite three-fifths of a cent per bushel after the amount of the State tax was deducted.

So if salt was not absolutely upon the free-list it was reduced to a nominal protection, as was stated by this gentleman, who represented before the Tariff Commission the salt interests of the great Northwest.

One of the contentions in regard to salt is that the tariff duty has diminished the price. That has been continually asserted in both branches of Congress, and I am obliged to the Senator from Colorado for putting in the RECORD yesterday a table of prices which is conveniently at hand, the Statement B showing "the quantity and value of salt imported annually from 1847 to 1853, and also the duties which accrued thereon during the same period." That was during the continuance of the tariff of 1846, under nominal protection. In 1847 this table shows that the average price per bushel was 12.35 cents. In 1848, under the same tariff, it was 11.62 cents. In 1849 it was 12.38 cents. In 1850 it was 11.2 cents. In 1851 it was 12.7 cents. In 1852 it was 10.99 cents, and in 1853 it was 10.52 cents.

Mr. TELLER. The price?

Mr. VEST. The price, the average per bushel, according to the Senator's own table furnished here and put into the RECORD on yesterday; and that was under a nominal protection.

Mr. PALMER. I wish to ask the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. VEST Oh, yes.

Mr. PALMER. I merely wished to ask whether that was the quotation at the custom-house for the purpose of collecting the tariff duty?

Mr. VEST. If the Senator will turn to the RECORD, on page 788, he can read exactly what it was. It was this:

B.—Statement exhibiting the quantity and value of salt imported annually from 1847 to 1853, and also the duties which accrued thereon during the same period.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say, if the Senator will allow me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. VEST. Oh, yes; of course.

Mr. TELLER. That is the foreign price at the port from which it was shipped.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course it is; but we have always had the contention here that if you took off the duty the foreign importers, the manufacturers of salt in Great Britain, would avail themselves of it and would put up the price in the United States. I show from that table, printed by the Senator from Colorado, that when the duty was simply nominal upon salt, the price went down, the import price, and that the statement here that taking off the duty gives to the foreign importer control of the domestic market and the power to put up the price to suit himself, and to increase his own profit, is not true; and that is a material point in this entire controversy.

Yesterday the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] was kind enough to say that any one who advocated the removal of this duty upon salt was almost idiotic. Let us see, turning to that portion of the record, or history rather, of the salt duty, whether the Republican party has been consistent upon this question, or whether its great leaders did not join us in demanding the removal of the duty upon salt entirely in 1871. I read the vote yesterday taken in the Senate. I turn now to the House of Representatives. In 1871 my distinguished friend from Maine [Mr. HALE] led the cohorts of reform upon the salt duty in the House of Representatives. He closed that debate with the following statement:

In closing general debate upon this bill—

Which was a bill to put salt upon the free-list—

In closing general debate upon this bill, I wish to say but a word or two. The duty upon salt is now 18 cents per hundred pounds in bulk and 24 cents in sack. The best Turk's Island salt can be purchased at the place where it is produced for from 9 to 10 cents per bushel. Any gentleman here can compute for himself the percentage of duty resting upon this article. I believe that there is no one question about which the reflection of millions of people day by day is so decided as it is in declaring that there should be no tax upon this article of salt.

I have been asked to amend the bill introduced by me so as to cut down the duty 50 per cent. I do not consent to that. I believe this article should go upon the free-list; that the monopoly which has obtained heretofore for the Onondaga salt-works—as great and complete as any monopoly ever granted by the Tudors in England's most despotic times—ought to cease.

Mr. GEORGE. Whose language is that?

Mr. VEST. It is the language of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who was then a member of the House of Representatives, when he introduced the bill to put salt upon the free-list; and when that vote was taken in the House of Representatives the bill was carried by a vote of 147 to 47.

Mr. COCKRELL. It was a Republican House.

Mr. VEST. The House suspended the rules in passing the bill, for it took two-thirds under the rules of the House to do it; and in the list of those voting in the affirmative—the idiotic part of the community, according to the Senator from New York—I find Messrs. DAWES, FRYE, Garfield, HALE, HAWLEY, and HOAR. I leave to their Republican associates to determine the mental capacity of these leaders of that great party.

Mr. COCKRELL. They are now members of the Senate.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course, with the exception of Garfield.

Mr. FRYE. We have grown wiser as we have grown older.

Mr. VEST. Oh, yes, Mr. President, as the Senator from Massachusetts said yesterday, there is a great difference between now and then; but that difference grows not out of an increase of wisdom, but out of the exigencies of the Republican party—an overwhelming argument, and one that is always omnipotent in this or the other branch of Congress when it arises.

But the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] was not satisfied with that emphatic vote of 147 to 47. He said a year afterwards, in the House of Representatives, May 9, 1872:

One year ago, on the yeas and nays, the House voted to put salt on the free-list by a vote of more than two-thirds. We have the record here. The vote was 147 in the affirmative and 47 in the negative. I see no reason why members of the House should go back on the record which they then made. Nothing since has occurred which ought to change their views.

At that time a distinguished member of the House, who was afterwards President of the United States, supplemented the statement of my friend from Maine. General James A. Garfield, the martyred President, said:

I know, moreover, that for nearly two years the wholesale price of American salt in Toronto, Canada, was a dollar lower per barrel than the same salt was selling for on the New York side of the lake. That is, we produced it, shipped it across, paying whatever portage, freights, and transportation were required, and then sold it to our Canadian neighbors at a dollar per barrel less than it was sold to people on our shores. Certainly gentlemen will not want a duty continued that enables that thing to be done.

Another idiot joined the grand procession.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator from Missouri give me the year?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir; I will give the year. That was delivered May 18, 1872, and the gentleman who delivered it was General Garfield. In the language of the Senator from Maine, which I have read, he refers to the Onondaga monopoly, and we are again confronted in considering this duty upon one of the absolute necessaries of life with that eternal and ever-present specter to the American people, a combination, a trust, called by a witness before the Committee on Ways and Means, from whose testimony I read the other day, a gentleman from New York, a "sympathetic movement."

I now read testimony which shows that a salt trust was created under these high protective duties upon salt which lasted for more than five years, which was indignantly denied to be any combine or any trust, or even a sympathetic movement, but was called a unifying of interests. I read now from a statement made by the Saginaw Board of Trade, in the salt country in Michigan. In a pamphlet showing the lumber and salt production and auxiliary industries of the Saginaw Valley, the annual report of the Saginaw Board of Trade, I find the following:

The Michigan Salt Association was organized in 1876, expired by limitation in 1881, was at once reorganized under the name of the Salt Association of Michigan, and in 1885 was again reorganized under its old name, the "Michigan Salt Association." The principal agencies of the association are at Chicago, St. Louis, Milwaukee, Duluth, Louisville, Cincinnati, Toledo, Nashville, and Sandusky. The capital stock is $200,000, and the general office is at East Saginaw. The association handles the product of the manufacturers, taking their salt as fast as made, making liberal advances thereon, placing it on the market and making returns in full when sold. The benefits derived from a unity of interest—

"The benefits derived from a unity of interest"—

The benefits derived from a unity of interest were so patent that during the past year all of those manufacturers who had previously operated independently (with two or three exceptions) became members of the association, which now practically handles the entire product of the State.

The sales of the association during 1887, as shown by the secretary's books, were 3,201,537 barrels, as against 2,685,989 barrels in 1886.

During 1887 the movement of the salt product was greatly delayed owing to scarcity of cars. To obviate this as much as possible a car-line company composed of salt manufacturers has been organized to be known as the "Michigan Salt Line."

The officers are: President and treasurer, W. C. McClure; secretary, D. G. Holland; trustees, W. G. McClure, East Saginaw; F. C. Stone, C. A. Rust, Saginaw City; J. F. Eddy, Thomas Cranage, Bay City. The capital stock is $75,000.

Contracts have been let to the Michigan Car Company for the construction of one hundred and twenty freight cars to constitute the Michigan Salt Line, and to be run in four solid trains of thirty cars each, between the Saginaw Valley and Chicago. The cars will each have a capacity of 50,000 pounds, equal to 150 barrels of salt, and the whole number can move 18,000 barrels. It is also proposed to construct a number of lighters to be used in transferring salt from the various works to the cars.

So this trust was not confined to the production of salt, but to its transportation by land and water, and with its immense capital was enabled to control the market and to unify all the interests, direct and indirect, that were connected with this industry.

It is notorious that two years ago this same Michigan Salt Association went into the State of West Virginia, bought up the salt springs in the valley of the Kanawha, and closed all except two, and by that means controlled also the production of salt in another State of this Union; and they were enabled to do it by reason of this tariff duty which shut out foreign competition, handicapped the foreign importer to such an extent that it left them in absolute control of the home market.

I can read testimony here showing the impossibility of constructing such a trust under the free-trade system of Great Britain. It was attempted there and went to pieces because it required a sufficient amount of capital to control the output of salt throughout the whole world, there being no tariff which put a commercial wall around England and gave to the producers of salt an unlimited monopoly of the market.

I was glad upon yesterday to hear from the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], who has taken a prominent part in constructing this bill, in framing the report, and in the debate which has followed, that he was prepared to vote now to repeal the clause in the existing law and in this proposed substitute which gives free salt to the fishermen of the United States, although he is not willing——

Mr. HISCOCK. Do I understand the Senator from Missouri to say that I am prepared to vote to repeal that section?

Mr. VEST. I certainly understood the Senator to say so.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, no; I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. VEST. Did not the Senator state yesterday that he thought that provision of law was wrong?

Mr. HISCOCK. I did.

Mr. VEST. Well, then, is not the Senator willing to remove anything that is wrong from the law?

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, it is not morally wrong.

Mr. VEST. But I mean wrong in legislation.

Mr. HISCOCK. I want to say to the Senator that there is no question of future rewards and punishments involved in it.

Mr. VEST. I hope for the sake of the Republican party there is not. [Laughter.]

Mr. HISCOCK. It is largely a question of expediency. The question of a tariff bill, a revenue bill is to a certain extent always a question of compromises and reaching the best sense of a majority that have in charge the measure. I shall always bow to that judgment, and while I am not in favor of that provision, I shall bow to the judgment of the majority on this side of the Chamber on that question. I thought I made myself clear yesterday in regard to my position.

Mr. VEST. I did not understand it that way. I supposed that when the Senator denounced the legislation he was ready to remove it; but if there is a more potent influence with him than his conviction that it ought not to be upon the statute-book, of course he enters into the wide domain of ethical reform, about which I have nothing to say.

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope that the Senator will not put into my mouth the word "denounced." I simply expressed my private judgment and opinion with respect to that provision, and tried to make clear what I have said.

Mr. VEST. Very good; I accept the amendment. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] hands me the RECORD. I tried to quote the Senator correctly, and would not do any injustice intentionally. I read from the record of yesterday's proceedings:

Mr. HISCOCK. I say that, in my judgment—

Referring to that clause in regard to free salt for the fishing vessels—

I say that, in my judgment, it ought to be repealed, and I say further than that, there is no logic, in my opinion, which can sustain the law referred to.

But we must content ourselves with the abstract opinion of the Senator from New York, which is something, although we can not secure his practical action in the way of reform. We will take it for what it is worth. "Blessed are they who expect nothing, for they shall not be disappointed."

Mr. President, I have said all that I propose to say in regard to this question. I feel very earnestly that this duty ought to be taken off. It seems to me that it is worse than absurdity for any Senator to say that the amount of the duty has anything to do with the principle. If it were but the shadow of 1 cent I would take it off the people of this country, because salt is an absolute necessity of life, and the present condition of our Treasury gives us the best argument possible for reducing taxation in every direction.

The Republican party has stood since 1884 pledged to reduce the surplus in the Treasury, and here is a duty upon an article that enters into every household, an article which should be, like the light and air of heaven, free to the humblest citizen in our broad domain, and with an overflowing Treasury, an enormous surplus, no necessity for the money, we continue to impose this duty; and when we point out its iniquity we are told it amounts to nothing; it is a mere shadow; salt to-day is as cheap as the dirt under our feet and as the rocks around us, and therefore the duty should be retained.

I close what I have to say upon this subject by quoting from a historic statesman, my illustrious predecessor upon this floor, Thomas H. Benton. He says in his Thirty Years' View, in giving the debate upon the salt question:

A salt tax was not only politically but morally wrong; it was a species of impiety. Salt stood alone amidst the productions of nature without a rival or substitute, and the preserver and purifier of all things. Most nations had regarded it as a mystic and sacred substance. Among the heathen nations of antiquity and with the Jews it was used in the religious ceremony of the sacrifice, the head of the victim being sprinkled with salt and water before it was offered. Among the primitive Christians it was the subject of divine allusions and the symbol of purity, of incorruptibility, and of perpetuity. The disciples of Christ were called "the salt of the earth," and no language or metaphor could have been more expressive of their character and mission; pure in themselves, and an antidote to moral as salt was to material corruption. Among the nations of the East salt always has been and still is the symbol of friendship and the pledge of inviolable fidelity. He that has eaten another's salt has contracted towards his benefactor a sacred obligation and can not betray or injure him thereafter without drawing upon himself (according to his religious belief) the certain effects of the divine displeasure. While many nations have religiously regarded this substance, all have abhorred its taxation; and this sentiment, so universal, so profound, so inextinguishable in the human heart, is not to be overlooked by the legislator.

Mr. Benton concluded his speech with declaring implacable war against this tax, with all its appurtenant abuses of monopoly in one quarter of the Union and of undue advantage in another. He denounced it as a tax upon the entire economy of nature and of art, a tax upon man and upon beast, upon life and upon health, upon comfort and luxury, upon want and superfluity, upon food and upon raiment, on washing and on cleanliness. He called it a heartless and tyrant tax, as inexorable as it was omnipotent and omnipresent; a tax which no economy could avoid, no poverty could shun, no privation escape, no cunning elude, no force resist, no dexterity avert, no curses repulse, no prayers could depreciate. It was a tax which invaded the entire dominion of human operations, falling with its greatest weight upon the most helpless and the most meritorious; and depriving the nation of benefits infinitely transcending in value the amount of its own product. I devote myself, said Mr. Benton, to the extirpation of this odious tax and its still more odious progeny, the salt monopoly of the West. I war against them while they exist and while I remain on this floor. Twelve years have passed away, two years more than the siege of Troy lasted, since I began this contest. Nothing disheartened by so many defeats in so long a time, I prosecute the war with unabated vigor; and relying upon the goodness of the cause, firmly calculate upon ultimate and final success.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask the Senator from Missouri whether in his reading of the Thirty Years in the Senate, by Hon. Thomas H. Benton, he has not come across another eloquent passage, where Mr. Benton stated that he had almost become a free-trader, but when it came to the subject of putting the tariff on lead, said he, "I rose and proposed to put 100 per cent. upon that, and I carried it, because Missouri produces the chief part that is to be found in the United States."

Mr. VEST. Yes, I well remember it, and it haunted that distinguished statesman to the day of his death. In 1849, when he made his celebrated appeal to the people of Missouri, before he commenced this work, The Thirty Years' View, to which he devoted his latest efforts, there was not a single speech that he delivered in Missouri where he was not confronted by Democrats with that statement, and it as much as anything else brought about his political downfall.

I remember another historic episode. If my friend, and he is my friend, from Vermont will permit me, I remember another statesman, covered now with years and honor, who, when the question of taking the duty off of coal and salt was pending in this Chamber, rose and said when his name was called, "Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont on this question is paired with himself. He is for free coal but not for free salt," or "for free salt and not for free coal," I am not certain which; but "he is paired with himself," and the record stands in that way to-day.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. President, I hope there was nothing in what I said yesterday that questioned the capacity and the learning and the integrity of the distinguished Senator from Missouri in discussing this question. I confess that as I have seen Senators upon the other side day after day insist that the duties upon the raw material for the more finished product, as it was advanced step by step, were all aggregated in the last duty, and when I have heard it asserted here as if they believed it that the schedule of duties must cover the entire labor cost of the articles protected, I have questioned in my own mind somewhat their knowledge of this question or their integrity in discussing it.

The Senator from Missouri is frank and ingenious upon this question. He comes as near being a free-trader, doubtless, as any other Senator upon that side of the floor, and he has the courage of his convictions. But how long ago was it that we were treated in the Senate to the sight of two distinguished Senators upon the other side giving him notice that he did not represent the Democratic party and that they would not follow his leadership? They served notice upon him that the doctrine for which he contended had resulted in a defeat of the Democracy in the past and would result in the defeat of the Democracy in the future, and he was deposed as a great party leader upon this question.

I say again that it does seem to me that even the Senator from Missouri in the examination of this question hardly delves beneath the surface for the facts that he parades before the Senate. He points to the fact that during the period when the duty on salt was reduced to 20 per cent. ad valorem it ruled at a lower price in this country. It did. Then, as now, unless misstatements are made in the public press, a salt syndicate upon the other side of the ocean controlled the product and controlled the price, and they attempted to stifle this industry in the United States during that period of time, and it was a contest between the salt manufacturers of Europe, Asia, and Africa, and those of the State of New York, that I have in part the honor to represent here, whether it should be stifled or not. During the whole of that period of time the most liberal appropriations were made by the State of New York to develop the salt industry in that State. All that science could do it employed in that direction, all that mechanism could accomplish it employed in that direction, for the purpose of developing the salt industry of this country. Europe lowered the price, attempting to crush out this industry in the county of Onondaga, in the State of New York. The State of New York was back of the industry, and its liberal appropriations during that period of time in the promotion of the industry in that State were all that prevented the absolute crushing out of it in the United States. Michigan, by accident or in some other way, discovered salt within her territory, and I think I am right in stating that the result was a liberal bounty in that State upon the production of salt in it, and the only reason why we were not turned over to the foreign producer was that the State of New York and the State of Michigan, with liberal hand, promoted the domestic industry.

The Senator has seen fit to call the attention of the Senate to remarks which have been made by Republicans against this industry. Well, sir, there is nothing that more completely illustrates the progress we have made than the circumstance that the facts of the last ten or fifteen years have changed the minds and the judgments of those same gentlemen upon this subject. When they spoke and when they voted as has been cited here this industry was limited to two Congressional districts in the United States. Science, as I said yesterday, proclaimed that we had all the raw material that was necessary to produce all the salt that was needed in this country, and yet in deference to the public sentiment of constituents, as I doubt not, somewhat, these gentlemen, Senators and Representatives, cast the votes to which the Senator has referred. But they did not put salt on the free-list. They left upon it the same protection which I am defending here to-day; and let us see what the result of it has been.

California in 1870 produced 174,000 bushels of salt, in 1880 nearly a million; Kentucky, 64,000 bushels in 1870; in 1880, 83,000 bushels; Michigan, 3,981,316 bushels, in 1870, 12,425,885 bushels in 1880; New York, 4,900,000 bushels in 1870 and about 9,000,000 bushels in 1880. Ohio about held her own. Pennsylvania increased from 579,000 bushels in 1870 to 851,000 bushels in 1880; Utah increased from 1,950 bushels in 1870 to 483,000 bushels in 1880. West Virginia about held her own. In the other States the product was doubled; and since the census of 1880 the development of this industry has been unparalleled in the United States. In my own State of New York it has more than doubled. In Kansas it is prospering. The result of this has been that the price of salt has been forced down to a point never before known in the history of that product. Every prophecy that was made by the salt-men during the discussions which have been referred to by the Senator from Missouri has been verified and fulfilled; and now the distinguished gentlemen whose names have been called, who were on the roll of those who voted against the then protection of salt, in view of the facts are unanimously in favor of holding the protection which is now afforded it by the present law.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I supposed when the amendment was offered to put salt on the free-list that it was done more in a jocular mood than in any other. I did not suppose that there was any serious opposition to the tariff on salt, for if there is anything in tariff legislation which shows clearly the benefit of protection it is the effect on the salt industry as developed in this country.

The State which I have the honor to represent in part produces one-third of the salt used in the United States—about four millions of barrels; New York produces about a sixth. One-third of the consumption is imported from abroad, and the other sixth comes from West Virginia, California, Kansas, and other States which produce salt in small quantities. The question now, as far as protection is concerned, is more a matter of transportation than anything else, for salt at Saginaw is just the same in price as it is in Liverpool, and there is a margin of country along the coast of the United States where salt can be delivered cheaper from Liverpool than from Saginaw, but it would not be delivered cheaper if it had not been for the development of that great interest in Saginaw.

In 1860 there were only 4,000 barrels produced in Michigan. In 1857 or 1858, it having been known by tradition and by the geological surveys that there was an immense salt deposit under a great portion of Michigan, the State offered a bounty of 40 cents a barrel, and wells were put down. Then the tariff of 1861 gave a new impetus to the industry, and it has developed from that time till this, when it has reached its maximum of a little over 4,000,000 barrels.

The business now is unremunerative. It hardly pays the wear and tear, let alone the interest on the great works that have been established throughout the State, in which have been invested millions of capital; and everything that goes into salt at the present time is labor.

There is probably no part of the world where for the same amount of labor so much salt can be manufactured as in Saginaw, for the steam which saws the logs, and which generally goes off into the exhaust-pipe, is injected or projected through the pipes that are in the centers of the salt block and evaporates the salt, so that all of that is economized. There is nothing for fuel. Then, again, the refuse of the mill is worked up into barrels and into headings, so that barrels are manufactured cheaper there than anywhere else. And now salt is sold, with a barrel costing 21 cents, the raw material given in, for 51 cents a barrel. The barrel, as I say, costs 21 cents. In other words, they only get 6 cents a bushel for salt now at Saginaw.

To show what an effect this has had upon the foreign salt, I will just read the first and last of a couple of tables here, and let them go into the RECORD, showing the range of prices:

Year.	Price.	Year.	Price.
1868	1.85	1878	.85
1871	1.46	1881	.85

It is down to 51 cents now, and it is a drug on the market.

Now, in regard to the foreign salt. Does any one suppose that with the supply of which England has a most liberal amount in Cheshire, that with the immense demand here in America, if it had not been supplied in part by our local wells the price of English salt would have been dragged down in this wise?

Year.	Common salt.	Fine salt.	Year.	Common salt.	Fine salt.
	s. d.	s. d.		s. d.	s. d.
1873	15 0	40 0	1881	9 0	26 0
1874	16 0	42 0	1882	9 0	26 0
1875	12 0	40 0	1883	9 6	26 3
1876	10 0	31 0	1884	7 9	25 9
1877	9 0	28 0	1885	9 0	27 0
1879	9 0	27 0	1887	7 9	24 6

In other words, the foreign salt has been compelled to come down one-third in fifteen years, notwithstanding the enhanced price of labor abroad, and that was the reason why this attempted salt trust was got up, and I do not know but that it is a success in England, to save the manufacturers or the salt diggers there.

The Senator from Missouri in illustrating one point referred to a table on page 788 of the RECORD giving the decline in salt under a free-trade tariff from 1847 to 1853. It commenced in 1847, when the average per bushel was 12.35 cents; it ended in 1853 at 10.52 cents; but take the tariff right along through, this protective tariff which I wish was prohibitory, the price has gone down from 10.52 cents to 6 cents a bushel, showing that protection more than free trade has had a tendency to reduce the price of salt in this country.

In regard to the Salt Association of Saginaw, I think I know something about it.

Mr. VEST. Before the Senator proceeds——

Mr. PALMER. Does the Senator from Missouri wish to say anything? If so, I yield.

Mr. VEST. Upon the point which the Senator is just leaving, as to the depreciation or decrease in price under the respective tariffs, I neglected in the remarks I made to allude to a table which I find in the first volume of the report of the Tariff Commission, upon page 1198, incorporated in the testimony of Mr. David H. Mason, who represented the Michigan Salt Association. He takes the respective decades from 1830 to 1880 and gives the price of salt, foreign and domestic, for each ten years. I call the attention of my friend from Michigan, for this evidence comes from his own side of this question and his own State, to Mr. Mason's statement and as to the decline in the price of salt from the year 1850 to the year 1870. He gives the amount produced, together with the exports of domestic salt, the amount retained in the United States, the amount imported into the United States, the exports of foreign salt and the foreign salt retained in the United States, the domestic salt retained, and the foreign salt retained, and it shows that the price of salt in the United States was in 1850—and the low tariff, the Walker tariff, took effect on December 1, 1846—22.76 cents per bushel. In 1860, after ten years of that tariff and after an additional reduction from 20 to 15 per cent. ad valorem in 1857, the price was 18 cents per bushel, a decline of 4.76 cents per bushel; and that was under the low tariff of which he was just speaking.

Mr. PALMER. Under the low tariff?

Mr. VEST. Yes, and I will ask that these tables—in order that the whole question may be put upon the record—shall be incorporated in my remarks.

Mr. ALLISON. Is there in there also a table showing the continuance of the depreciation in the price of salt?

Mr. VEST. I have no objection to putting all of the tables in. The Senator from Iowa can inspect them.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not care to inspect them, but I think it might be well to put them all in.

Mr. VEST. Of course, all of them. I want to be perfectly fair about this question. I believe I am right. I think I am; I want to be. The table to which I particularly refer commences with the year 1830, and by decades brings the price of salt down to the year 1880.

Mr. ALLISON. What was it in 1880?

Mr. VEST. In 1880 it was 16.51 cents. It declined steadily, with fluctuations, sometimes lower and sometimes higher, but the decline has spread.

Mr. ALLISON. Is that the price per bushel?

Mr. VEST. Per bushel, the average per bushel.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator read those tables again before he sits down?

Mr. VEST. With the greatest pleasure. In 1880 Mr. Mason—and I refer to his testimony as that of an adverse witness—gives first the source of supply, then the year, then the portion, then the value, then the average per bushel. The price in 1830 was 21 cents per bushel.

Mr. PALMER. In 1830?

Mr. VEST. In 1830. Then he gives the amount retained of foreign and domestic salt. Now, come to the next decade. He goes by the census. In 1840 there were produced in the United States 6,179,174 bushels and the price was 20 cents. Go to the next. There were produced in the United States 9,763,000 bushels, an increase of nearly 4,000,000 bushels, and the price was 22.76 cents, an increase over the price in 1840. We had the Walker tariff from December 1, 1846, to 1861, and we also had a decrease during that time in the ad valorem duty from 20 to 15 per cent. In 1860 there were produced in the United States 12,717,000 bushels, showing that under the Walker tariff there was an increase of 4,000,000 bushels in those ten years, and the price had decreased under the Walker tariff from 22.76 cents per bushel to 18 cents.

Again, in 1870 there were produced 17,000,000 bushels, an increase of 5,000,000 within a fraction—nearly 5,000,000 bushels; and the price had increased in 1870 to 27 cents and a fraction. There might have been abnormal reasons for that. I am perfectly fair about it, and I will state frankly that I do not know that 1870 was an average year as to salt.

Mr. PLUMB. The increase between those two periods was greater, the Senator will ascertain, than the entire amount of the duty—about twice the total duty.

Mr. VEST. I think it was.

Mr. PLUMB. So that the Senator can readily see that there must have been circumstances operating.

Mr. VEST. I admit that, and I said that of my own accord.

Mr. PLUMB. I only called attention to it.

Mr. VEST. I think 1870 was an exceptional year, as we know there were circumstances that year which increased the price of all commodities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLPH in the chair). Before the Senator from Missouri proceeds further, the Chair suggests that the Senator from Missouri is talking in the time of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER]. The Chair will insist on the rule that when a Senator is addressing the Senate he shall address the Chair and wait until he is recognized and the consent of the Senator having the floor is obtained. In this colloquial discussion going on it must be difficult for the Reporter to take the reports of the debate, and it does not tend to the orderly consideration of the bill.

Mr. VEST. In 1880—I am through with the table for which the Senators on the other side asked—in 1880 there were produced in the United States 20,800,298 bushels of salt, and the prices had decreased from 27 cents and a fraction in 1870 to 16.50 cents in 1880, and there is the table to prove it.

Mr. ALLISON. Since that time the price has further decreased.

Mr. VEST. No doubt about that. There has been a decrease in that and everything else.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it is about 10 cents a bushel now. For some reason or other there has been a constant decrease in the price.

Mr. VEST. There has been a decrease in the price of every other article of necessity in this country. I know my friends on the other side claim that the tariff did it, and I claim that it has been done by competition and improvements in methods and discoveries in salt-springs and in the rock-salt which is dissolved and made into salt for the table and dairy. I now present the tables produced by Mr. Mason before the Tariff Commission for insertion in the RECORD:

Salt.

*Average prices of imported salt per bushel are those in the foreign ports of departure.

Mr. PALMER. Is the Senator through?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. The Senator's own argument, I think, proves very conclusively the benefit of the protective tariff, for if it is the object of law-making to cheapen commodities certainly it must be conceded that the protective tariff has cheapened salt much more than the free-trade tariff of which he speaks, for there was in none of those decades any such decrease in price as there has been in the last ten years, which has brought salt down to 6 cents a bushel without the package, and that I imagine is the way he characterized it in speaking of it.

We are now consuming in this country 60,000,000 bushels of salt. Eight million barrels are produced in this country; 4,000,000 are brought from abroad. Now let us see what the effect would be of taking out 2,000,000 or 4,000,000 bushels of the salt production of this country. It would undoubtedly increase the price by the discouragement of the industry by reducing the tariff and letting in foreign salt. It would compel the abandonment of many salt-blocks in Michigan, and when they were once abandoned they are very expensive machines that would never be rehabilitated unless under very exceptional circumstances. It would be for the benefit of this country, if they could not be kept up in any other way, to pay a direct bounty for the maintenance of the blocks in Michigan, which make 4,000,000 barrels a year for the supply of this country and for competition with foreign salt.

A word now in regard to what the Senator from Missouri said in respect of the salt association of Saginaw; he characterized it as a trust. If he wishes to make trusts popular, he wants to take just such instances as that and hold them up before the public. What has been the mission of that salt association? It has been to do through the hands of one office business much more cheaply than it could have been done through fifty offices. Instead of having runners all over the United States, they have their agents at different points, and they know exactly the supply. The weak salt-blocks upon the river or throughout the State have been enabled to get advances upon their salt. None of them have ever been crushed out, none of them have ever been stifled. They have been helped against the interests of the strong. If the salt-blocks of Michigan had been decimated, if the weak ones had been allowed to go to the wall, salt would be higher to-day. That salt association of Saginaw is just like the rules of the House of Representatives, for the protection of the weak and for the protection of the public.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly; I am in pursuit of knowledge, and I am very glad to be interrupted.

Mr. VEST. I am always very willing to be interrupted myself, but as a matter of fact I indulge very little in the interruption of others. Does the Senator mean to say—because I take it that is the tendency of his argument—that the creation of the Saginaw or Michigan salt trust or salt association diminished the price of salt?

Mr. PALMER. I do not suppose that was the intention, but that has been the practical result. As the Senator can see, when a weak concern which is staggering along can get advances on its product without going into the market and selling it, the effect must be to cheapen salt.

Mr. VEST. That reminds me, if I am not interrupting the Senator at too much length, of the attack that was made upon my course in the Senate in the Steel and Iron Bulletin of Philadelphia. I stated here in the debate on the steel and iron schedule that the Vulcan Steel Works, near St. Louis, had been leased for five years by the iron and steel monopoly trust, and had been shut down for three years in order to enable the trust to control the output of steel rails in the United States. This paper came back and said that I was entirely mistaken, that the price paid to the Vulcan Iron Works to shut down for a year or nine months was about $70,000 and not $500,000 a year, as I stated. But the remarkable part of the statement in the line of the Senator's argument was that the steel and iron trust, which they admitted existed, had interfered and paid $70,000 to the assignee who had charge of the Vulcan Works in order to prevent the sacrifice of the property, and that they had simply gone in out of a spirit of philanthropy and charity in order to prevent this very valuable property from being bid off under the hammer for almost nothing!

Now, Mr. President, I deny that the Senator is entirely right when he states that the formation of that Michigan salt association, which it is said was to unify interests, was not simply to increase their profits and to enable them to control the market. I make this statement, and I can prove it by the report of the Saginaw Board of Trade, that from 1866 to 1876—and that trust was formed in 1876—the price of salt went down to a greater degree than it did in the years when the trust was in existence, and it could not have been that the trust was formed to depreciate the price.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator base the logical connection of his argument on a verification of that? I have the figures right here.

Mr. VEST. I have the figures also.

Mr. PALMER. He will permit me to say that in 1867, nine years prior to the organization of what he calls the trust—it is not a trust; it is an organization——

Mr. VEST. It was born in 1876.

Mr. PALMER. In 1876. Salt was sold at $1.70 a barrel in 1867, and it ran down to $1.05 a barrel in 1876; but the great decrease was in the last three years.

For instance, in 1873 salt was $1.37 a barrel, and from 1876, when it was $1.05, it has run down at the present time to 51 cents. So you will see, conceding that it was equable through the nine years previous to 1876, the proportion for the ten years following has been for each year greater than it was before.

Mr. VEST. What was the price in 1886?

Mr. PALMER. In 1886 the price was 61 cents and now it is 51 cents; but at the same time the Senator must remember that there is one thing that remains arbitrary all the time, and that is the barrel. That costs just as much now as it did twenty-five years ago.

Mr. President, I concede that salt, which in our State employs from 5,000 to 10,000 laborers, has been very much depressed. Our people, however, are asking for no relief, but they ask that this tariff shall be allowed to remain just where it is; and my opinion is that if it should be taken off, salt would rise within five years to double what it is at the present time.

Right on the St. Clair River there is an immense salt-bed of salt-rock where the water from the river is let down into a vast cavity and the salt is saturated, as they call it, and the pressure of the water forces it to within about 10 feet of the top of the ground—the saturated brine that is pumped out with very little expense; and yet notwithstanding the facilities that nature has given, notwithstanding that coal can be delivered there for $1.50 a ton, that large concern, managed by good business men, making 500 to 600 barrels a day, has not paid one cent of dividends in the last six years. It is so, measurably, throughout the State, and the blocks are supplied by steam from the mill. I do not believe there is a salt-block in Michigan that is paying enough to make up for wear and tear, let alone the interest; and the great object now is to keep the work for our men, looking for better times.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly, if he desires.

Mr. TELLER. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. PALMER. I think I have said about all I have to say. I am not given to making long speeches.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] was speaking of who paid the tax. I can not see where the tax comes in if one year I pay a nominal tax and the next year the article falls so much below the present price that I more than get my tax back, and that has been the history of the salt industry in this country, and every measure of protection that has been given to it has been recompensed by five times the reduction by the manufacturers at home.

Mr. PLUMB withholds his remarks for revision. [See Appendix.]

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, yesterday the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] both made arguments to show that the tariff on salt had been oppressive to the people of the United States, and that in the halcyon days, of which they are always so fond of talking, under the Walker tariff from 1846 to 1861, there was no duty on salt, salt was very cheap, and the people were not oppressed by this great monopoly. Mr. President, the argument fell to the ground when it was discovered that there was a duty on salt during that period. It is true it was not a great duty, but it was 20 per cent. ad valorem, which I have heard denounced on this floor over and over again on some articles as an outrageous duty. But the Senator from Missouri this morning excuses himself for having made this mistake as to the fact on the ground that the statement had been made by the president of the Free-Trade Club, whom I do not personally know, but of whose conduct during the last campaign I have had some knowledge, as to the character of the arguments that have been sent out by that club. He made the statement, and the Senator relied upon that. I said it was just such a statement as I would expect to come from that source.

I did not mean to say that Mr. Wheeler, the president of the club, was not a reliable man. I do not suppose Mr. Wheeler got up the statistics and the statements that were sent out. In nine cases out of ten no doubt they were the result of the mental operations of some clerk in that free-trade club office. But I do mean to say that not only have statements gone from that club in the interest of free trade unsupported by facts, but contrary to facts; and I want to say that a great many of the statements made on this floor have been without the basis of fact. It is not the first time on this floor, in the interest of free trade, that the plain statistical facts of the country, that can be reached and examined by everybody, have been misrepresented.

We have heard here about the great mortgages on the whole Northwest, aggregating more in some States than the value of the farm-lands in the States, mortgages upon the farms, put forth here solemnly by a Senator who had never taken a moment's time to examine to see whether the statement was true or not; but because he found it in some free-trade journal or in a circular issued by some free-trade club, he accepted it as true and palmed it off on the people of the United States under the high authority of his place in this body. We heard only a day or two ago from the other side of the Chamber that Great Britain was paying no subsidies in fact to her subsidized steamers. We heard the statement from the same source that the French Government were not subsidizing steamers at this time. And this when it is a notorious fact, which nobody ought to deny on this floor, that since 1848 the English Government has paid out nearly, if not quite, five millions a year on an average and some years six millions and more of money for the support not of her mails but of her commerce. It is a notorious fact that ought not to be disputed here that the French Government has entered upon the system of subsidies to her steamers. And yet, upon the authority of a Senator in this body, the people of the United States are told that all the world has abandoned subsidies to steamers, and that we on our side are the only people who have any desire to engage in that kind of business; and we are told further that the United States has never granted to ships bounties, when the history of this country proves that that is not true.

I am reminded by a Senator near me that Great Britain is now complaining bitterly of the subsidies that are granted by the French Government to the French steamers encouraging French commerce; and so, Mr. President, as I said, I was not surprised at a misstatement emanating from a free-trade club. I repeat again, the misstatements of free-traders are not confined to free-trade clubs. The Senator from North Carolina yesterday attempted to show that there was no tariff duty on salt in 1846 and subsequent thereto to 1861, and that by reason of the absence of duty the price of salt had fallen. Will the Senator from North Carolina tell me what was the price of salt in 1861 when Congress adopted the new tariff? I presume he has not got that. It was nearly twice as much as it is to-day, and it was more than twice as much as salt has sold for in the State of Michigan by the barrel within the last four years.

Mr. VANCE. If the Senator will allow me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. VANCE. If the Senator will recur to my remarks yesterday he will see that I gave the average price of salt, not for every year, but for the period he alludes to.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator gave the price of salt for a series of years under that tariff as 26.4 cents a bushel, which is $1.32 a barrel. For years salt has not been $1.32 a barrel. I called attention yesterday to a report made in 1854, showing that there was a duty on salt during the Walker tariff, and I should like to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to a report made the 2d of January, 1858, in which it is said:

> The present duty, under the act of 1846, is 20 per cent. ad valorem, which, on the importation of 15,405,864 bushels last year, valued at $1,981,065 by the custom-house books, makes the duty within a fraction of 2.57 cents per bushel.

Mr. VANCE. The Senator certainly was not in the Chamber this morning when I made the correction of my statement of yesterday.

Mr. TELLER. I have not been out of the Chamber at all.

Mr. VANCE. The Senator will probably remember that I said that I had gone to the Bureau of Statistics and had corrected my statement made yesterday, showing that there was a duty of 20 per cent. on salt from 1846 to 1857, and then it was reduced to 15 per cent.

Mr. TELLER. I have been in my seat all the time. I knew the Senator had the floor this morning, but I confess to him I did not hear what he said, and I did not know that he made any correction.

Mr. VANCE. Yes, sir; I did.

Mr. TELLER. I am not finding any fault with the Senator. I was only saying that his argument had fallen to the ground, because the basis on which it was founded had failed. We have had a tariff on salt at all times, except from 1807 to 1813. There has been no free salt in this country at any time within the memory of man, and it is a notorious fact that under that free trade in salt, salt was higher in price than it has ever been at any other time, except during the war before we had revived our destroyed salt industry.

It is further a notorious fact that year by year salt has been going down in price, until to-day it is not worth over 11 cents a bushel. Of course, it may be worth more in some sections of the country, but not in the salt-marts and salt-markets of the country.

Now, the Senator from Missouri, not learning experience by having followed Mr. Wheeler, produced another free-trade argument, a statement that has been denied over and over again in the public press, that owing to the duty on salt the salt manufacturers of the United States were enabled to carry their salt in 1872 and thereabouts to Canada and sell it for a dollar a barrel less than they sold it in the United States. At the very time the Senator complains of, when he says salt was being sold in Canada for a dollar less, salt was selling in the United States, and had been for more than a year before that time, for $1.46 a barrel, with 21 cents for the barrel. Saying nothing about the transportation from the salt-fields to Canada, the producer must have received on Canadian soil 25 cents a barrel for his salt.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator will permit me a moment——

Mr. TELLER. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. VEST. I simply read what President Garfield said in the House of Representatives, without comment. I read his own statement, and if it was a mistake it was made by him. I gave the authority at the time, and you will find it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. TELLER. It does not make any difference what the authority was. The Senator must have known, if he had stopped to think a moment, that the statement must be erroneous. He must have known that no such thing could have existed, and the Senator must have seen over and over again the statement made and its contradiction in the public press. If he has not, I have.

The Senator waxed eloquent and became somewhat pathetic over the sufferings of the people of the United States caused by this great duty when salt is selling for from 9 to 11 cents a bushel, and when the utmost consumption that can be claimed is a bushel per capita in the United States, which includes all the great packing establishments, all the salt for manufacturing purposes, as well as agricultural purposes. It can be readily seen how oppressive this must be upon the common people, who are so dear to the Senator from Missouri!

Why, Mr. President, the ordinary farmer who puts up his own pork does not use more than a barrel of salt a year, and the ordinary mechanic, with an ordinary family, does not use a bushel of salt a year. The duty paid on that is inconsequential. The price of salt is of no earthly account in the consideration of a man's expenses.

There is an article that enters into use in every family in this country, an article that so far all the duties we have been able to put upon it have not succeeded in stimulating the industry to such an extent that any appreciable amount upon the market can be produced and has been produced in this country, and notwithstanding the high tariff we have put upon it we are producing less to-day than we produced thirty years ago; and that article is sugar. The Senator from Missouri is quite willing to keep the sugar tariff on. He admits that we do not need the duty. He says that we do not need the revenue, and yet he will grow enthusiastic, and pathetic, and eloquent over the duty on salt, while he is entirely silent on the question of the duty on sugar.

Mr. VEST. Wait until we reach that schedule and see whether I am silent or not.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know what the Senator may do when we reach the sugar schedule. I know what his political party has done as a party. While they are aggrieved over salt, as a political party they have nothing to say about sugar, or but little. What they do is in favor of the continuance, practically, of the present duty.

Mr. President, Mr. John L. Hayes was the chairman or president of the Tariff Commission of 1882–'83. He made a statement which I find quoted in the House of Representatives, to which my attention has been called, and I desire to put it in the RECORD. Mr. Hayes said:

> It is said that the cost of salt to the consumer will be diminished by free trade or reduction. This is contradicted by American experience. In 1807 the duty of 20 cents a bushel which had before been imposed was repealed, and salt was admitted free of duty for six years. Consequently our home works were abandoned, or greatly reduced in production. Domestic competition being withdrawn, the prices of foreign salt which then flooded the markets advanced, being as high as $2 per bushel. When the war of 1812 arrived the foreign supply from England and her colonies was cut off. We had to depend upon the few establishments of our own which had not been driven out of business by foreign rivalry; and it is recorded as a historical fact that "salt was sold in quantities in more than one of our States at $4 per bushel."
> While writing this article we were informed by a merchant of Portsmouth, N. H., that a cargo of salt was held in that town during the war of 1812 by speculators, though not actually sold, at $8 per bushel.
> In 1872 Congress reduced the duty on salt in bags from 24 cents per 100 pounds to 12 cents, and on salt in bulk from 18 cents per 100 pounds to 8 cents, that is, reduced the duty more than one-half. What was the result? The foreign producers put up the price immediately, and in forty-seven months after the reduction of the duty took effect the average increase in the foreign invoice value amounted to over 8 cents per 100 pounds, or to more than two-thirds of the duty taken off; and the expected benefit of reduction, instead of inuring to our consumers, went into the pockets of foreign manufacturers of salt.
> The rise of prices attracted attention everywhere in this country; and the New York Chamber of Commerce, in a report upon this subject in 1873, declared: "The reduction of duty on foreign salt has not had that effect upon the price of salt that was anticipated by those who advocated its passage. The cost of both ground and fine salt is higher than it was before the duty was reduced."
> These facts establish what the American salt producers maintain, that any legislation which would break the growing force of the American competition against the foreigner would be sure to strengthen the foreigner and enable him to exact higher prices, and that the tendency to cheaper salt, now in operation, can be sustained only by maintaining those circumstances which strengthen the power of American competition.

Mr. President, I have here a statement of the price of salt, and I say, notwithstanding what has been said by Senators on the other side about the small duty on salt under the Walker tariff, that since 1877 salt has been cheaper in barrels in the United States than it was in 1860 and 1861, before the passage of the new tariff law. This salt question is not simply a question of expense. No people can afford to be without salt manufactures on their own soil if they have the means of so doing, and a better illustration of the necessity of the home manufacture of salt can not be had than that which we had during the recent war. The South was without manufactures at all, although the State of Louisiana and other sections had an abundance of salt which if they had utilized would have been of great value to them, not only as a necessity of life, but as a necessity of war. I do not know what the price of salt was in the South, but it went up to an unheard-of price, and there was undoubtedly great suffering in the South because of the lack of salt.

If we should have a foreign war with a power great enough to blockade our ports—and if we are to have a war there is where it will be, upon the ocean and not upon the land—what condition would 65,000,000 people be in if they had no salt manufactures? Much as Senators on the other side may be in love with the idea of cheapness, I do not think when they carefully consider this question that they ought to view it wholly and entirely from the standpoint of dollars and cents. It is as necessary to a successful nation that it should have salt as that it should have wool or that it should have iron. They are necessities in time of war, and we can not abandon our salt industry in this country, if we should save 2 or 3 or 5 or 10 cents a bushel on salt; but with salt at 10 and 11 cents a bushel, with the industry being opened and salt being made in all parts of the country and the people thus being saved the expense of transportation, there is the greater necessity for the encouragement of this industry.

The people of Colorado and the people of Kansas would pay to the railroad companies immense sums of money for the transportation of salt if the salt came from the seaboard and had to be transported across the continent by rail. We want to develop the great salt-fields of Kansas, of Northern Texas, of Utah, and of all that section, and we shall have local production as well as local demand.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I want to say a single word before the vote is taken. I apologize for having consumed so much time in the discussion already. What I have to say is suggested by the last remarks of the Senator from Colorado.

So far as his country and mine are concerned in the trans-Mississippi department it is not affected by this duty at all. We can very safely rely upon the salt-fields of Kansas and of Michigan, and the competition between them will bring the price down to us whether the tariff be increased or diminished.

But the operation of this tariff, the unjust operation of this duty upon salt is in the South and on the Southern Atlantic seaboard. The testimony before the Tariff Commission in 1882 showed that the freight from the New York salt-mines and the Michigan salt-mines put their product absolutely out of the reach of the Southern consumer; and the salt that comes into Galveston, and New Orleans, and Savannah, and Charleston, and Richmond, Va., to a large extent must be foreign salt.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose the Senator from Missouri must be aware that Louisiana is one of the most valuable natural deposits of salt in the world.

Mr. VEST. Yes, I know as much about it as any man living; I have seen it, and there is an island in the Mississippi River which could produce enough salt to furnish the entire world, or ten more such worlds.

Mr. ALDRICH. I wish the Senator would explain, then, how the places to which he alludes are dependent upon foreign salt.

Mr. VEST. As to the mine to which the Senator alludes, if he will turn to the debate in the House he will find that a member from Louisiana gave a very intelligent and succinct account of it. The mines in Louisiana have been under pecuniary difficulties and have not been worked. Whether those difficulties have been removed now or not I am unable to say, but that Louisiana mine would not supply the markets upon the Southern Atlantic seaboard.

I have here a statement to show how this tariff operates. I speak now in regard to the region of country which I have mentioned. Here is a statement from Mr. W. A. Hazard, who is the managing partner of one of the largest salt establishments in the United States, and here is his calculation:

Cost of common salt at works in England, per ton	$0.51
Transportation to Liverpool	1.03
Freight to New York	1.94
Insurance and shrinkage	.12
Total cost in New York, per ton	3.63
To this add the tariff duty	1.79
Makes the cost of the English salt upon our shores, per ton	5.42
Cost at the works in New York, per ton, including everything (I mean the salt works of New York.)	3.20
Total cost	4.20

Leaving a margin between the foreign salt and the New York salt of $1.22 a ton, and that is what this tariff does. It gives, according to my position (and I do not think there is any man living who can answer the statement), the additional cost of $1.22 on every ton of salt, which must be paid by the consumer. As a matter of course, if the consumer does not pay it that is the end of this whole tariff discussion. That closes the book at once. But from my standpoint and that of the Senator from Rhode Island—because in his report he claims that the duties on sugar have increased the cost to the consumer, and his argument in that report is that the duties on sugar ought to be diminished because sugar is an article of absolute necessity and there is more sugar than bread used in the United States——

Mr. ALDRICH. I admit the truth of the statement as applied to sugar, but I object to the inference which the Senator is now making that that condition would apply to all the imports of the United States.

Mr. VEST. I understand what the Senator would say, because he knows what he has said in that report, but it does not answer his own position. He says the sugar produced in the United States is not sufficient to furnish the requisite competition with the imported article, but that is only in degree; the principle remains; the principle is there. He admits in so many words in his report that if you take off the duty on sugar you diminish the cost to the consumer. That is all I say. Then the Senator and myself at last have got together.

Mr. ALDRICH. Upon the article of sugar we have.

Mr. VEST. We are together on the whole principle, because if taking the duty off sugar diminishes the cost to the consumer it is only a question of degree measured by the quantity of production in this country as to how much you take off.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Senator from Missouri will agree with me that where nine-tenths of any article that is consumed in this country are imported, the price is fixed by the foreign price plus the duty; but, to reverse that statement, where one-tenth is imported and nine-tenths produced in this country, it is the nine-tenths that fixes the value of the article and not the one-tenth; and the cases are not analogous. A statement of facts which might be true in one case is not the truth in another, and the inference drawn from the one would not apply to the other.

Mr. VEST. Well, Mr. President, I could quote a good deal more authority which I have here, and which I will take occasion to put in during the debate, showing that whenever it suits our friends on the other side they always insist upon the doctrine as I lay it down, that the increase of duty comes off the consumer; but again they take the other side of that question and deny the truth of the proposition. Now, I contend, and I can not see it in any other way, without regard to the quantity imported or the quantity produced in this country, if you ever admit as to any single article, without regard to the amount that is produced or imported, that the consumer pays the tariff tax, you give away the whole position of the Republican party upon that question.

I know that you can bring in sporadic articles, as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] did in his two magazine articles and in his argument afterwards in the Senate, like coffee, but I think I showed, without any sort of question, as my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] will admit, I believe, that coffee is an exceptional article, and it is the only one in all commerce that the Senator from Vermont could have found in which the rule that the duty is added to the cost did not work.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me, I think I can explain by a practical illustration exactly what I mean. Take the article of straw braids, on which a discussion was had in the Senate the other day, where the entire amount consumed is imported. I think every Senator in the Chamber will agree that in this particular case the duty is added to the cost to the American consumer.

Mr. VEST. What article is that?

Mr. ALDRICH. Straw braids, where the entire consumption is imported.

Take, on the other hand, ordinary print cloths, where the price is not very much greater in Manchester, at times, than it is in Fall River, and where the duty is say 2, 3, or 4 cents a yard. There are no importations whatever of print cloths and the duty is never added, I think the Senator will agree, to the cost to the American consumer.

These two cases illustrate the difference in conditions which render the rule applicable or inapplicable. Between these two extremes are a great number of cases where a fraction of the duty is added to the cost to the consumer, the percentage varying with the relative portion of the American market which is held by domestic or foreign producers.

Mr. TELLER. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who insists that the duty is added to the price of the salt, to the fact that salt has been selling in the United States by the barrel for 7½ cents a bushel. The duty upon that at 8 cents a hundred is 4.48, or, practically, 4½ cents. That leaves 3 cents for the manufacture of salt. The Senator can hardly contend that salt can be manufactured or has been manufactured at 3 cents. The truth is that we produce so much salt that we fix the price ourselves. We produce about two-thirds of all the salt used in the United States, which is about in the neighborhood of a bushel per capita. It is less than that, but call it that. If the duty is added to a bushel, which is 8 cents a hundred, amounting to 4.48 cents a bushel, that, added to every bushel of salt consumed by the farmer who consumes four bushels, will make him pay a revenue of 18 cents a year. The mechanic, who consumes half a bushel—which is quite as much as the ordinary mechanic would consume who does not put up meats—would pay by this 2¼ cents a year. And yet, to any unacquainted observer or listener who had heard the speeches made on this question, a foreigner, coming in here and listening to them, and not knowing the facts, would have supposed there never was such tyranny on the face of the earth.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER] says that salt is selling in Saginaw for 3 cents a half bushel. Salt has never been so cheap as it is to-day, except occasionally. The price has been steadily coming down year by year, and it is becoming cheaper to the people in the different sections of the country, because we are opening up the industries there.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] showed us a few moments since that salt was cheaper in Kansas than it ever had been. Why?

Because we are getting the advantage in the West of the local production, and I saw a statement made only a few days ago that 10,000 barrels had been shipped to the capital of Colorado in one single shipment, which I understand was shipped from the salt-fields of Kansas.

Mr. President, all this worry and talk when salt is selling from 7½ to 11 cents a bushel seems to me hardly worth our while.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I stated before distinctly that the amount of this tax made no sort of difference with me as to my action in the matter. If it were but the shadow of a cent, it is wrong. I have nothing to do with the vote of the Senator from Colorado or with his principles about it, but if he thinks it is right that the men who put up meat in this country for exportation abroad, his constituents and mine, should have only 10 per cent. rebate on the salt used under this bill, whilst the fishermen have 100 per cent. rebate, I have nothing to do with it; but in my judgment it is an unjust discrimination as the bill now stands. I want to take the whole duty off. That single distinction, that single discrimination in this bill stamps it as unjust and inequitable.

Now, referring—as I have found the paper—to one of the salient points in this whole discussion, and that is who pays the tariff duty, I have here an authority that I think will be indisputable in the Republican party. The Philadelphia North American, which is the ablest protection paper in the United States, of December 22, 1888, on the point of who pays the tariff duty, says:

The Republicans of the Senate found the revenue bill delayed, the early part of the week, by the obstructive tactics of the opposition. All sorts of objections were made. Senator VANCE, of North Carolina, was quite agitated by the proposal that cotton-ties should be made in America by men instead of our buying them in England where they are made by women and girls. He thinks the retention of a duty upon them is a clear proof of the sectional character of the bill, whereas the truth is that the putting cotton-ties on the free-list was a clear proof that the Mills bill was a sectional measure. The Senate bill aims at protecting all American industry with which foreign labor can compete injuriously. The Mills bill took the amplest care of every Southern industry, while it transferred to the free-list whatever the South was more interested in buying than in selling.

Mr. VANCE, however, contends that while the tariff does nothing for the cotton-planter, it makes him pay dearer for this necessary article. He forgets that the very existence of a cotton-growing industry in America is due to the protective duty on cotton, which was imposed in spite of Alexander Hamilton's protest, and kept up until the planter was well on his feet. Under that duty the women of New England long paid a higher price for every pound of cotton they plaited into lamp-wicks or wove into sheetings. It was not until the improvement in the quality of American cotton forced the English to take the duty off it, that the South joined hands with Manchester, and strove to kick down the ladder by which it had climbed. Let Mr. VANCE read Edward Everett's address on the history of American cotton.

Now, I should like to know how that increase to the cost of the women of New England was brought about upon cotton unless it was by that tariff duty.

Mr. DAWES. I will tell the Senator. In the early days, before the American manufacturer could supply the market, the foreign producer charged the duty that he paid in addition to the cost. It is only when the American producer can supply the market that the foreign producer is obliged to pay the duty himself. The times have changed. That was the reason why John Quincy Adams, in 1832, made the statement which was read by the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] here. That was true until a protective tariff had introduced and created industries that supply our market, and whoever comes into a market already supplied must pay the additional expense.

Mr. VEST. Well, Mr. President, here is the point, and the Senator ignores it—I will not say evades it, but he does not notice it. The point between the other side of the Chamber and us is just simply this: Does the tariff duty come out of the consumer or out of the importer?

Mr. DAWES. That is what I was trying to state.

Mr. VEST. This editorial article says that before the cotton-planting interest became of any interest in the United States, and when there was a tariff duty on cotton, that increased the price to the women of New England.

Mr. DAWES. All I said was true then, and I undertook to give the Senator the reason, because then the manufacture at home was so limited that it could not supply the market at home, and therefore the importer came in to supply our market, and could add the duty to the cost; but the moment that the home producer supplies the market that ceases, and while that was true in the early production of cotton fabrics, it has long since ceased to be true under the influence of protection.

Mr. VEST. That, I respectfully submit, is another branch of the subject. That is as to the effect of competition created, as our friends say, by the exclusive tariff. Their position is that the tariff creates domestic competition which brings down the price of the article to the consumer notwithstanding the foreign duty; but the point I am making is this: Is there any phase of the tariff question when the tariff duty comes off the consumer, or not? I am not talking about the effect of the tariff in building up domestic manufactures to create competition to reduce prices to the consumer, but I am talking about this point: Does the tariff duty at any time come off the consumer? The article which I read says it does, and the Senator from Massachusetts admits it, because he says until the domestic cotton interest is built up to such an extent as to compete with the foreign importation, that state of things exists which this article depicts.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator from Missouri admit that it did exist; that the duty upon cotton increased the cost to the American consumer?

Mr. VEST. I believe in every case the tariff duty increases the cost.

Mr. ALDRICH. But for a great many years prior to the time it was repealed it was inoperative; that is to say, the exportation of cotton from the United States was very great. Now does he think the fact that that duty remained upon the statute-book added to the cost of American cotton cloths consumed by the American people?

Mr. VEST. That is not pertinent to this question.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is exactly pertinent.

Mr. VEST. Not at all.

Mr. ALDRICH. The duty remained just the same.

Mr. VEST. That is another phase of the question.

Mr. ALDRICH. Three cents a pound was levied on cotton from the time the duty was put on the statute-book, under the influence of Mr. Calhoun, until it was finally repealed, comparatively a few years ago. In the first part of that period it did add to the cost of the cotton.

Mr. VEST. Precisely.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the theory of the Senator from Missouri, as I understand it, is correct, that a tariff duty is a tax at all times and is added to the cost both of the foreign product and the domestic product, then will he explain how it was that for the last years of that period it did not add to the cost to the American consumer? What stopped it? If there is any natural law about it, why did it not continue over the whole period?

Mr. VEST. I have never denied that to some extent the principle might be true that there might be domestic competition between American manufacturers or producers, instead of the operation of the tariff, that would for the time decrease prices, but unfortunately the experience of this country is that as soon as that thing comes about then the manufacturers or producers combine and create a trust, create one of these associations to unify interests; one of these sympathetic movements——

Several SENATORS. Where?

Mr. VEST. Some Senators ask "where?" Where not? What article of any importance in this country to-day is not under the operation of a trust?

Mr. ALDRICH. The cotton growing and cotton manufacturing and woolen manufacturing.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the Senator from Missouri yield to me for a question?

Mr. VEST. I yield to anybody.

Mr. HISCOCK. I find a provision in the law that potatoes per bushel of 60 pounds pay a tariff duty of 15 cents a bushel. There were imported into this country in 1887 one million and a half bushels. In 1888 it was largely increased, and the duty collected upon all of those potatoes was 15 cents a bushel. The product of the potato crop of that year in this country was 134,000,000 bushels. Now, I ask the Senator from Missouri if the 15 cents a bushel paid upon the importation of potatoes into this country, paid upon a million and a half of importations, raised the price of the other potatoes raised and consumed in this country 15 cents a bushel?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. HISCOCK. One other question in that same connection. Hay is quite a crop in this country. There is imposed upon it a duty of $2 per ton, and the importation to this country was 78,000, nearly 79,000, tons of hay, and the hay product of this country was 41,000,000 tons. Now, do I understand the Senator from Missouri——

Mr. VEST. How much did we export?

Mr. HISCOCK. We may have exported a little. Possibly we export manufactured goods also. The parallel holds all the way through. Now, does the Senator from Missouri assure me that $2 a ton was added to the cost to the consumer of the 41,000,000 tons of hay produced in this country and consumed in this country? And when he has answered that, we will take tobacco also, and we will take very many other products; and when he has answered, if he insists that the duty did not add to the price, then I ask him to discriminate or draw the line of distinction between these items, these goods, these products that I have indicated and the products of the manufacturing industries of the United States.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, all that is in a copy of the Tariff League Bulletin, which I have here, and which I have been looking for since the Senator commenced his question.

Several SENATORS. "Plagiarism."

Mr. VEST. I will not say "plagiarism." It just shows how great minds run in the same channel.

Mr. HISCOCK. That, if the Senator will pardon me, was what I attempted to illustrate yesterday for his information. I say I never saw this in the Tariff Bulletin.

Mr. VEST. That shows what I say to be true.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am very glad it is true, and I am very glad for this reason: The Senator seems to have his attention called to it; he has had time to reflect upon the problem, and I doubt not now he is thoroughly prepared exhaustively to explain it.

Mr. VEST. Why, Mr. President, if the Senator will take the volume which I have here, containing the testimony of Mr. Mason, from which I read this morning, he will find his whole argument applied to wheat and to corn and to the productions of the truck garden; and then

Mr. Mason, who represented the salt interest of Michigan, triumphantly asked, "Now we want to know of our free-trade friends if the duty upon wheat is added to the cost to the consumer in this country." Io triumphe! and the protection drums are beating and the protection bugles are sounding and the American people are expected to believe any such nonsense and stuff and rot as that! Why, sir, do we not know that all of our agricultural productions are exported from this country? Do we not know that we have a surplus of them? Do we not know that the miserable pretense of protecting the farmer by putting a duty on corn and wheat is worse than the old absurdity of carrying coals to Newcastle? Do we not know, besides feeding consumers in this country upon wheat and corn, that we send abroad out of all our exports two-thirds in wheat and corn and cereals?

Mr. HISCOCK. I insist that the Senator from Missouri shall not divert me at least from the question which I put to him. I have not called his attention to wheat; oh, no.

Mr. VEST. Oh, no.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have not called his attention to wheat; I have called his attention to those products which stand on a parallel with our manufacturing industries; I have not extended it to the products as to which he seeks to answer; not at all. I have directed his attention to those products which we import because we require more than we produce, as in the case of tobacco, and therefore I say to him that his answer with respect to corn and with respect to meat is simply an avoidance of the question.

Mr. VEST. Not at all. I announced the principle; I announced the rule.

Mr. HISCOCK. And I announce to the Senator this rule, which I do not believe he has ever studied, that there is always a proportion between an imported article and the home production; there is always a relation in the price of the imported article, whatever the duty may be upon it, and the price of the home product, whatever the duty may be upon the competitive article, which depends absolutely upon the relative volume of the two. In other words, as in the case of potatoes, I will give the Senator the answer to the problem. The importation is so inconsequential as compared with the volume of the product that it does not affect the price.

So with reference to hay; the importation is so inconsequential as compared with the whole volume which is consumed that it does not affect the price. So with reference to woolen goods; so with reference to steel goods, the importation—I would not say does not affect the price; it does affect the price, but it does not raise the price to the amount the Senator seems to think it does under the protective duties. So it is with respect to steel goods and iron goods, and with respect to leather and with respect to all goods as to which we produce immensely in excess of that which we import, there is not that increase which he claims that there is on account of the duty which has been imposed.

Something was said about sugar the other day——

Mr. VEST. Now, I am the best-natured man in the Senate——

Mr. HISCOCK. I thought the Senator had yielded the floor.

Mr. VEST. I do not care to have a whole speech interjected in the nature of a question. But let the Senator go on.

Mr. HISCOCK. There is one other word——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair). The Senator from New York will suspend. The Chair thought the Senator from New York was entitled to the floor.

Mr. VEST. Not at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair begs the pardon of the Senator from Missouri. Does the Senator from Missouri now yield to the Senator from New York for further remarks?

Mr. VEST. Oh, yes; I yield.

Mr. HISCOCK. There is one other point to which I desire to direct the Senator's attention. Something was said here yesterday, I think, about the Senator from Rhode Island having conceded that the duty was added to the price in respect to sugar. That is true. Why? Because the condition of things is reversed. The production in this country is inconsequential as compared with the importation, and the result is that every single farthing that is added to the tariff upon sugar practically is added to the price of sugar to the consumer. The relation between the two is maintained, only it is reversed.

Begging the Senator's pardon if I thrust myself inopportunely or injuriously into his speech, I yield.

Mr. VEST. Not at all, except that I must say I get a little impatient under certain statements made by Senators on the other side when they put a question and tell me I have never studied this question and know nothing about it, and therefore the inference is logical that I ought to keep my mouth shut and listen to ex cathedrâ denunciation by the great statesmen on the other side of this Chamber in reference to our mistakes, and flagrant mistakes, made by men who I thought were a little larger than any of those leading in this debate, and I am a little tired of hearing that we can learn nothing except from that fountain of perpetual and perennial wisdom, and there are other people, and I insist upon my right to go elsewhere than to them. I am not an expert on the tariff. My people are not living on it, thank God! We are not making money out of it, and are not in partnership with it to make money. The people of Missouri are digging it out of the ground, making it without any protection from these laws for which the Senators on the other side are now so energetically striving. If the Senator had waited, as he ought to have done in all courtesy, for me to have answered—of course I could not have answered it in his opinion and never expect to, but when I arrive at that sublimity of wisdom where I can answer anything satisfactorily to a protectionist, I expect to be ready for that temple "not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. President, I was about to remark in answer to the Senator that I have never gone to the extent of saying that the tariff duty, every cent of it, was put upon the cost to the consumer. I thought the President of the United States stated that too strongly and that the facts did not warrant him when he made that statement in his celebrated tariff message. But I do say that the imposition of the tariff duty affects the cost to the consumer, always modified by the amount of production in the United States. For instance, as to potatoes; let there be a failure of the potato crop in my country and all through the Western States and then you will find the foreign importation affects the supply and affects the price, and whenever we raise enough potatoes to supply the home market and have a surplus, foreign importation does not affect us at all. So with other products. And I would have attempted to have said that in my feeble, Western, Democratic way if my friend from New York had permitted. That is the natural operation of the tariff.

I repeat again, when Senators undertake to make an exception as to sugar they give away the whole case, because the quantity produced in this country can not affect the principle when you once admit that the tariff duty is put on the cost to the consumer under any state of the case at all, and that is the whole of it. If the duty does not come out of the consumer, why do you impose it? Why do you put it there? The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] would say that it is put there in order to enable domestic competition to lower the price. That is the answer to the proposition, and when I asked in regard to this identical article of salt, why is it that you make a discrimination between the meat producers of the West and the fishermen of New England and the fishermen anywhere else; why, when you give a rebate of 90 per cent. only to one, to the other you give a rebate of 100 per cent., the reply comes, "To protect the Navy, to build up the Navy;" no other excuse can be given for it.

Mr. President, without being offensive to any one, I believe as honestly as I am a United States Senator addressing the Senate of the United States that the whole of this tariff system is based upon greed, to protect and encourage (as they call it, to protect) the manufacturers in larger profits and more exorbitant demands, and that every cent that is unjustly taken from the people of this country is taken under the pretense that it protects American labor, when in fact it protects those gentlemen who are putting enormous amounts of cash in these respective interests for the purpose of building up enormous fortunes for themselves.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri and myself seem to agree now with reference to the effect of the tariff upon prices, and I propose to make one other suggestion in regard to the increase of prices, and possibly we may agree upon that. It is this: Suppose that in Europe is produced $100,000,000 worth of woolen clothing, and we enact a system in this country which enables us to produce $100,000,000 worth here, doubling the volume of woolen clothing that goes into the market. Now, what we say is, that that condition of things has the effect to force down the price to the consumer. That is our proposition. So in reference to cotton goods; and if we keep on increasing the production in this country until we increase here the product of the world three times, the effect of it is to force down the price of that product to the people of the world; and this is conceded by every political economist who has written upon the subject. Indeed, I know of no one who does not concede that the tariff of the United States in stimulating production, increasing the product of the world to the world's consumers, has had the effect to produce the abnormally low prices which we have to-day in everything.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from New York a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. Any question.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator states that the production in this country, stimulated, as I understood him to say, by the protective tariff, high taxation, has a tendency to reduce the price of commodities. Now I would be very much obliged to the Senator if he would explain just how that is done. I perhaps may owe him an apology for not listening to what he said, but I should be glad to understand how it is that with a high protective tariff the price of the commodity in this country is reduced as compared with the same commodity in a foreign country, and what the limit is.

Mr. HISCOCK. What I said and what I repeat is this: Upon the other side $100,000,000 worth of goods of any particular line are made. You stimulate the industry in this country so that we place in the market from our factories $200,000,000 worth of goods, adding them to the world's market. The effect is that this large increase in production lowers the price of those goods the world over, and there is a corresponding depression in the price here. I am conceding all the while that in the main there is a relative difference between the price of the goods here and the price of the goods upon the other side, and yet we are claiming that there is a decrease in the price of the goods here and elsewhere that more than compensates for it.

Mr. BUTLER. Then, that being true, may I ask the Senator what is the necessity for this excessive taxation upon imported goods? The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] says it is not excessive. Why this high import duty which brings a hundred million dollars surplus into the Treasury? If the argument of the Senator from New York is sound, we have this tax upon imported goods in order to reduce the price in this country.

Mr. HISCOCK. For the reason that here in this country to enable us to produce these goods it is necessary that certain conditions between our producers and foreign producers should be equalized—the labor cost, if you please, the cost of money, every element which enters into the price of goods. The theory of a tariff is to equalize those conditions.

I will illustrate my argument in the same way that I think I have done before upon the floor of the Senate on this same question. France and Germany gave high protection in one form and another upon sugar. They gave a bounty upon the beet-sugar product of those countries. The result was the development of the beet-sugar industry, so that at the present time it equals the cane-sugar product of any country in the world. By this paltry sum in bounties, compared with the product, the world's product has been increased, and the result of that has been to force sugar down to its present low price.

Mr. BUTLER. If that be true, may I ask the Senator from New York if the protection given to the production of sugar in France and Germany has enhanced the value of wages in those countries?

Mr. HISCOCK. I have no sort of doubt about it. I say yes. I know how often the argument has been used that protection does not increase the price of wages, and it has been illustrated by the rate of wages in Europe. In that connection it is always well for the inquirer to bear in mind what the price of labor in Germany and France would have been if this increased field for labor had not been opened. That answers the question, or at least the inquirer should answer that question himself first. With their accumulating population there in those paternal governments they have to look after the people and keep them employed or else they have a revolution on their hands. The German statesmen discovered and the French statesmen discovered that they had to furnish labor for their subjects, or else they would have a revolt and a revolution, and therefore they stimulated this industry for the purpose of giving labor to their people.

Mr. BUTLER. And only for that?

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not say that it was only for that. I can not say that. I say it was because of the fact, which I have no doubt the Senator from South Carolina will concede, that it is the compelled policy of those nationalities to furnish their people with labor, or else a revolution follows.

Mr. BUTLER. Then, if that be true, is it a fact that the high taxation in France and Germany has brought the value of labor in those countries up to the point it is in this country, where we have a high protective tariff?

Mr. HISCOCK. No, the rate of wages is not equal.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from New York be kind enough to explain why it is not equal? If his theory is correct, why is it the fact that the labor in Germany or in France, with a high protective tariff, is not upon a plane with that in the United States, where we have a high protective tariff?

Mr. HISCOCK. Simply for the reason that France and Germany have all the labor they want to do the work they must have done. That is the reason why.

Mr. BUTLER. Why is it not as high there as it is here?

Mr. HISCOCK. If France and Germany could be the producers of the world, if our ports were open to them free, if they could supply us——

Mr. BUTLER. I understood the Senator from New York to state awhile ago that we imported very largely from foreign countries more than we exported.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have not said so.

Mr. BUTLER. I understood the Senator to say so.

Mr. HISCOCK. The Senator misunderstood me. I have not even discussed that question.

Mr. BUTLER. I understood the Senator to say that we brought in a great many things, that we are very large importers.

Mr. HISCOCK. If the Senator will read my remarks he will discover that I have not even touched upon that question.

Mr. BUTLER. I understood the Senator to say so in reply to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HISCOCK. I said nothing of the kind. I stated that with reference to certain products to which I called the attention of the Senate, the parallel held good in our importation and exportation of them as well as in the manufacturing industries.

We have heard the fact that the price of labor has not advanced in Germany or in France dwelt upon. It is advancing to some extent, but I do not care to state that fact. I simply will ask the man who puts the question to me why it is not higher, to tell me where it would have been unless this immense amount of labor had been furnished to their people.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish to give the Senator from South Carolina just one item of increase of wages in Germany. Germany did not adopt the protective system really until 1883. They had a very small tariff, but in 1883 the chancellor declared that it was now time for the German Empire to adopt a protective system to be put in force, and he declared that the great prosperity of the United States, in his judgment, was due to the protective tariff, which prosperity he said was unequaled and unparalleled in the history of the world.

If the Senator will allow me I will call his attention to the changed condition in that short time in the German industries:

The statistics of German companies owning iron and steel works show that in January, 1887, 138,695 workers were employed in 250 works, but in January, 1888, there were 147,051 employed, an increase of 6.2 per cent. But the average of wages for all classes in these 250 establishments was 66.20 marks in January, 1887, and in January, 1888, the average of wages had risen to 69.67 marks per month. Thus an increase of 11.7 per cent. was recorded in a single year, with a large increase in the number of hands In four years after the protective tariff was adopted it added 52,000 to the number of workers in German iron and steel industries, and increased their wages 17.4 per cent.

Mr. BUTLER. The arguments of our friends on the other side are sometimes very amazing to a simple-minded man. I have sat in this Chamber by the hour and heard our friends on the other side emphatically and eloquently depict the condition of the American laborer as compared with the European laborer in language which I should not attempt to follow. They have contrasted to the advantage of the American laborer his condition with that in Germany and France, and they have attempted time and again to impress upon the American people that there were no laborers upon the face of the earth so happy, so rich, so prosperous as the American laborers. Yet, when I put the question to the Senators on the other side as to the condition of the German laborers under the influence of a high protective tariff, they say that the German laborer's wages have been wonderfully increased under a protective tariff.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, no.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator says "Oh, no," they have not increased. The Senator from Colorado has just read statistics to prove that they have increased under a protective tariff.

Mr. HISCOCK. When I shook my head inopportunely, I was excepting to the word "wonderfully."

Mr. BUTLER. Then I will withdraw the adjective, and I will say that the wages of the German laborers have been increased under a high protective tariff. Does that suit the Senator?

Mr. DAWES. Is not that the fact?

Mr. BUTLER. If it is a fact, your argument then is not worth the time it takes to utter it.

Mr. DAWES. That may be; but is it not the fact?

Mr. BUTLER. Your argument is not worth the time it takes to utter it if that is true. The controlling reason that I have heard in this discussion for a high protective tariff, sometimes a prohibitive tariff, is that it is enacted to protect American labor against the pauper labor of Europe. Now you prove, when you are tested on another branch of the argument, that there is no pauper labor in Germany practically.

Mr. HISCOCK and others. Oh, no.

Mr. BUTLER. "Oh, no!" The Senators shake their heads and say "Oh, no." They do not say there is no pauper labor. The Senator from Colorado has just proven by statistics that the German laborer is fairly well off at least, and that the American laborer has to compete with pauper labor in Europe so far as Germany is concerned.

Now, Mr. President, one word more. I never have believed, I do not believe now, in the doctrine that any taxation, high or low, has anything whatever to do with the price of wages. I, in my humble judgment, believe that to be the most flagrant, the most untenable position that any intelligent people ever got into their minds. I do not believe that a high protective tariff in this country enhances the value of any man's wages. I think it is a fallacy from beginning to end.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from South Carolina allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does not the Senator think that the duty upon rice enables the laborers of South Carolina and Georgia to produce rice in competition with the cooly labor of India?

Mr. BUTLER. I doubt it very much. I doubt very much if it affects the labor.

Mr. ALDRICH. That was not my question.

Mr. BUTLER. I doubt very much if it affects the labor.

Mr. ALDRICH. My question was not as to whether it affects the labor, but whether the protective duty upon rice does not allow the laborers of South Carolina and Georgia to raise rice in competition with the cooly labor of India.

Mr. BUTLER. They may be in competition with the cheap labor of India, perhaps.

Mr. ALDRICH. Could they do it without any tariff at all?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALDRICH. Without any tariff?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLATT. Then let us take it off.

Mr. BUTLER. I have not asked you to keep it on.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have not said that the Senator did ask us to do so.

Mr. BUTLER. And I will never ask it. Let my friends on the other side understand that.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have not made any such suggestion.

Mr. BUTLER. But when the Senator from Rhode Island gets up and says that he is attempting to protect all the industries of this country under this bill uniformly, without regard to locality, without regard to industries, and increases the tax on cotton-ties 100 per cent., and reduces the tax on imported rice 50 per cent., he will pardon me if I question the entire sincerity and honesty of that committee—I do not mean personally, of course.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the duty upon rice is not necessary at all and if we still retain a duty of 50 per cent. ad valorem, we certainly have done ample justice to the Senator's constituents.

Mr. BUTLER. Very well; I am not complaining; but I am simply calling the Senator's attention to the want of consistency of the committee. As my friend from Iowa said when he was discussing this question the other day upon the tax on fish, the committee desired to be conservative. I was a little struck with the condition of this bill. But that is apart from what I was saying.

Now, the Senator from Colorado produces statistics, coming back to this question of labor, to show that the wages of German laborers have increased, and yet we hear day in and day out upon this floor and everywhere that the main object of a high protective tariff is to increase the wages of labor in this country. I had supposed that the tariff tax was like the dews of heaven, that it fell upon the righteous and unrighteous alike. Yet we find under its operation the wages of labor at one point in one section of this country at one rate, at another point at another rate. We find one rate in Ohio, one rate in New Jersey, one rate in the State of the Senator from New York, another rate in Georgia, and another rate in Texas. And yet our friends tell us that so beneficent is this protective system intended for the benefit of American labor that they all thrive and prosper and grow happy and rich under its operation.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator answer me a question?

Mr. BUTLER. And that is claimed in the face of our experience for fifteen years that the laboring classes in this country have had to combine and strike day after day, week after week, month after month, and year after year, in order to have simple justice done them.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BUTLER. I yield to anybody. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] wants me to yield to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will give me his attention, I should like to have him tell the Senate what he thinks the effect upon the wages of labor would be of increasing employment.

Mr. BUTLER. I think that would depend entirely upon the amount of labor that was to be employed. I think if there was an abundance of labor it would be cheap.

Mr. DAWES. That is not answering the question.

Mr. BUTLER. I think if there was a scarcity of labor it would be dear.

Mr. DAWES. I did not ask the Senator what degree of effect it would have, but what effect does the increase of employment have upon wages?

Mr. BUTLER. The only way I can answer that is just as I have answered it. It would depend entirely upon the demand.

Mr. DAWES. I will put my question in another form. If one man has two things to do, and two men have only one thing to do, which is the best off?

Mr. BUTLER. I think that increased employment increases the value of labor.

Mr. DAWES. That is all. That is the answer.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no doubt upon earth about that. In any department of life, whether in agriculture or in manufactures, or in the professional world, I think that increased employment increases the value of labor, of course. Nobody but an idiot could think otherwise.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will allow me one word in that connection I will say that that is all the theory of a protective tariff.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. DAWES. That is the theory of a protective tariff in relation to labor. Nobody that I know of claims that a protective tariff increases the wages of labor in any other way than that it increases employment, and by increasing the employment of labor has a tendency to raise the wages, and wages are always regulated by supply and demand. When the supply of labor is greater than the demand for it, wages will fall. When the demand for work is greater than the supply of labor, wages will rise. Therefore the greater the amount of employment the greater the demand, and that will as certainly raise wages as that water will rise from a fountain.

Mr. BUTLER. That is a new phase of the question.

Mr. DAWES. That is the bottom of it.

Mr. BUTLER. That is a new phase of the question presented in order to meet the proposition which I made. As I said, they always have something to meet every proposition of that kind. Admitting it to be true that increased employments increase the value of labor, I take it the Senator and I would differ very widely as to what would increase employment.

Mr. DAWES. That is very likely.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not believe for one that a high protective, prohibitive tariff increases employment for anybody.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. BUTLER. On the contrary, if the Senator will allow me to conclude my sentence, I think up to a certain point it restricts employment for labor. It makes possible trusts and combinations which shut down and put labor out of employment. That is my theory upon that subject. So whilst we might agree upon that general proposition that increased employment will increase the value of labor, we should differ as to what would give increased employment in this country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield further to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. Now I will tell the Senator how I think that a protective tariff will increase employment. I may be wrong and the Senator may be right; but I will tell him as well as I can just how I think it is.

There are about $2,800,000,000 worth of fabrics affected by a tariff. Seven hundred million dollars of them are imported. Twenty-one hundred million dollars of them are manufactured in this country. Therefore, one-quarter of all the labor performed on what is consumed in this country is performed abroad. Now, if a protective tariff should so operate as to enable the wage-earners of this country to perform all of the labor on these fabrics, there would be $700,000,000 more of fabrics made in this country, or 33 per cent. more of labor performed in this country than there is now. You would add 33 per cent. to the amount of labor to be performed while the number of laborers would remain the same, and my opinion is that it would just as certainly lift up wages as that the sun rises.

Mr. BUTLER. If the proposition of the Senator be true that if all the products made elsewhere than in the United States were made here there would be just that much more labor employed in this country——

Mr. DAWES. I am putting an extreme case.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely; that is an extreme case. I do not remember the figures, but the Senator said if every importation that we bring in from foreign countries were manufactured here, just in that proportion would be the demand for labor. If that be true and all of the products manufactured elsewhere than in America could be manufactured here, what does the Senator from Massachusetts think would be the condition of what he chooses to call the home market?

Mr. DAWES. My opinion about it is that two things would happen. The home producer would have this market at his door and spend no dead loss in carrying his product to a distance. The American producer having employment all the time and adequate recompense would be able to consume a great deal more, and thus each one would strengthen the other.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to say that practically there is no limit to the home market; that no surplus can be manufactured in this country?

Mr. DAWES. I do not know why the Senator should infer that I said there was no limit when I did not intimate anything about the limit.

Mr. BUTLER. Simply because the Senator stated that if all these goods were manufactured in this country it would require the employment of additional labor, and therefore there would be additional consumption; and that the people of this country would not have to spend the money for transporting and shipping articles abroad and bringing others in. I understood from that statement of the Senator that the entire product of this country would be consumed in this country.

Mr. DAWES. I spoke of the condition which would supply our market. When that time comes and our manufacturers seek a foreign market they must do just what England does; they must devise a way by which they can produce articles cheaper and put them down in that market cheaper than anybody else can, or else they can not sell them. The effect of that will be, as I had occasion to say the other day, if they adopted that principle here at home, to weaken home consumption, and therefore it would be suicidal to them.

Mr. BUTLER. The argument comes down to this at last: that the Senators on the other side who advocate what I think to be a monstrosity—I must say monstrosity, as this bill in my judgment is——

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me to add a word?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not mean to say that in any disrespect to anybody, but I think in effect it is a monstrosity. Understand me to say this, that when it becomes necessary for any country, as it is for this country, to raise $300,000,000 annually, largely from importations, whoever talks about this man or that man being a free-trader because he advocates such an adjustment of the tariff duties as shall be fair and equitable and just and equal all around, I was about to say would be perhaps but one or two degrees removed from idiocy.

The idea of any man in this country, with this large amount of money to be raised annually, largely from importations, being a free-trader is such an absurdity that really it does not require discussion, it seems to me, among intelligent people. Nobody in this country is a free-trader; nobody can be a free-trader with that amount of money to be raised. All that I contend for, all that those contend for with whom I agree, is that the taxation shall be so adjusted and so laid and so collected that it will be fair and just and equitable and honest to all the people of this country, not for the benefit of one privileged class.

The argument is made that one of the effects is, in addition to the encouragement of American industries, to enhance the value of American labor. God knows I do not want to destroy any American industry. I want to encourage them all. I would be glad to see in my own State, as I have said again and again, in every township in that State, if it were practicable, a cotton factory erected. But I am not prepared to see that done at the expense of the other tax-payers of the State, and I say in reference to the whole country what I say in regard to the State I have the honor in part to represent; and that is all I contend for. When we hear in this discussion the claim, the argument, and the pretense that the effect of a high protective tariff is to enhance the value of American labor, I can scarcely restrain myself from characterizing that pretense as I think it deserves to be characterized in the face of our experience and of the facts of history and in the face of the very statistics which the Senator from Colorado himself has read to the Senate this morning.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina has made a great deal out of the statistics to which I referred. He assumes that those statistics show that the prices of German labor and American labor are the same.

Mr. BUTLER. No, I did not say that.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator practically said that, and he said that I had furnished the proof here that gave away our whole case.

Now, Mr. President, what is the fact? Germany was not a protective country and had the lowest labor of Europe with one or two exceptions. She never had been a protective country. Great Britain had been a protective country until forty years ago, when she abandoned the protective system. After she had organized all her industries upon a solid basis, with a home market and with much of the market of the world that she had got by her skill, by her superior knowledge of manufactures and her great capital and her commercial advantages, she abandoned the protective system. She then was paying the highest wages to labor of any nation of the world—I mean outside of the United States. She has continued to pay the highest wages to labor in the world outside of the United States. Yet in very many of these industries we are paying 100 per cent. more than Great Britain and as high as 140 per cent. more than Germany.

While I read a statement to the effect that in four years of protection in Germany wages had advanced 17 per cent., yet it will take twenty-four years for the very lowest of German industries to reach the price of the ordinary labor in the ordinary industries in this country, and in some of the industries it will take forty years; yet the Senator rises and says the whole case is surrendered because four years of German tariff protection have advanced the wages 17 per cent. when they are still 100 per cent. lower than the wages in the United States.

Technically speaking I suppose it is true that a tariff does not raise wages. It does not immediately put them up. In other words, you can not legislate that a man shall have so much more for a day's work by a tariff. But when you do as the Germans did, when you organize a system of industries that will add fifty-two thousand more workers to the men who work in iron and steel in four years, you have made a demand for labor that did not exist before, and everybody knows, even the Senator from South Carolina admits, that the demand for wages governs the price of wages.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; and that is all there is in it.

Mr. TELLER. And that is all there is of it. When Germany said, "We will manufacture instead of buying of Belgium," as they had been doing, their iron and their steel, when they took 52,000 men from the farms and put them in the iron mills, they raised not only the wages of every man they put in an iron mill, but of every man they left on a farm. Does it require any great comprehension to understand that? It is a fact that can not be questioned or denied.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. TELLER. The German consuls are authority for the statement and the report of the English consuls everywhere, and I have the proof right here if the Senator wants to look at it.

Mr. BUTLER. No, I do not want to look at it.

Mr. TELLER. I have the proof to show that with a protective tariff in Germany have come more labor, more demand, better wages, and greater prosperity, not only to the men who labor in these industries, but to all Germany.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I may have misconceived the drift and tenor of what is called the protection argument in this debate, and in all the other debates on that subject, but I have been very much mistaken if I have not understood it to be the object and purpose of a high tariff to enable the manufacturer to pay higher wages to the laborer. Now, the Senator says, as I understand him, that that question is regulated by demand and supply; that a high tariff has nothing to do with it; that is to say, so far as the regulation and raising and reducing of wages is concerned. I may be mistaken, but I say that the entire argument in the past has been that we want a high tariff, that we want high taxation, in order to protect American labor against the pauper labor of Europe, solely and simply to enable the manufacturer to increase the price of American labor. That is what I have understood to be the argument.

Mr. TELLER. I can not say what the Senator from South Carolina understands and what he does not. Nobody I ever knew of has asserted that the manufacturers of this country because of a tariff would add, unless they were compelled to do so by their interests, a single cent to the wages of labor. I never heard it suggested that they would do it as a matter of charity. What we have asserted from time to time and what has been asserted on this floor by the men who sustain the protective system, including the great South Carolinian, John C. Calhoun, was that it was to make labor where there was not any, to give opportunity to men where no opportunity existed, not that the manufacturer became a philanthropist, not that he was to step out and do charity to labor, but that when he was enabled to manufacture large quantities of goods that had before been manufactured in a foreign country he was compelled to call upon the American people to do the labor, as the German people were compelled to call upon the men who had not worked in iron when they had command of the iron market of Germany and needed to make more iron than they had been producing.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I understand the Senator to say that he does not justify the importation of foreign labor to compete with American labor.

Mr. TELLER. That has nothing in the world to do with the question of free trade or with the question of protection, and the Senator had no right to come here and say a word upon that subject, representing the political party that he does, which has at all times insisted upon opening the door to foreign labor and which has derived the great benefit, politically speaking, that has been derived from a mass of ignorance and vice in this country.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not suppose, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, that the Senator from South Carolina has a right to express his opinion upon this floor at all, in the estimation of the Senator from Colorado. But, Mr. President, as long as I have a seat upon this floor I propose to exercise my right to express my opinions just as freely as I choose, and upon all questions and all subjects, the Senator from Colorado to the contrary notwithstanding. I have as perfect a right to express my opinion upon the labor question as the Senator from Colorado, and therefore I can not quite see the force of the observation which he made, that I had no right to express my opinion here, representing the party that I represented, which opened the door to this influx, when I put a very civil and, as I think, an entirely proper question to him, and asked him whether or not he justified the influx of pauper labor from Hungary, and Germany, and Canada, and other parts of the world, to come in competition with the American laborer, who, he says, is the essential object of consideration by the party which he represents.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from South Carolina desired to be extremely courteous and wanted to read me a lecture he should have read it in his own time and not in mine, or he should at least have waited until I consented that he might occupy the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. I understood the Senator to consent——

Mr. TELLER. I decline to yield to the Senator. The Senator knows very well, when I replied to him in that way, I had no reference to his personal expression of opinion on this floor. The Senator knew that it had no connection with him personally, that I spoke of him simply as a member of a great political party, and that I was not attempting in any wise, either directly or indirectly, to reflect upon him or to curtail his privileges in this body or anywhere else. He knew that very well, and he can not seek occasion to find fault with me because I replied to him as a member of a political party when he attempts to thrust into this debate that which is as foreign to it as it is possible to be.

The question of protection to American industries has nothing to do with the question of the admission of foreigners, one way or the other; and if it was connected with it the Senator from South Carolina, I repeat, representing the political party he does, would have no right to arraign any man on this side of the Chamber, because that political party from the very day that it had organization and political existence has stood always for the admission of all classes of people, without any reference to their character or the country from which they come, as long as they come here with the ability to assimilate themselves with our own people and become a part and parcel of the people of the United States.

I do not hesitate to say that in that sentiment I have always been in sympathy with them. I have yet but little of that feeling which is growing up so rapidly in these days, and which we have condemned on other occasions as an un-American spirit, which declares that only those should come here who are rich and strong and great. The question whether men come here from abroad or not, I repeat, does not have anything to do with this question. The point that we were touching upon, and on which I read the little slip which I said had come from the German minister, was to prove that a tariff created a demand for labor, and I trust the Senator from South Carolina can appreciate what I mean by that.

If the great bulk of articles consumed in this country is manufactured abroad, does not everybody know that there is a reduction correspondingly in the demand for American labor? I spoke one day here of the great mass of manufactured goods brought to this country, that have averaged for more than ten years $238,000,000 a year of the coarser manufactures, of the class of manufactures that we are manufacturing now, where we have the plants, where we have the skilled men to manufacture, where skill is required. I am not speaking of the finer articles, but of the coarser articles of production we have imported $238,000,000 a year for ten consecutive years. How much labor would the production of these goods have furnished to American mechanics, and American manufacturers, and American wool-growers, and American laborers generally can easily be determined when you divide that sum by what is a fair compensation for labor, for in almost every instance it represents labor and nothing else.

I do not pretend, Mr. President, I never have pretended, that we could legislate labor up, but I simply contend that when you have made an opening for labor you have increased the demand for labor, and the increased demand is followed always by an increased price, and the greater the demand is in proportion to the number of men to be employed so the price always is.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, I do not quite understand the argument of the Senator from Colorado, that the introduction of the cheapest or most worthless of the foreign population that comes to this country has no influence upon the subject of the wages of labor. I do not understand how it is that he says the advocates of a protective tariff regard that as a question foreign to the issue before the Senate. His argument all through has been that the prime object of protection, the great object, was to increase the wages of American laborers.

The Senator says, and other Senators say, that the increase of consumption and the increase of production cause increased employment. But if there is a foreign population sending goods here they say they are made by pauper labor. If instead of the goods the men are brought here, taking the place of the labor here at cheap rates, as we know to be the case, is not that affecting the rates of wages? Is not that affecting the profits of labor? We know that there are companies in this country who have been and are perhaps to-day sending abroad to obtain cheap labor to take the place of American labor; and still the cry is that protection means the increase of the wages of American labor.

There is another phase of this question that occurred to me while the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Massachusetts were discussing this matter. When we talk about the increase of the wages of American labor, what do we mean? Is it the increase of the wages of labor all over this country, and of all classes of labor, or is it the increase of some particular class of labor that is meant? Which is it? If it is the increase of a particular class or classes of labor at the expense of others, we all understand that that is unjust discrimination, and wrong. If it is intended by this position to assume that it increases the value of all labor, let us see how that tallies with the doctrine of home markets, which came up in that same discussion.

It is insisted that to encourage by protection domestic manufactures is to increase the labor of the country and to give a home market for the products of the country. I have had occasion before to state in reference to the subject of home markets that we already have more money and more machinery invested in manufacturing establishments than can be successfully run, the result of which is that those establishments frequently have to shut down for a time and turn their laborers out to beg, to steal, or to starve. That comes from the great bounties which have been offered upon these particular classes of industries at the expense of other people, stimulating investments beyond the natural demands of the country; and because under our high protective tariff we have made our manufactured products cost so much that we can not go into the markets of the world and find markets out of our own country for them. Our market being substantially limited to our own country, the investments in manufacturing establishments caused by the bounties offered having gone beyond the demands of the country, we have disorganized our system of industries, and we have produced evils that can not be corrected until we abandon it.

Further, let us see whether protection benefits——

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. REAGAN. I will yield to the Senator in a few moments. I would be glad to complete the suggestion I have to make now.

Mr. HISCOCK. Very well.

Mr. REAGAN. In relation to the home market and to the encouragement of labor all over the country, we have seen that even under the circumstances which I have mentioned, with an overinvestment of capital in the manufactures of this country, during the last year in the exports from this to foreign countries, amounting to a little over $700,000,000, there were five hundred and thirty-three million and odd thousand dollars of agricultural products.

Seventy-five per cent. of all our exports were of agricultural products, and yet that agriculture, as I had occasion to suggest once before here, is hardly regarded as one of the American industries. It is regarded as the field of plunder from which all others are to be enriched. It gets no protection. I do not care if there is said to be a nominal protection on things that can not be competed with in this country, I say it gets no protection, as was displayed here on the subject of cotton-ties. The tax is increased over 100 per cent. on an agricultural product that furnishes the largest portion of our foreign products of any single agricultural product. We have according to the census of 1880 nearly 8,000,000 laboring people—I do not mean population—we have of the 17,000,000 people in this country engaged in gainful occupations, nearly 8,000,000 engaged exclusively in agriculture.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him, in connection with his very interesting statement that agriculture is plundered for other occupations, how it happens that during the last twenty-five years, ever since this high protective policy has been in force, while there has been an immigration from Europe into this country, into the manufacturing States, there is a much larger immigration constantly going on into the agricultural regions and a large emigration constantly going on from the manufacturing regions to the agricultural? How does he explain that, if the fact he states is true?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not know whether that can be explained or not. I am not sure that the hypothesis is correct. A very large proportion of the foreign immigration that has come into this country has stopped in the Senator's own State and a much larger proportion in the States of New York and Pennsylvania. It may be that the cheapness of lands in the West has drawn people to them. I think that probably it is natural that a larger portion of that immigration should have gone to the cheap lands of the West, where they could have a chance to obtain homes, which they could not do in the East, where the lands are dearer and are occupied.

Mr. HOAR. The fact is notorious. I have not the census figures now, but I have seen them, and I am justified in stating as the result of official information that from the great manufacturing States and centers an enormous emigration is constantly going on into the agricultural regions, and they are filling up, and that although the manufacturing States grow, the proportion of growth is very largely against them as compared with the agricultural States. Look at Kansas——

Mr. REAGAN. I do not suppose it is the purpose of the Senator——

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me one sentence; take the most purely agricultural States in this country, take the two, Iowa and Kansas. There is nothing there to disturb the natural flow of the emigrant. Labor is honored and honorable. There are no traditions there of a state of things when labor was not honored and honorable. There is no remnant of that. The current goes in freely. Now, how does the Senator explain the fact that Kansas and Iowa are receiving from the manufacturing communities of the East this enormous stream of their best blood if the fact he states be true?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not suppose it was the purpose of the Senator to try to break the force of the argument I was making, but I do not see the relevancy of the question he has put to me to the point I was trying to present to the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. BLAIR. I was going to make a suggestion which might be a reply to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. What I wished to say to the Senator was this: The Senator said that the agriculture of this country was the victim of the rapacity of the rest of the country; that it bore all the burden and was the subject of robbery. He did not use the term "robbery" at this particular time, but something equivalent to it. I asked him if the fact which I called his attention to is not inconsistent with the correctness of the very thing he was saying. That is the relevancy of it.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not see how that can be, and I do not care to go into that now. It is not the subject I was discussing.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. REAGAN. If Senators are determined not to permit me to make a statement, if they think it is injuring them, of course I shall yield.

Mr. HOAR. I beg the Senator's pardon; I wished to give him a fact.

Mr. BLAIR. I did not wish to interrupt the Senator, but to ask him if from his standpoint he could not well suggest in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts that Iowa and Kansas are two very strongly prohibitory States; that they have opposed and prohibited the liquor traffic in both of those States by constitutional enactments as well as by rigid statutory laws which they have enforced. I ask the Senator if on the common ground which he and I occupy in reference to that great reform this suggestion may not be an ample reply to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. REAGAN. Doubtless the temperance and industry of those people have invited other people to participate in their good fortunes. But I do not care to take up that line of argument at present.

I was trying, Mr. President, to meet the suggestion that protective tariffs were for the benefit of the labor of this country, and I was trying to demonstrate by official statistics that the great body of the laborers of this country not only derived no benefit from this legislation, but were the victims of the plunder which was to be given to other vocations. When we see that there is no protection to agriculture, that a majority of the people of this country engaged in gainful occupations are engaged exclusively in agriculture, that 75 per cent. of the exports of this country are purely agricultural products, and that these people are to be taxed from 30 to 100 per cent. on all they buy for the benefit of those engaged in other vocations, it seems to me that it is very clear such legislation is not for the general benefit of labor, but for the benefit of the capital engaged in particular vocations, and is not for the labor engaged in them.

I agree most thoroughly with the statement made by the Senator from South Carolina that the rate of duty imposed on imports has no relation to or connection with the rate of wages. It is true that it may furnish additional employment where there are manufacturing establishments, but it is not true that it increases wages. I before stated, and I repeat, that wages are controlled by other considerations. If there is a demand for labor greater than the supply the rates of wages will be higher. If there is more labor than the market demands, the rates of wages will be lower. If the country is in a condition of prosperity, wages will be higher. If it is in a condition of financial depression, wages will be lower. If the circulating money of the country is abundant, wages will be higher. If there is too limited a circulation of money, wages will be lower.

These are the character of the considerations which influence the price of labor; but that the tariff does not increase wages generally, and that it does not equalize wages, is proven by every Senator's knowledge of the different rates of wages in the various parts of the country now prevailing and at all times prevailing; for instance, between New York and Illinois; between Massachusetts and Iowa; between Ohio and Georgia. You will find in the different cities and different places men engaged in the same vocation receiving different rates of wages. This is illustrated by our labor reports in the fullest manner.

So, if the effect of tariff legislation was to increase wages, it ought to be to equalize them, if it is just, for if it increases a class at the expense of others it is unjust. We see that it does not equalize wages; and from what I have stated I maintain that it does not increase wages, but it places a burden upon somebody, for when money is to be paid it is to be paid by somebody, and for the benefit of somebody else. Who pays it? Those who purchase the article of the protected classes. Who receives it? In the first place, the Government receives the gross amount of duties directly paid on the imports, but the domestic manufacturer increases the price of his product to correspond to the increased price of the imported product caused by the addition of the tariff to its ordinary price.

This being so, let us look further. There were of taxed imports that came into the United States during the last fiscal year four hundred and odd million dollars. By the census of 1880 it is shown that the amount of manufactured products in the United States for the year for which that census was made amounted to five billion three hundred and odd million dollars. If we take off two billions of that amount as corresponding to what would be upon the free-list of imports—and that would be a larger amount than corresponds with the free-list of imports—we still have over $3,000,000,000 of manufactured products corresponding to the taxed imports, upon which the price may be increased to the consumer just what the tariff increases the price to the foreign manufacturer. When we do that, any one who will take the pains to calculate will find that in addition to the two hundred and odd million dollars which are paid into the Treasury, the gross revenues arising from imports, we pay about $600,000,000 into the treasuries of the manfacturing companies, which comes from the labor and mainly from the agriculture of this country.

I mention this to show the injustice, the inhumanity of a system of legislation which will take $600,000,000 a year beyond the needs of the Government from the toiling millions of this country and transfer it to the treasuries of the few or many manufacturing establishments, as the case may be.

This legislation which is urged here in the name of labor is depriving a majority of the laboring men of this country of the fruits of their labor, taking from them what they honestly earn, without price, without consideration, and transferring it to men who never earned it. This is the effect of this class of legislation. It not only does not benefit American labor in the aggregate, it does not give increased wages, but it reduces them in the aggregate, and besides that it is a system which it is impossible in logic, in morals, or in reason to defend.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. President, I suppose it is not the first time in his history that the Senator from Texas has indulged in invective of the same character as that of to-day against political systems in which he did not believe and against opponents to a political policy that he believed in; and the nation has been endangered, and our institutions would perish, and we would all go down in wreck unless his peculiar notions obtained! He has had the courage of his convictions. Such denunciation has been indulged in for fifty years and more, and yet the country has survived it, and it will survive it long after the Senator from Texas has retired from this body. Yes, it will survive it until the chances are that, like the great West, when the roll-call is made here in this Chamber we shall find from the Southwest States that those who represent them were born in New York, New England, Pennsylvania, and other Northern States. The tide of empire from the Northeast will take its way to the Southwest, and carrying with it the political principles, the political doctrines of the Northeast, we shall see a higher degree of prosperity there than was pictured by the colleague of the Senator from Texas the other day.

I do not know that it is worth while to become excited over this talk about robbery and robbers and men who take the money from one man's pocket illegally and dishonorably and put it into another's. In political methods and social life, in all that constitutes civilization, we challenge a comparison with those States that hold the peculiar doctrines of the Senator from Texas.

We have been told of late that the war was to go on, we do not know how long. They have had a meeting in Boston, Mass., and I think substantially made Cleveland a candidate for some time in the future. We have been told by Senators upon the other side that a great question was not disposed of by one defeat; that they were organized for a future victory; and it has been coupled with these denunciations of the men who believe for their political faith in these doctrines. At the same time there comes to us that which I mentioned earlier to-day, the notice served on the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] that they did not follow in his footsteps or accept his leadership, and half the Democratic press of the North to-day is in revolt against your doctrine and in support of the men whom you denounce as robbers and this policy which you denounce as robbery.

I desire to call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to a fact or two which seems to be invited by a remark that he made, and it is equally pertinent in connection with a remark made by the Senator from Texas. I agree that a tariff does not equalize labor all over the country, but I maintain that it does advance labor, because it furnishes more employment for it. That is the reason. I desire in this connection to call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to a fact or two. I will take the State of New York, and I will take the wages of farm laborers. In 1888 it was $16.30 a month. I will take the State of South Carolina. It was $8 a month.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator be good enough to allow me to ask him a question in that connection?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. What does that $16.30 include?

Mr. HISCOCK. Board.

Mr. BUTLER. What else?

Mr. HISCOCK. It does not include the man's clothing. It includes his board.

Mr. BUTLER. Does it include his quarters and fuel, and all that?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly, the whole thing; everything except his clothing; and in the same conditions in South Carolina it was $8. In North Carolina it was $9. In Georgia it was $8.81. In Louisiana it was $11. In Texas it was $12. In Arkansas it was $12.50. In Massachusetts it was $18. In Rhode Island it was $17. In Ohio it was $15. In Kentucky it was $11 and a little over.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, let me ask the Senator a question right there.

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Are the tariff laws of this Government uniform all over the country?

Mr. HISCOCK. I believe this, sir——

Mr. BUTLER. Well, just answer my question.

Mr. HISCOCK. I shall answer the question.

Mr. BUTLER. Are they uniform all over the country?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. Then will the Senator explain why it is that the wages of farm laborers are less in South Carolina than they are in New York?

Mr. HISCOCK. I shall proceed to do that.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator explain why they are less in New York than in Massachusetts?

Mr. HISCOCK. You will find that the value of the labor of the farm laborer bears a direct proportion to the manufacturing in the State.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, no.

Mr. HISCOCK. Ah, sir, I am right, and it has been ciphered out absolutely.

Mr. EUSTIS. What statistics does the Senator read from?

Mr. HISCOCK. I am taking the statistics of the Bureau of Agriculture of this year.

Mr. EUSTIS. I desire to state that as far as the price of labor in Louisiana is concerned those statistics are ridiculous.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have no doubt that the gentleman at the head of the Bureau of Agriculture, Mr. Colman is his name, is an accomplished man, and has tried to furnish honest statistics. As is suggested to me by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], do you question the facts as stated?

Mr. EUSTIS. I do as to the amount paid in Louisiana.

Mr. REAGAN. I question the correctness of the statement as to Texas. I have been carrying on a farm for twenty years there, and hiring every year, and I have paid from $12 to $18 all the time.

Mr. HISCOCK. Twelve dollars is the average in the Senator's State.

Mr. REAGAN. As a question of actual experience, I can say that the statement is not correct.

Mr. HISCOCK. Strange as it may seem, I, too, am a farmer, and I can say that in my State he has given about what is right and correct.

Mr. VEST. May I ask the Senator if he quotes from the same report of the Bureau of Agriculture which says that in the State of New York "three-tenths of the farms are mortgaged, and that one in twenty of the farm proprietors is hopelessly in debt?"

Mr. HISCOCK. Possibly.

Mr. VEST. I have got that right before me.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not know where that statement is.

Mr. VEST. It is in the report of the Department of Agriculture for 1886.

Mr. HISCOCK. I may as well reply to that now as at any other time. I say that a great deal of the land in New York is mortgaged. It is a common thing for a young man to buy the farm perhaps that his father owned before him and give the mortgages that are to pay off the distributive shares to his brothers and sisters and make it his home. It is cheaper, allowing the interest upon a mortgage, than to hire a farm perhaps, and estates are subdivided in that way. That practice exists very largely all over the State of New York. If the Senator will go to that State, though, and traverse it from one end to the other and look at the thrift that is presented on all sides, he will be satisfied with the prosperity of the State.

Mr. BUTLER. If it will not disturb the Senator, I wish to ask him one additional question. Is it not a fact that the manufacturing industries of New England have practically destroyed the agricultural interests of those States? I should like to be informed on that subject.

Mr. HISCOCK. The manufacturing industries of New England and New York have practically destroyed the agricultural industry in those States as the Senator understands it. A higher agriculture has been developed; truck farming, all that is more valuable of the products of the earth, instead of hay and corn and wheat, as used to be produced. Sheep are fattened, stock are stall-fed, and all that for the near market for the butter and for the milk. Away up 300 miles in the interior of New York the milk trains gather up the milk and cream and take it on to the city. Agriculture has changed entirely.

Mr. BUTLER. In that connection it would not be improper for me, I am sure, to ask the Senator whether the agricultural products of New England (and I include New York, although I have not reference to that especially) support the population?

Mr. HISCOCK. I suppose not, and I want to say to the Senator——

Mr. DAWES. It is demonstrated in Massachusetts by statistics that the farms of Massachusetts are more valuable now than they were twenty years ago. We export the farm products of Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to have some information on that subject, because——

Mr. DAWES. So far as Massachusetts is concerned, the suggestion of the Senator is not true by any means. In no respect has the value of the farms of Massachusetts or their products decreased. They have undergone the change suggested by the Senator from New York, and in the remote hill towns farthest from these markets that have been built up the value of the farms has diminished, but everywhere else they have so increased that the aggregate of farm values is very much larger than before.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not making this inquiry for any invidious comparisons, but for information.

Mr. DAWES. I understand that.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it not true that under the system of industries in New England a good deal of land has been turned out to waste?

Mr. DAWES. I am speaking of Massachusetts, and what is true of Massachusetts I have no reason to doubt is true of all the other New England States. The change has taken place which was suggested by the Senator from New York, but the result is highly beneficial.

Mr. BUTLER. My information was that agriculture was being damaged very largely for the benefit of manufactures.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. President, I think I will continue my remarks.

Mr. HOAR. I wish the Senator to allow me to make a statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say that the county in which I live, which is the heart of the manufacture of New England and is the largest county certainly in Massachusetts, is the fifth agricultural county in this country.

Mr. HISCOCK. As I said earlier—and I invite especially the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to this—I do not claim that a protective tariff equalizes the price of labor all over that country which comes within its jurisdiction. What I claim is that wherever the protected industries are planted, there the value of farm labor is advanced. The place of domicile is strong upon every man, and men South will not rush away to the North for higher employment so as to reduce the balance which is devoted to agriculture, so as to raise the value of agricultural labor in that locality. The South is their home. They have lived there, they and their fathers before them, for generations, and when you have the area too large the equalization does not extend over it all. After you recede a certain distance you are outside of the limits of the effect of it; but wherever you have planted these industries and diversified agriculture and diversified labor, the man who is interested in agriculture and enjoys laboring in agriculture can devote himself to that, the man whose brain would be busy with mechanics can devote himself to that, giving to each brain and to each arm its proper employment, not forcing them all into one industry. The effect is to elevate all and to increase the price of labor to all, and you can mark the increase in the value of farm labor by the amount of manufacturing done in these States respectively. It bears a direct relation to it.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. The State of New York is, I believe, one of the largest manufacturing States. It has about the largest manufacturing interest of any State in the Union, as it is geographically one of the largest States. I understood the Senator to say a few minutes ago that there were mortgages upon the farms of New York, put there by young men.

Mr. HISCOCK. There is no doubt of it. I said that, and I have no doubt, too, by old men.

Mr. VEST. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the statistics which he commends so highly, and which state as follows——

Mr. HISCOCK. On what page does the Senator read?

Mr. VEST. I quote from page 418 of the Agricultural Report for 1886, published in 1887.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have it here.

Mr. VEST. I read from pages 418 and 419. The statistics were not prepared by Commissioner Colman, but by his assistant, who is a protectionist and a member of the Republican party, and who, if I had had my way, would not have remained there as long as he has done, I will add parenthetically. He says:

> The result of the investigation in New York shows that three-tenths of the farms are mortgaged, and that one in twenty of the farm proprietors is hopelessly in debt, if the estimate, which is based upon extensive information, is reliable.

Again he says:

> There are a large number of farms, which were purchased a few years ago and mortgaged, which now would not sell for more than the face of the mortgages, owing to the depreciation of the farming lands, which on an average is fully 33 per cent. in ten years. Probably one-third of the farms in the State would not sell for more than the cost of the buildings and other improvements, owing to this shrinkage.

Mr. HISCOCK. I thank the Senator for that. That is doubtless the statement made by the Commissioner of Agriculture. It is in the larger type. I call the Senator's attention to what the State agent says right below it:

> In the best sections of the State the farmers are making money or holding their own, and are less in debt than ten years ago; while in the more unproductive parts, and those more easily affected by drought, there has been a considerable increase, so that, on the whole, farmers are more in debt than they were ten years ago, but the average indebtedness is not heavy. There are a large number of farms, which were purchased a few years ago and mortgaged, which now would not sell for more than the face of the mortgages, owing to the depreciation of the farming lands, which on an average is fully 33 per cent. in ten years.

Mr. VEST. That is from the State agent.

Mr. HISCOCK. That is from the State agent. That is an opinion by him. It is entirely unlike the other. There is no sort of doubt about this. I state for the benefit of the Senator from Missouri that the fact is true that at the close of the war, or I will say at the point of time when we resumed specie payments in this country, the value fixed upon land was in the inflated currency of the country, and with our return to the gold standard that inflated value has been wiped out, as it has all over the country. The effect has been a depreciation beyond any sort of question of the value of the real estate in that State nominally. It is recovering from that, and has been for the last four or five years. We can all understand that condition of things. Many of these farms were probably purchased by men when gold was at 50 or 100 premium, and the land was 50 or 100 per cent. higher in that inflated currency than it is to-day under gold values. That explains all that. I have no doubt that will be found to be equally true in all of the older States.

As I said, if Senators will trace it through they will find that the increase in the rate of wages paid in the manufacturing States above what it is in the Carolinas and in Texas is in direct proportion to the increase of manufacturing in those States above what it is in the Carolinas and in Texas and Arkansas.

Mr. BUTLER. Does not the Senator think there is another factor or element entering into that? Does he not think that the price of farm wages in South Carolina, for instance, is due very largely to the fact that there is so much farm labor in that part of the country?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. The supply is in excess of the demand.

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, sir; I do think so.

Mr. BUTLER. Then it is not attributable to the fact that manufactures have been established or are being established, because the Senator will allow me just one moment to state as a matter of information——

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Manufactures have increased immensely in my State in the last ten years. I think the next census will show an increase in cotton manufacturing that will surprise even the Senator from New York, and I am rejoiced at it. I have no hostility to manufactures; I have none to New England or to New York; but my deliberate judgment and opinion is that the effect of this high stimulation, if I may use the expression, of manufactures in this country, which has been going on under the high protective tariff, will result just as the Senator from Texas has stated.

Mr. HISCOCK. I want to say to the Senator from South Carolina right here that in 1879 the price of farm labor in South Carolina was $6.66 with board.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Per month?

Mr. HISCOCK. Per month. In 1888 it was $8.

Mr. BUTLER. In South Carolina?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes; and I have no sort of doubt whatever but that the increase is in direct proportion to the increase in manufactures.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the Senator from New York be better to me than I was to him, and let me interrupt him?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish only to say that if the conditions can be changed, and the States of South Carolina, Texas, and the other Southern and Southwestern States could receive as much advantage from the Eastern States as they are receiving from the States I have mentioned, the condition of prosperity would be changed between the two sections, and he would not have occasion to speak of the advantages of protection.

Mr. HISCOCK. I believe most emphatically if the same political system had been acted on in the Senator's State that prevails in mine, and if the people of his State had had faith that the system would be maintained, if they had not clung to their old system, if they had been in favor of the diversification of labor, Texas to-day, with her natural resources, would be far in advance of the State of New York. It is my opinion that the gravest mistake is made by gentlemen on the other side whose States have natural resources far beyond the mountainous States and the rock-bound States of the East and of the Northeast in this country. If they had but adopted the same policy, and had not continually pushed away capital and enterprise, they would have been in advance of us. That I certainly believe.

Mr. REAGAN. The difficulty with us, if the Senator will permit me, is that we begin of course as new States after others have age and accumulation and comfort.

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, you begin as new States——

Mr. REAGAN. If the Senator will allow me, the system which prevails transfers the net earnings of the country, and more than the net earnings of the country, year by year, from those States to the State the Senator represents and to some other States engaged in manufactures, and we never can get up because we never can accumulate the capital.

Mr. HISCOCK. They begin as new States, but no newer than Kansas and Nebraska, and I might almost say than Iowa. However, the emigrants to those States carried with them their political faith. They welcomed industries, they sympathized with them, and the result has been that those States outstripped others, and will continue to outstrip them in progress until your States adopt the same policy they have adopted and let capital feel that it is sympathized with, and let the labor of your States feel that it is respected, tolerated even, and has the same right that the labor of the North has. Do this and you will surpass the North in the race of prosperity and obtain a larger degree of wealth than is possessed by us to-day.

But, as I started to say when interrupted upon this subject, I indorse all that the Senator from South Carolina has said in respect to their having a surplus of agricultural labor there. I repeat that home is dear to everybody, and it is not the case that your people will leave your States and your communities to go to the manufacturing industries, so as to reduce the volume of farm labor to the point that will increase the price. Manufacturing industries must be carried to them. So the man who has been fitted to toil in the shop goes to the shop and toils, and there at home among you the volume of agricultural laborers will decrease; and then the value of the labor of the agriculturist will be increased. Why, do you know that the facts of the case—I can not believe it is true—demonstrate that it is your purpose to constantly depreciate the value of agricultural labor; that that is your line of policy now as much as it ever was. I believe I could establish upon the evidence before even a South Carolina or a Texas jury that you are wedded to this old agricultural system, this cotton and rice and sugar raising system; that you want the cheapest kind of labor with which to prosecute those industries; that you are fighting against any system which elevates labor and increases the price of labor.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not, of course, a juryman of South Carolina, and I suppose my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] will not claim to be a juryman from Texas; but I should be very glad to hear the Senator prove the statement he has just made.

Mr. HISCOCK. I say I can not believe you are so misguided as to adopt any such ruinous policy as that; but in the face of the facts I have stated, that labor appreciates as you diversify the uses in which it is employed, and that you refuse to invite new industries to settle among you by giving them the protection they demand, what are we to conclude?

Mr. BUTLER. Why, Mr. President, the Senator is certainly very wide of the mark if he states that anybody in my part of the country has refused to protect the infant industries there, for we have exempted all manufacturing establishments from taxation for ten years, and it seems to me we have done everything that a reasonable people can do under our condition to invite manufacturers.

If the Senator will pardon me one moment further in reply to what he stated, I will say that I have been preaching and almost praying and begging and urging the people of my country to diversify not only their mechanical industries but their agriculture. I will also say to the Senator that that is going on in a very satisfactory way at the present time, and instead of our attempting to depreciate labor, every reasonable effort has been made to elevate it and to encourage it in every way that we can possibly do without doing injustice to somebody else, and I think the Senator will be content after the next census upon that subject.

Mr. HISCOCK. There is eternally in it "without doing injustice to anybody else;" that is eternally what is urged, and that is that these industries flourish and are prosperous, the most intelligent that you can find in the country anywhere. There is no complaint on the part of the poor, for we have none, and there is no complaint on the part of those who labor by manual labor for their support.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator has the advantage of us, because we have a great many poor people.

Mr. HISCOCK. We have very few.

Mr. BUTLER. We have a great many, I am sorry to say.

Mr. HISCOCK. I say in my State there is no man or woman who by industry and temperance may not support himself or herself and accumulate a surplus and educate the children and fit them to fill and adorn the stations occupied by him or her.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, we have such, I am sorry to say.

Mr. HISCOCK. I make that assertion broadly, and I have no doubt I shall be indorsed in it by the Senators from Massachusetts, and from every New England State.

Mr. BUTLER. I am very sorry to say that we have a great many poor people, but I think I may make this statement in answer to the statement made by the Senator from New York, that we have fewer paupers than they. I think the statistics will show it.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is not unlikely that in our great cities, in which vice and crime congregate, we exceed you in pauperism and in crime where the foreign countries unload upon us their vicious; that very likely is true; but I am speaking for another class. I am speaking for the people of the country.

Mr. BUTLER. The paupers are part of the people.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not believe that the Senator from South Carolina is in favor of degrading, or lowering we will say, the price of labor, and yet it seems to me that it is absolutely patent that such is and must ever continue to be the result of the policy that he and those associated with him are pursuing and have been pursuing for the last ten years. I believe these Southern States have wrought themselves irreparable mischief during the last ten years in keeping unsettled constantly this question of protection, agitating the country, making capital to feel that is was unsafe to invest in manufacturing enterprises, so that it has held back from your States. We have enough and more than enough of it in the North at a low rate of interest seeking investment everywhere. Capital is easily alarmed, and the constant agitation that has come from your section over this question has affrighted it and it is held back from investment in your States.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not quite content to sit quietly and permit that statement to go uncontradicted. I have not the figures before me, but I have read them lately, of the amount of capital invested in enterprises south of the Ohio and Potomac Rivers, which would indicate that capital was not very much frightened by the agitation of this or any other question.

Mr. HISCOCK. Capital has to some extent, and a large extent, been invested there, I know.

Mr. BUTLER. And I will say to the Senator that it seems to me quite fast enough for all practical purposes.

Mr. HISCOCK. It has followed the great Appalachian chain that severs your territory largely.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. HISCOCK. I say that it has followed that in the main; not entirely.

Mr. BUTLER. I will state to the Senator, for his information and that of other Senators who feel any interest in the subject, that within the last five years a cotton factory has been projected or built in almost every county in my State.

Mr. HISCOCK. I congratulate the Senator and his State.

Mr. BUTLER. And in almost every town. I would state to the Senator, furthermore, that quite a number of foundries have been erected in that State, and there is very little iron there, and capital is being invested in many enterprises. So the Senator is mistaken in saying that capital has been frightened. Capital has not been frightened.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am not mistaken. Many times I have been in consultation and heard it. It is affrighted there. It has been affrighted in the North.

Mr. BUTLER. And yet within the last year there have been 2,000 miles of railway built in that very section of country which the Senator says is driving capital away.

Mr. HISCOCK. Perhaps I may be too strong in my language in saying that it drives capital away, but I have known instances of that kind, in large volume, too. Perhaps it would be more correct for me to say that it has prevented large amounts of capital from seeking investment there.

Mr. BUTLER. Then will the Senator explain why it is that New Jersey is getting along so well, having voted at the last election on the line which he has just been denouncing, and so Connecticut is getting on happily and prosperously, and his own State of New York, which went against his views at the last election. Is capital affrighted in those States?

Mr. HISCOCK. I say to the Senator that this time both capital and labor combined in sturdy resistance against this policy of yours in New York, Connecticut, and New Jersey, and in New York we were successful.

Mr. BUTLER. Why, Mr. President, will the Senator allow me——

Mr. HISCOCK. I will say to you, further, that, in view of the large number of Democrats in the State of New York who joined with us, we have a right to believe at least that we can carry on the resistance successfully in the future.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask, as a matter of information, if New York did not vote for Governor Hill by about 20,000 plurality?

Mr. HISCOCK. It did. Wherever rum, rum, rum was the banner Democracy was successful.

Mr. BUTLER. "Rum!" Did "Romanism" have anything to do with it, or "rebellion?"

Mr. HISCOCK. Hill upon the open sale of whisky carried the State. Harrison under the banner of protection carried the State.

Mr. BUTLER. Did not Governor Hill indorse the Mills bill?

Mr. HISCOCK. Well, Governor Hill is to have no voice in this tariff-making. He is to confine himself to legislation on the question of license or no license, high license or low license.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask another question? I ask if the Chicago Republican convention did not indorse free whisky?

Mr. HISCOCK. It did not. There was in the Chicago platform a plank of this kind, that before we would submit to the destruction of the industries of the country——

Mr. BUTLER. You would take free whisky.

Mr. HISCOCK. We would abolish the internal-revenue tax upon whisky. That is precisely what we said.

Mr. FRYE. And the Temperance party said the same.

Mr. HISCOCK. And I ask if the Senator from South Carolina is not quite ready to vote to repeal the internal-revenue tax on whisky, whether protection goes or stays?

Mr. BUTLER. I did not catch the question.

Mr. HISCOCK. I inquired of the Senator from South Carolina how he stood on the question of taking the tax off distilled spirits, without any reference to the question of protection whatever

Mr. BUTLER. What would be my position on that subject?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. I would retain the tax on whisky.

Mr. HISCOCK. You would maintain the present revenue tax upon whisky?

Mr. BUTLER. I think so.

Mr. HISCOCK. Unchanged and unbroken. You do not indorse the Mills bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I think it is a pretty fair bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. But do you stand on the Mills bill?

Mr. BUTLER. I am for the Mills bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly; I supposed so.

Mr. BUTLER. And the Mills bill does not propose to take the tax off whisky.

Mr. HISCOCK. The Mills bill carries in it those provisions which practically allow the free distillation of whisky in this country, and the very moment those provisions become law the effect will be to break down the internal-revenue system with reference to whisky and compel the repeal of the internal-revenue system.

Mr. BUTLER. When the Senator from New York has to resort to such a labored argument to establish a fact it ought to be taken with a great many grains of allowance. I do not understand the Mills bill to favor free whisky by any means. It takes the tax off tobacco.

Mr. HISCOCK. I commend to the Senator from South Carolina the criticisms on that feature of the Mills bill contained in the majority report of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUTLER. I will do myself then the honor to instruct myself; but I thought I had done so.

Mr. HISCOCK. It will be well.

Mr. BUTLER. I thought I had done so, but the Senator from New York may be wrong and I may be right. If I am wrong, certainly a very large number of the people of this country are wrong.

Mr. HISCOCK. Very likely they are. I think that is true. I agree with the Senator that there are a great many people wrong on this question, and it is a constant surprise to me that such is the case, and I confess it is a constant surprise to me to hear so much of error so openly proclaimed on that side of the Chamber.

Now, as illustrating the question of the effect of home manufacturing industries upon agricultural labor, let us take the two States of Ohio and Kentucky. A river, I believe, divides them, and there is a marked difference in the value of agricultural labor in the two States.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator allow me just one moment on that line to refer to some statistics upon the agricultural products of different States?

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not wish to yield for a speech. Of course I will always yield to a question.

Mr. BUTLER. It is strictly in reply to the line of argument the Senator is pursuing.

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly, then, I yield.

Mr. BUTLER. I made some inquiries awhile ago about the agricultural products of New England and the Senators from Massachusetts notably rather berated me because I questioned whether there were sufficient food products raised in New England to support the population. I find by reference to some figures, that in the State of Connecticut, for instance, there were 58,140 acres in corn, and 1,997,000 bushels were raised, valued at $1,324,590. Of wheat there were 2,171 acres producing 37,000 bushels, valued at $36,630. Then I come to Massachusetts——

Mr. HISCOCK. What State is that?

Mr. BUTLER. I have just given Connecticut. Massachusetts had in corn 59,997 acres, producing 2,124,000 bushels, valued at $1,486,800. It had in wheat 1,080 acres, which produced 16,000 bushels, valued at $16,000.

Then I come to my own State. I do not know what the population will be under the next census, but Massachusetts certainly outstripped her very largely in the last. I find South Carolina had 1,501,322 acres of corn, and she made 15,013,000 bushels, valued at $9,308,000. She had 192,637 acres in wheat, and she raised 1,233,000 bushels, valued at $1,220,670.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator state the area of Massachusetts and South Carolina in square miles?

Mr. BUTLER. I can not state exactly the area, but South Carolina is larger than Massachusetts, of course.

Mr. HOAR. How many times?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know how many times. South Carolina has about 30,000 square miles.

Mr. HOAR. And we have about 8,000.

Mr. BUTLER. More than three times as large. Then I find Maine, which I believe is larger than South Carolina, had 32,165 acres in corn and made 1,132,000 bushels, valued at $769,760. She had in wheat 39,460 acres, and made 481,000 bushels, valued at $505,050. I find that Rhode Island had in corn 12,946 acres, producing 414,000 bushels, valued at $289,800, and I find wheat blank. She did not produce a seed according to these statistics. I might carry out the comparison in Vermont and New Hampshire and the other agricultural States. I see the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] is interesting himself in this. I find that New Hampshire had 38,578 acres in corn, that she made 1,323,000 bushels, valued at $912,870; in wheat she had 10,485 acres, which produced 110,000 bushels, valued at $114,400.

I merely state this as a result of the immense progress made by agriculture in those States.

Mr. HISCOCK. In which States?

Mr. BUTLER. In those which I have just mentioned.

Mr. HISCOCK. Which ones do you mean?

Mr. BUTLER. The New England States especially.

Mr. CHACE. What is the farm land worth?

Mr. BUTLER. I should be very glad indeed to be informed what it is worth.

Mr. HISCOCK. Allow me to say to the Senator that, as I understand the statistics, they are introduced for the purpose of showing the impoverished condition of agriculture in these New England States.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir; that was one of the objects.

Mr. HISCOCK. That was precisely what the Senator intended to do. Now, I want to say to him in reference to agriculture in those States as well as in large sections of New York, we have not the advantages that you have South in reference to agriculture. We have not the rich alluvial soil that you have, and we depend upon a higher degree of cultivation and a more expensive cultivation. We produce milk, we produce meat, we produce fruit, we produce chickens, we produce eggs, we produce these agricultural products of a higher value, garden vegetables; we have truck gardens depending on the near village or city for a market, which is far more profitable than the raising of wheat or corn. We raise potatoes, early potatoes, onions, and all that.

Mr. BUTLER. Perhaps the Senator from New York may be able to answer the question the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] asked as to the value of farm lands. I should like to know.

Mr. CHACE. If the Senator from New York will allow me, I have a statement here prepared by the Agricultural Department. The value of the land in South Carolina is $5.10 per acre.

Mr. BUTLER. A good deal less than that, some of it.

Mr. CHACE. The value of land in Rhode Island is $50.37 an acre.

Mr. BUTLER. Farm land?

Mr. CHACE. Farm land; agricultural land.

Mr. BUTLER. What is it in Connecticut?

Mr. HAWLEY. About $49.

Mr. CHACE. In Connecticut it is $49.34, I believe.

Mr. HISCOCK. That settles the question and that tests it, and if your people want to be prosperous——

Mr. BUTLER. We are getting along reasonably well.

Mr. HISCOCK. You can do still better.

Mr. BUTLER. We are getting along pretty well, but we get lectures every now and then as to how we ought to behave ourselves.

Mr. HISCOCK. What you ought to do is what has been done in the North. The farmers there all recognize the fact that it is no longer profitable for them to raise grain in many localities, and they depend upon the sale of their products in the cities and manufacturing towns that are near them, and agriculture has been diversified; and what you want in the South is the diversification of your industries.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely. I agree with the Senator in that.

Mr. HISCOCK. What you want is to build up a home market.

Mr. BUTLER. I agree with the Senator in that.

Mr. HISCOCK. What you want is to discard forever the idea that cotton is to be your only product.

Mr. BUTLER. I agree with the Senator in that.

Mr. HISCOCK. You want to manufacture your cotton; you do not want to send it across the ocean to be manufactured there and bear the expense of transporting it. You want to manufacture it at home and raise around about you in the villages where it is manufactured the farm products that are necessary for the support and maintenance of the operatives.

Mr. BUTLER. I agree fully with the Senator in that.

Mr. HISCOCK. And the way to accomplish it is to preserve the market of 65,000,000 people inviolate to the working men and women of America.

Mr. BUTLER. I agree fully with the Senator. We do not disagree at all upon these general propositions.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suggest this question to the Senator: Supposing that South Carolina had a population that her agricultural resources were unequal to feed, what then would be the effect upon the agriculture of that State? It would be lifted to the same plane that it occupies in Massachusetts and in New York.

Mr. BUTLER. I am sorry to say that it is very largely true now, and I will go as far as the Senator from New York or anybody else to get them out of that.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the Senator say that the agricultural resources of his State are unequal to the support of the population of the State?

Mr. BUTLER. I say that we import a good many articles in the way of food products, and I am sorry to say it.

Mr. HISCOCK. You import a great many things. That has always been the peculiarity of your State and section; you confine yourselves to one line of agriculture without diversifying it. As I have been told, although I do not know that it is true, the cotton-planter has been accustomed to plant cotton and to look to another market for the meat with which to feed his employés and the bread with which to feed them and the clothing which they are to wear.

Mr. BUTLER. That has been unfortunately true.

Mr. HISCOCK. Very well. We want to change it.

Mr. BUTLER. So do I.

Mr. HISCOCK. And the difference between the Senator and myself is that I see only one way to change it, and that is to preserve all this heritage to the labor of the country. As is suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], I see one way in which to change it, and you see no way in which to change it.

Mr. BUTLER. I think I do see a way.

Mr. HISCOCK. I say to the Senator from South Carolina that we have had a policy in the North since this Government was established, and we have clung to it, and we can see the beneficent effects of that policy among our people. Let him sit at our feet and learn from us or follow our lead upon this great question, and I assure him that prosperity will come to his State if he will do it.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator will allow me. He says that I have no method for improving these conditions. I beg leave to differ with him. He says that he has and that I have none; that I can make no suggestion. If the Senator will pardon me for giving him my remedy for some of the evils of which he speaks—and I admit there are a great many in the South; there is no doubt about that—the State of my benevolent and venerable friend, the Senator from Illinois, who sits in front of me [Mr. CULLOM], supplies a good many people in my State with something to eat, and I should be afraid, if we got to be independent of them in that respect, his people might suffer. But if the Senator from New York will permit me to suggest a remedy for many of the evils to which he has just alluded, I would say that the most direct route to prosperity in that country is to reduce taxation and stop imposing unnecessary burdens upon the people who have to labor for their daily bread. I think that would be the solution of the difficulty. The Senator thinks that the solution of it is to increase taxation and pile it up higher, to make the people's expenses greater, and make the expenses of the laboring man and of all who consume greater, and in that way increase their prosperity! There I draw the line.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. President, we have heard this constantly urged, "reduce taxation." Gentlemen talk of robbery, of taking from the pocket of one man to put into the pocket of another. I can dismiss that by saying that it is the highest compliment to the intelligence of the people that that sort of declamation ceases to-day to have any effect whatever on the public mind. No man believes it in my part of the country. It awakens a laugh on the hustings, I suppose, in the gentleman's State. Wherever this question is discussed the idea that this is a matter of taxation has been discarded by everybody. One talks about taxation and another talks about the increase of price. Life is too short, at least the day is too short, to go into a refutation of these pretenses.

There is but one other suggestion that I have to make, and that is in reference to the oft-repeated declaration which is made, that the tariff does not increase the price of wages. I think I have heard the Senators from South Carolina—I am not sure—make that same statement, when the fact must be conceded if what they say is true, that if it advances the price of the product, with the competition there is in this country, it must advance the price of labor. That follows as a sequence. It logically flows from it, because trusts and combinations are the exception. The labor cost in the main is what advances the price or cost of goods in this country above what it is abroad; and therefore when you strike down protection you do and must of necessity lower the price of labor, and in my part of the country, in my State, labor is willing to receive the difference that I pointed to in wages between what is paid in the State of South Carolina and what is paid in the State of New York, and stand this onerous tax that the Senators complain of.

Mr. BUTLER. The labor is willing to receive it, but does labor always get it? That is the point.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not think that the Senator from South Carolina is one of those who believe in this accumulation of wealth in the hands or in the coffers of the manufacturers of the country. I grant that there are exceptional men who have piled up immense fortunes in manufacturing, as some have in railroading, as men have in speculations of different kinds.

Mr. BUTLER. Then why are there a million laborers out of employment in this country? I believe that is the last estimate.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not know that there are any such number.

Mr. BUTLER. That is the statement.

Mr. HISCOCK. But certainly the Senator from South Carolina does not believe, and he will not go upon the record as believing, that the capital invested to-day in the manufacturing industries of the country receives a higher rate of interest than is paid for money invested upon farm land, mortgage security.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not quite catch that remark.

Mr. HISCOCK. I say I do not believe that the Senator from South Carolina will go upon the record with the claim that capital to-day invested in manufacturing receives a higher rate of interest than money invested upon farm land, mortgage security.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, I will.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then I say to the Senator that he is entirely mistaken, and that he may go to friends and foes, in respect to politics, engaged in manufacturing industries, and he will find, taking them as a whole, that he is entirely mistaken.

Mr. BUTLER. I of course am not prepared to make a statement as to any part of the world except my own State; but I will say to the Senator that certain lines of manufacturing in my part of the world are paying anywhere from 8 to 22 per cent. dividends annually, and I do not object to that. I have no hostility to manufactures; I am glad to see them prosper. But what I do object to is that it should be claimed that all this protection is for the benefit of labor and that the manufacturer gets a very small percentage on his investment. I know the contrary is true.

Mr. HISCOCK. We do not claim that capital invested in manufactures receives any less than it ought to have; but will the Senator stand here and deliberately assert that capital receives more than its due proportion of interest, in the face of the immense amount of capital that is constantly leaving the Northern and Eastern States and seeking investment in bonds and mortgages in the Western States, the vast amount of money that is deposited in our savings-banks at 3 and 4 per cent.? Will he tell me that he believes exceptional high rates of interest or dividends are paid upon capital invested in manufacturing when there is this immense volume of capital earning this low rate of interest?

Mr. BUTLER. That sustains the statement of my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] awhile ago, that the investment of capital in our manufacturing industries is overdone; there is too much of it, and it does not require any protection. There is too much money in manufactures now, according to the Senator's own statement, and it is going to seek investment elsewhere.

Mr. HISCOCK. What there is in reference to manufacturers is this: They want stable laws that are not to be changed or to be threatened every year, so that they may know what to depend upon, what their markets are to be, and the result will be, if you will give us this condition of things, that the earnings of capital in whatever it is invested and wherever it is invested will be equalized all over the United States.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, it is singular, it seems to me, that both sides of the Chamber should have discussed this important matter all the afternoon and failed to strike upon the real secret at the bottom of all this difficulty between the South and the North. The labor of the South is cheap because it is ignorant labor. Make it intelligent and it will get what it is worth. As long as it can be kept as it is, it will work for 33 to 50 per cent. of what is paid for the same sort of service in the Northern States. That is the secret of the whole difficulty. My friend from New York might have suggested that in connection with his protective-tariff theories.

Now, Mr. President, I will put in a few statistics, inasmuch as this seems to be a debate from which statistics as a rule are excluded. I have here a document in which extracts are made from the official records of the Government and as reliable as the census. The late Commissioner of Education has prepared a statement, from which I read this extract:

I must not pause to elaborate these points, but supposing (1) that the labor of an illiterate is increased in value 25 per cent. by teaching him to read and write, 50 per cent. by fairly educating him, and 75 per cent. by giving him a thorough training; and (2) that the average value of the labor of illiterates is the same as the average wages paid employés in manufactories, then the following computations give sound conclusions:

By the census of 1880 the number of persons of twenty-one years and upward in the Southern States who were unable to write was 2,984,387. If 75 per cent. of them should be taught to read and write, it would increase the value of the labor of 2,238,290 persons 25 per cent. The present value of their labor is, approximately, $248 a year each. The increase of value would be $62 a year per capita, a total of $138,773,980. If 15 per cent. of the illiterates should be fairly educated, it would increase the value of the labor of 447,658 persons 50 per cent., or from $248 to $372 a year each. The total of this annual increase would be $55,509,592. If the remaining 10 per cent. of illiterates should have the value of their labor increased 75 per cent. by being thoroughly trained, the industrial value of 298,439 persons would be raised from $248 to $434 a year each, a total of $55,509,654. By adding the three totals just given, it is seen that the increase which would come to the industrial value of illiterates in the Southern States would be, were they educated as indicated, $241,727,220 a year.

And then he makes an estimate for the whole country, were the illiterates educated, which gives an increase of the production of the country in value of $488,757,022 a year, which would be the increased value of the production of this country if the same laborers were educated who now perform this work. There is much more of this matter which it would be profitable to examine. I read further from the same source:

A regular computation may be made for the entire country. The average annual wages paid by manufacturers is $345. The number of persons twenty-one and over unable to write is 4,204,262. By teaching 75 per cent. of these to read and write the labor of 3,153,272 individuals is increased in value from $345 to $431 a year, a total gain of $271,181,392 each year. The gain which would come from educating 15 per cent. (630,654) of the illiterates so that their labor would be increased 50 per cent. in value would be $108,787,815. The same amount would be gained by so training the remaining 10 per cent. of illiterates that their labor would be of 75 per cent. more value; and the total annual profit to the country by the conversion of illiterate into educated labor would be, according to the premises assumed as a basis of computation, $488,757,022 a year.

Need I go further to indicate that education is a most profitable investment for both labor and capital? * * *

Omitting any reference to the influence of illiteracy during minority, or any bearing of the illiteracy of the female adults, the late census shows us that there is a great army of 1,870,216 adult males or voters who can not write, an army nearly double that ever in the field during the late deplorable civil war. You will certainly excuse me from any delineation of the horrors of the devastation that might follow their united and concentrated efforts against the peace and order of society.

I simply call your attention to what may be the injurious effect of their silent action at the polls. The members of our respective political parties believe in the rightness of their principles and seek to make their appeal to the reason and consciences of the people; but the figures disclose the alarming fact that in eleven States these illiterate voters outnumbered the votes cast in the last Presidential election by either of the political parties. Thus, should they unite under any strong, impassioned, successful leader, they would have absolute control of legislation and offices in those States, and of the election of twenty-two members of the United States Senate.

I turn now to the address of Col. Dexter A. Hawkins, of New York City, who is a prominent lawyer and publicist, as undoubtedly members of the Senate are aware. His address was upon the relations of education to wealth and morality, pauperism and crime. I read only the most pertinent extracts, and would refer any one interisted to the entire address:

In 1870 the Commissioner of Education at Washington sent out a series of carefully drawn, comprehensive, and searching questions to the great centers of labor in all parts of the United States. These centers were so selected as to represent every kind of labor, from the rudest and simplest up to the most skilled. The object of the questions was to determine the relative productiveness of literate and illiterate labor. I have tabulated, reduced, and generalized the answers so as to get at what seems to me to be the average result over the whole country. This investigation—one of the most interesting ever made—brought clearly to light the following facts:

1. That an average free common-school education, such as is provided in all the States where the free common school has become a permanent institution, adds 50 per cent. to the productive power of the laborer considered as a mere productive machine.

2. That the average academical education adds 100 per cent.

3. That the average collegiate or university education adds from 200 to 300 per cent. to his average annual productive capacity, to say nothing of the vast increase to his manliness—to his godlikeness.

By the census of 1880 we had in the United States 4,204,362 illiterate adults—white and colored.

Now, putting their labor at the minimum annual value of $100 each (which is far below the average even for farm labor, while the wages of manufacturing operatives, including 15 per cent. of women and children, as shown by the census of 1880, average in the whole country $345 each per year), and the annual loss to these persons from the lack of at least a common-school education would be $50 each. This, for the whole number of 4,240,362, is $210,000,000 per year—a sum twice as large as the entire annual expenditure for public education in the whole country. This sum—$210,000,000—is a clear annual loss, not only to these illiterates, but to the community, by reason of their illiteracy.

The late slave States complain of their inability to pay the expenses of free common schools, and they raised for public education in 1880 only $10,883,104. The amount of the annual loss in these same States, from their labor being illiterate, is at least $150,000,000. The extra productiveness of their laborers over what it is now would—had they been educated, as in Maine and New Hampshire—establish and support free common schools nine months in the year for every child of the school age within their borders, and leave a surplus sufficient to support a free academy in every county and a free college in every State.

A supposition of that kind is very well, but it must be remembered that an existing state of things, where it is the status of human beings, can not be changed but by long and expensive processes, and that to change the actual condition in these Southern States to the degree of literacy which exists in the ones referred to must necessarily be the work of ten or fifteen or twenty years.

A careful examination of the census of England, Scotland, Ireland, and of the several countries on the continent of Europe indicates that, other things being equal, pauperism is in the inverse ratio of the education of the mass of the people; that is, as education increases pauperism decreases, and as education decreases pauperism increases.

In the Grand Duchy of Baden they put into operation in 1854 a rigorous system of universal compulsory education in the elementary branches. The effect in seven years upon pauperism was to reduce it 25 per cent. It has been calculated by statisticians and students of social science that 96 per cent. of pauperism could be exterminated by universal compulsory education in the elementary branches of knowledge and industry.

In Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois, three great central States, where self-support is not difficult, one in ten of the illiterates is a pauper, while of the rest of the population only one in three hundred is a pauper. In other words, in those three great central States a given number of children suffered to grow up in ignorance produce thirty times as many paupers as when given an average common-school education.

In 1870 a special investigation was made, in fifteen States, of the inmates, to the number of 7,398, of almshouses and infirmaries. Of these, 4,327, or nearly 59 per cent., could not read and write; while in those fifteen States the average percentage of illiterates was only 6 per cent. of the whole population. From this 6 per cent. came that 59 per cent. of the paupers; or, to express it in another form, a given number of children in those fifteen States, suffered to grow up in ignorance, produced twenty-two times as many paupers as the same number of children would if given a fair common-school education.

Similar results may be obtained from the census of almost every country in Europe or America.

We may safely say, then, that it is a general law of modern civilization that an illiterate person is from twenty to thirty times as liable to become a pauper and a charge upon the public as is one with an average common-school education; and that the annual loss to the community, in the United States, in the productive power of the illiterates, and in the support of paupers made such by illiteracy, is nearly, if not quite, equal to the amount that would be required to establish and maintain a free common school the year round in every State in the Union, amply sufficient for the whole fifteen millions of the children of the school age in the United States.

The annual expenses of maintaining paupers—96 per cent. of whom have become such through lack of proper training while young—is at least ten times as great as would have been the expense to the public of securing an education while young to each of these paupers sufficient to have enabled 96 per cent. of them to support themselves instead of being a charge upon the public.

Education leads naturally to industry, sobriety, and economy; hence it makes one conscious of the benefits resulting from these habits.

Statistics proclaim in no uncertain voice that education is the surest preventive of pauperism; and that the expense of providing and applying in season this preventive would not be one-tenth that now brought upon society by pauperism.

The first incentive to action is self-support—gaining a livelihood. This is the very basis of personal independence of individual character, respectability, and influence. The key to self-support is education. Money and labor, invested in education, are capital invested in such a manner that the principal is absolutely safe, and the income large, sure, and promptly paid. The States should see to it that a reasonable investment of this kind is made in and for every child as it grows up.

In France, in 1868, one-half of the inhabitants could not read nor write. From this half came 95 per cent. of the persons arrested for crime. From the other, the educated half, came only 5 per cent. In other words, a given number of children, suffered to grow up illiterate, produced nineteen times as many persons arrested for crime as the same number would if educated, at least to the extent of the elementary branches.

In the Grand Duchy of Baden, from 1854 to 1861—seven years—the government, by a rigorous system of universal compulsory elementary education, reduced the number of prisoners actually arrested 51 per cent., and the number of crimes committed 54 per cent.

In the six New England States, in 1870, 7 per cent. only of the inhabitants above ten years of age were unable to read and write; and yet this 7 per cent. produced 80 per cent. of the criminals. Or, in other words, a given number of children in New England at that time suffered to grow up illiterate produced fifty-three times as many criminals as the same number would if educated to the extent of the curriculum of the public schools. This fact is a complete vindication of the moral effect of the New England system of public education, Cardinal Antonelli to the contrary notwithstanding.

In the State of New York, in 1880, the illiterates produced eight times their pro rata proportion of the criminals in that State; that is, a given number of children brought up illiterate on the average produced eight times as many criminals as the same children would have produced if educated to the extent of the curriculum of the public schools.

In the city of New York, in 1870, among the illiterates, one crime was committed for every three persons; while among the literates there was only one crime to every twenty-seven persons. Or, in other words, the ignorant cla s in that city furnishes nine times the criminals they would if educated in the public schools.

In the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in 1870, the illiterates, according to their numbers, committed seven times as many crimes as the literate class.

In Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois, taken together, the illiterates committed ten times as many crimes, according to their numbers, as the literate class.

Take the whole of the United States together, according to the census of 1870, the illiterates committed ten times their pro rata proportion of crime.

In Pennsylvania, in the years 1879 and 1880, one-thirtieth of the population above ten years of age could neither read nor write, and this one-thirtieth committed one-sixth part of the crimes, or nearly six times its proper proportion. But if we class with the illiterates the criminals who could barely read and write, but who had no education beyond bare reading and writing, it will then appear that the one-thirtieth of the population of Pennsylvania that is illiterate commits one-third of the crime, or more than fourteen times its legitimate proportion.

A careful examination of the statistics of twenty States shows the following average results:

First. That one-sixth of all the crime in the country is committed by persons wholly illiterate.

Second. That one-third of the crime in the country is committed by persons wholly or substantially illiterate.

Third. That the proportion of criminals among the illiterate class is, on the average, ten times as great as it is among those who have been instructed in the elements of a common-school education or beyond.

Fourth. That the expense imposed upon society to protect itself against a few thousand criminals, most of whom were made such through the neglect of society to take care of their education when young, is one of the heaviest of the public burdens. In the city of New York it is 50 per cent. more than the whole cost of the public schools.

In that city the annual appropriation for police, criminal courts, reformatories, jails, and penitentiaries is over five millions of dollars; while that for the training of the 385,000 school children in the city is only $3,500,000.

The average attendance at the schools in 1880 was 138,329. The "compulsory school age"—that is, the age within which all children are required by law in the State of New York to attend school—is eight to fourteen years. The number of children of this age in the city of New York in June, 1880, was 144,474; while the average attendance on the public schools of children of all ages from five to twenty-one in that year in the city was only 133,096. As a logical consequence of this neglect of education the city jails and almshouses are crammed and taxes are high.

The city, in its meager provision for education and its enormous taxation for criminals (to use an old but expressive adage), "saves at the spigot but loses at the bung."

What is true of the metropolis of the country is equally true of every city, town, village, and neighborhood.

These facts could be multiplied almost without limit.

The examination of the statistics of criminality and illiteracy in the census of any civilized state or country will give results substantially in harmony with the above.

Carlyle says that—

"If the devil were passing through my country and he applied to me for instruction on any truth or fact of this universe, I should wish to give it to him. He is less a devil knowing that three and three are six than if he didn't know it; a light spark, though of the faintest, is in this fact; if he knew facts enough, continuous light would dawn on him; he would (to his amazement) understand what this universe is, on what principles in conducts itself, and would cease to be a devil."

There is much more matter of this kind, but I have presented sufficient to suggest the real difficulty in regard to the difference in wages between the South and the North.

The statements which have been read to the Senate, these returns of the Agricultural Department, are rather flattering than otherwise to those States in the Southern portion of the country. I have made personal inquiry in several of them. Go into the State of Virginia, go into the State of Maryland close by where we are to-day, and inquire of the men who earn the wages, and they will state their wages lower than the amounts read from this book.

Inquire of men who are engaged in other occupations, those who are engaged in railroad occupations at the depots or stations along the lines, and wherever you find a railroad laborer you will find that his wages average but a very trifle more than 50, or at the most, 60 per cent. of what is paid for corresponding laborers who are employed on the railroads of the North. That has been the result of my personal inquiries in both sections of the country, and I believe that is the best way to find out how these things are.

Our statistics as published give us averages and do not show the amount of misery that exists to a very large extent throughout the country. Take the case in reference to schools. Here are whole counties in the Southern States that have no schools at all, and yet there are cities in the Southern States, like Atlanta, for instance, which have as good school systems, compared with others according to their population, as exist in any of the Northern States. Put the city of Atlanta and a county which has no school together, and you get an average of perhaps three and a half or four months' schooling in the year.

But the real difficulty as revealed by the naked facts is that here are certain children who are having just what they ought to have, and there are great numbers of other children who are getting nothing at all. Some are receiving a reasonable degree of food and sustenance for their intellectual natures and others are simply starving to death; and so these general averages that are spread before us do not call the attention of Congress or of the country to those things which demand actual remedy and legislation at our hands, and do not in any substantial sense indicate the necessity of action or the locality where that action may be most needed.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I understand, according to the Senator's own statement, that the statistics that he has just read are not worthy of consideration.

Mr. BLAIR. Oh, no. I say that they throw some light, but they do not throw that intensity of light upon these dark places that is necessary in order that we may realize the difficulties which exist. They are the best we have. What we get in the reports is an average. It is like taking the illumination of the country; it is an average of so much, and in a great many places there is no shining whatever, but a darkness that may be felt night and day and the year round. That is the point I wish to illustrate.

I wish to suggest one other thing: that here are two systems of labor in this country, cheap labor at the South and dearer labor at the North, and that the increased cost of production at the North is by reason of this difference in the cost of labor more than all other causes combined. The labor at the North is ninety-odd per cent.—from 90 to 96 per cent.—of the cost of everything that is produced and everything that is consumed. At the South the cost of the article there produced, as placed upon the Northern market, may be, and will be, made just as nearly as possible the cost of the Northern article as it can be made and at the same time command the market.

So it comes to pass that the laborer is paid from 33 to 50 per cent., and not more than that, in the State of South Carolina for his work in a manufacturing establishment, compared with what the same laborer would get in the North. That labor, thus cheap, enables the manufacturer, who controls the labor and who produces the article that is sold in the North in competition with the Northern product, to pocket from 8 to 22 per cent. of profits, and that is why manufacturing is so much more profitable at the South than it is at the North.

The Senator from South Carolina is quite misled when he judges the profits of the capital of the North by the returns which he finds, owing to this existing cheap labor, at the South, and now this competition between Southern and Northern production can be and will be conducted and become sharper and sharper until the laborer at the North will be obliged to take just what is paid to the laborer at the South, in order to retain the markets of the country.

So it is that the question of the general education of the masses of the people, the masses of the producing element of the South, is an absolutely indispensable condition to the continuance of the prosperity of the capital and labor of the North. The plants of the North are located where they are already engaged in manufactures. The farms and other occupations are there, and there they will stay; and so of the labor. That is there, and there is nowhere else on the face of the earth for it to go. If it goes to the South it meets and must compete with cheaper labor there.

It can not engage in any other occupation without breaking down the existing producing occupations of the North. But if you educate the illiterates of the South or the illiterates wherever they are found, they will demand corresponding prices for their labor, and thus they will effect a distribution to the masses of those who produce of these high profits which the manufacturers of the South are now taking to themselves.

I say there is no other protective system which can be applied to the great industrial system of the North in its competition with the developing industries of the South. This protection of the general education of the masses of the people, that is to say, of the laborers who are the producers of the South, is alike a benefit to them and the salvation indeed of the North.

There is no protective tariff that can exist as between the States; and the end in view can be secured only as you render the condition of the masses of the people homogeneous, so that labor, which is the great element of production and cost, shall be as much and the same in one section as the other, and give a corresponding purchasing power to the laborer in one section as in the other, so that an equality of civilization and of conditions can be established and wants can be satisfied; and when you do this you hold this great country together in peace.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I hope we can have a vote now on the pending amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I am sorry to interfere with the desire of the Senator from Iowa, who has been so patient, but I wish to put one or two statistics in the RECORD of to-day's debate, which will take two or three minutes only, in reply to what has been said by the Senator from South Carolina.

He has undertaken to claim that the value of the farm products of the North has diminished by the policy of the protective system there as compared with other States. Just one hundred years ago the entire wealth of the State of Massachusetts, personal and real, including Maine, was $11,000,000. The last statistics furnished by the statistician of the Department of Agriculture show that there were in Massachusetts alone, which has a little less than 8,000 square miles of territory, 3,359,000 acres, of the value of $146,197,000.

In South Carolina, under the Senator's system of cultivation, there are 13,457,000 acres of farming lands, being a little more than four times

Massachusetts in area, and the value of those farming lands is $68,677,000, or about one-third only of the value per acre of the farming lands in Massachusetts—in South Carolina $5.10 an acre, while in Massachusetts it is $43.32.

Mr. BUTLER. As the Senator has that statement I should be glad if he would state what the value of the farm products of the respective States is.

Mr. HOAR. I have not got that before me. It is here somewhere, but it would take more time to find it than I wish to impose on the patience of the Senate.

It is very obvious that the value per acre of $43 compared with $6 is occasioned by the amount of the value of the farm products wholly.

In regard to mortgages, I suppose that in every community, as is the case of every enterprising man, the existence of mortgages is a sign of life and health. The first thing I did myself after I got admitted to my profession and proposed to be married, was to buy a tract of land and give a mortgage on it, and every time I enlarged the tract of land of my dwelling I gave a mortgage on it. What would become of these Western States if the mortgage did not exist, if they could not get credit for the development, which is only possible for the settler in consequence of the use of his credit, which is his life and the breath of his nostrils? The thing to look at is not the amount of mortgages. It is the question of the credit of the borrower as indicated by the rate of interest.

It is very difficult in Massachusetts or in any New England State to get a real good 5 per cent. mortgage. I can borrow money to-day easily on real estate at from 4 to 4½ per cent. That is the generally prevailing rate. Our savings-banks, who do largely invest in real estate, make dividends of but 4 per cent.

Now, what is the condition of things under the Senator's policy? I will take for that the testimony of the Senator who sits in the very seat from which the Senator from South Carolina spoke, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]; and I desire merely to have read a single marked passage from his speech made in the Senate on the 13th of December, 1888.

I send it to the desk to be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

I wish in this connection to call attention to a fact, and that is the amount of mortgages that, as is stated, are upon the lands of the people of the Northwest. Before doing that, however, I desire to say that the capitalists in the Northern States while the carpet-baggers were in force in the South and had the authority over us, were afraid to invest their money upon mortgages in our Southern lands. The result is that there are not many mortgages held in the Northern States upon Southern lands. Nevertheless they are being mortgaged rapidly and at a terribly usurious rate of interest. Who are the mortgagees? The British people. The British capitalists are swarming the South with their money. You can not go to a considerable village in a Southern State to-day but you will find the authorized agents of British capital there loaning money to the people at from 12 to 25 per cent. per annum and taking mortgages for it.

Why are the agriculturists who produce three hundred and odd millions of money a year, and throw it into the exchanges of this country, so crippled and borne down that they are compelled to resort to the same plan that your agriculturists in the North were, to load their estates with mortgages at usurious rates of interest? The Northeastern people, from New York and the East mainly, own the mortgages upon the Northwest, but the British people own the mortgages upon us, and it is getting to be an evil of such dimensions as that the thoughtful men of the South are beginning to inquire whether, after awhile, the British people are not going to dispossess them of their homes, and introduce immigrants from their own country to take possession of these lands.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the fact that within six weeks the Democratic leader on that side of the Chamber from the South has declared in this very debate what is the result of this policy of trading with foreign countries and fostering but a single industry. He says that there is not a considerable village in the South in which there is not to be found a British money-lender lending money at the rate of from 12 to 25 per cent., and that the serious and thoughtful men of his country are anticipating with dread the occupation by British of the land of the Southern people. That is not my statement. It was a surprise to me when it was stated. It is the statement of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not see exactly what that has to do with what I was discussing.

Mr. HOAR. I think it has a great deal to do with what the Senator was discussing. The Senator undertook to make the point that the result in the Northern States, where this policy had its full, free, and legitimate effect, was that the lands of the people were becoming mortgaged.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not say that.

Mr. HOAR. And that the farm products were diminishing; that the farm products were insufficient to maintain the people.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not say a word about mortgages. The Senator has it all wrong. The statement I made was that the farm products were diminishing.

Mr. HOAR. I meant the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator must reply to the Senator from Missouri, then.

Mr. HOAR. I am replying to both Senators at once.

Mr. BUTLER. The point I made—if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him and put him right, because I do not suppose he wants to place me in a false attitude——

Mr. HOAR. I do not.

Mr. BUTLER. The point I made was that, as I believed, at least I had been informed, the result of this excessive development of manufacturing industries had largely impaired the agriculture of the country, and I asked the question, for information, whether or not the farm product of New England would feed its people. It was upon that point. That was the idea.

Mr. HOAR. A State two-thirds of whose lands are fit only to raise granite and ice, when its agricultural lands are multiplied alone in their value by eight to ten is in a condition of high prosperity, even if the result of the system which has brought that about has brought into that State a large additional population which its agriculture is insufficient to feed. The very fact that the Senator calls attention to is an instance of the result of the prosperity and of the success of this policy.

Mr. BUTLER. I will state the point I desired to make, if the Senator will allow me one moment. I did not elaborate it, of course, because I did not have the time and did not intend to do it; but I have always understood—and if I am wrong I shall be glad to be corrected—that one of the results of the diversification of manufacturing industries was to make the people independent of everybody else.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. That it made them self-reliant, and I merely called attention to the fact that in that particular they were not self-sustaining and independent.

Mr. HOAR. When we are speaking to the country, I do not suppose it is an answer to that proposition to point out that the cotton crop of Massachusetts does not supply the demand of Massachusetts, but that the cotton crop of the country supplies it.

Mr. BUTLER. I should think hardly anybody would be stupid enough to make that proposition.

Mr. HOAR. I understand. I am illustrating it by reducing to the reductio ad absurdum the Senator's proposition. The country becomes independent. It is stronger in peace, stronger in war, stronger in its capacity to supply its own wants and from its own resources, and the particular State shares the general prosperity, as is shown by the fact that in every department of labor the values of its property and the values of the products of that labor increase.

Massachusetts, which, including the large area of the present State of Maine, a hundred years ago was worth $11,000,000 only, now has a production of at least fifteen hundred millions. Under the development of the manufacturing system it has an annual production of at least fifteen hundred million dollars, nearly one hundred and fifty times its whole principal one hundred years ago. Its farms have an annual product of forty-six or forty-eight millions, and are worth $142,000,000. That is my proposition.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely. Now, if the Senator will permit me, carrying his logic to its necessary consequences, I understand the Senator and those who think with him to urge upon us, upon the rest of the United States, the remaining States of the Union, to have established in those States precisely the same condition of things that exists in New England. I merely mention New England by way of illustration, because I have nothing against New England, but to illustrate the point I desire to make. If it be true that the result of the diversification or development of the manufacturing industries of New England has been to deprive that whole section of its power to produce its own food products, and the same condition of things were established in all the other States, we have a right to assume that that same result would follow in those States.

Mr. HOAR. The other States have vastly increased their producing forces as compared with the South.

Mr. BUTLER. Take my own State, for instance. Suppose we had the same condition of things in South Carolina that you have in Massachusetts in regard to manufactures, and that the relative condition of the industries was the same of agriculture and of manufacturing, we should have to depend on somebody else for our food product, and therefore we should not be independent.

Mr. HOAR. That is the precise fallacy, the precise error, the precise wrong frame of mind in which, with all due respect, it seems to me, that Senator and his associates are found in supposing that each separate State is like a separate country. What we want is to make the United States independent. Now, if we can take the thirty-three or thirty-four million acres of South Carolina, which to-day furnish food perhaps for 700,000 or 800,000 people—not all that, as the Senator says—and plant 5,000,000 happy, prosperous, and contented people there, for 3,000,000 of whom that agriculture will find profitable prices to support itself, the fact that there are 2,000,000 of those who have to look to Dakota or California or Oregon or Texas or the great wheat regions which we hope will come into this country on our northern border makes it not the less a profitable and a prosperous thing to do.

Mr. BUTLER. Not at all.

Mr. HOAR. That is the answer to the whole argument.

Mr. BUTLER. I agree fully with the Senator. It would be a great deal better for us to do that.

Mr. HOAR. That is precisely what we are urging.

Mr. BUTLER. I think it would be a great deal better for us in South Carolina if we had diversified industries. There is no doubt about that. But if you carry the argument to its legitimate consequences, it would seem to me, if you take that section of country which has developed in the highest degree, you are bound to bring the same condition of things to exist all over the country.

Mr. HOAR. The whole point of the Senator's argument is, and nothing more, that while we have multiplied our food products and the value of our farming lands from $11,000,000 in value to over $146,000,000, because we have increased our manufacturing population in still larger proportion, that it is something by way of a failure, because when our population was entirely agricultural they fed themselves; and now they feed themselves, but do not quite make out to feed all the people who have come in there. I do not think that argument carries us very far.

I wish to make one other remark before I get through. I do not want to cite over and over again the statistics of wages which have been put in so often in this debate. I hold in my hand a very careful and accurate statement made by Dr. DAVIS, an eminent member of the other House, largely interested in manufacturing, and who has made a full personal examination of this matter as relates to the city of Fall River, where he dwells—and that was brought into discussion the other day—and he gives statistics, a table which I will have printed in my remarks without reading. He shows that the wages in Fall River are more than 50 per cent. higher than they were in 1860, when the Morrill tariff bill passed.

The table is as follows:

Average pay per week of—
Mule spinners	$11.00
Weavers	7.75
Carders (men)	7.50
Carders (women)	7.00
Slasher tenders	10.00
Children (ring spinning)	4.25

He states in his speech in the House that he can vouch for the accuracy of that statement on his personal knowledge and information. Then he gives the statistics of the dividends upon the manufacturing establishments in that city and the cotton manufactures in New England. Here is what he says:

Dividends paid by fifty-two corporations, having $53,182,000 capital stock, manufacturing cotton goods in Maine, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts, have averaged during fourteen years, 1874 to 1887, inclusive, 6.149 per cent. per annum.

Dividends paid by seventy-five corporations, having $70,681,000 capital stock, manufacturing cotton goods in Maine, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts, have averaged during six years, 1882 to 1887, inclusive, 5.952 per cent. per annum.

Mills in Fall River—

A great cotton center now in this country—

having a capital stock of $13,361,330, have paid annual dividends averaging during fourteen years, since 1873, 5.23 per cent.

So it is perfectly clear that, while the profits on manufacturing capital have been constantly going down till they have reached a point not equal to the ordinary interest paid upon money loaned over the largest portion of this country, there has been during that time a corresponding and a most marvelous rise in the value of farm lands, in the product of farm lands, in the amount of agricultural wages, and in the amount of wages paid to the workman.

The bill (S. 3762) granting a pension to Nancy Polock—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

WATER-RESERVE LANDS IN WISCONSIN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 3782) to amend an act entitled "An act declaring that certain water-reserve lands in the State of Wisconsin are and have been subject to the provisions of the act of Congress entitled 'An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States, approved March 3, 1875,'" approved September 10, 1888.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask unanimous consent that this Senate bill be taken up and passed. It is in the nature of an amendment to an act already passed by this Congress. It simply explains an error in that former act.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which there will be opportunity for objection to its consideration.

The bill was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that this bill be retained on the Speaker's table for the present.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that course will be taken. The Chair hears no objection.

USELESS PAPERS IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, January 11, 1889.

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (S. 2305) to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the Executive Departments, the Committee on Enrolled Bills be instructed to insert in lieu of the word "Senator," where it occurs in the eighth line, the word "Senators."

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, this resolution, which provides simply for the correction of an error, will be concurred in.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

JAMES TRABUE AND OTHERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5349) for the relief of James Trabue, Thornton Thatcher, Michael Callahan, and the widow of John Waters.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, the Senate amendment is simply the insertion of the name of the executor of James Trabue, and I ask that it be agreed to; also that the title of the bill as amended by the Senate be agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ROWLAND, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. MCCULLOGH, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. BROWER, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi, for two weeks, on account of important business.

REPRINT OF CERTAIN BILLS.

On motion of Mr. CRISP, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. 2851) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate interstate commerce," with the amendments agreed to by the House, was ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. GROSVENOR, by unanimous consent, 2,500 extra copies of the bill (H. R. 12134) to make and alter regulations as to the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress, were ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-SHIP AND FOG-SIGNAL, SANDY HOOK.

Mr. SPINOLA. Mr. Speaker, at the hour of adjournment on yesterday the House was considering the bill (H. R. 11683) for the establishment of a light-ship and fog-signal at Sandy Hook, New York Harbor. I ask that this bill be considered now, it being the unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. But the unfinished business does not come up at this time except by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPINOLA. I ask unanimous consent that it be taken up now and disposed of. It was before the House at the hour of adjournment last night, and if any gentleman desires to interpose an objection I hope he will permit me first to make a brief statement.

Mr. COX. Is this for the establishment of a light-ship at Sandy Hook?

Mr. SPINOLA. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. I do not think anybody will object to that.

Mr. SPRINGER. If this does not lead to debate——

Mr. MILLS. It is the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. But the unfinished business does not come up until after the hour for the call of committees and the hour for the consideration of bills.

Mr. SPINOLA. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be now considered.

The SPEAKER. This bill is not in the Committee of the Whole. The Journal and the RECORD do not at all agree in regard to the condition of the bill. The RECORD shows that the gentleman from New York asked unanimous consent to consider it, and pending that request the House adjourned. The Journal shows that the bill was taken up for consideration, the question being upon the third reading of the bill.

Mr. SPINOLA. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. BAYNE and Mr. KILGORE. What is the bill?

The SPEAKER. It is in relation to the establishment of a light-ship at Sandy Hook.

Mr. KILGORE. I think this bill has the right of way some time during the day anyhow, and we might as well proceed in the regular order.

Mr. SPINOLA. I hope the gentleman from Texas will reserve his objection until I can make a very brief statement, not exceeding one minute.

This bill at the last session of Congress passed both Houses unanimously. It has been reported unanimously by the committee this year. It failed to become a law at the last session because it reached the President too late for his signature. It was recommended by the Light-House Board and also by the Secretary of the Treasury in the following language:

> The vessel used for the relief of this important station is badly out of repair, and must practically be rebuilt. It is recommended that she be replaced by a first-class vessel, with all modern improvements, including a steam fog-signal, such as is placed on all important stations.

It is a matter absolutely necessary for the preservation of life and property, and solely in the interest of the commerce of the country. I trust the gentleman from Texas will allow it to be considered.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be established off Sandy Hook, entrance to New York Harbor, a new light-ship, with a steam fog-signal, the entire cost of which shall not exceed the sum of $60,000.

There being no objection, the bill was considered and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPINOLA moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIEUT. COL. E. E. EYRE.

Mr. FELTON. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3106) for the relief of Lieutenant-Colonel Eyre, and put it upon its passage.

Mr. SPRINGER. After one recognition on that side, as we have had one on this, I shall demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Lieut. Col. Edward E. Eyre, late lieutenant-colonel of the First California Cavalry, be released from all further liability on account of his receipts and disbursements of funds as acting quartermaster, and the proper officers of the United States Treasury are authorized and directed to cancel said liability, whether the same be pending in court or has become a judgment, and to close the accounts of said Col. Edward E. Eyre.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Reserving the right to object, I desire to know whether this bill has been considered by any committee of this House.

Mr. STEELE. It was considered by the committee at the last session.

Mr. FELTON. And it was unanimously reported by the committee. It involves but a small amount.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let the report be read subject to the right of objection.

Mr. FELTON. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. YODER) was read, as follows:

From an examination of the records of the War Department and from other reliable information we find the facts to be:

That Lieutenant-Colonel Eyre, while performing duty with his regiment at Las Cruces, N. Mex., on August 14, 1862, was ordered by his commanding officer, General James H. Carleton, to relieve Capt. T. Moore, assistant quartermaster U. S. Army, from duty, and to assume and perform the duties of said office, which, though under protest, he immediately did (with the understanding that on his arrival at Santa Fé, N. Mex., he should be relieved from duty as quartermaster), and received from said Capt. T. Moore, August 14, 1862, the sum of $16,705, and on August 16, 1862, the sum of $721.37, making a total of receipts of $17,426.37.

That on the march of General Carleton's command, consisting of the greater portions of the First and Second California Cavalry, from Las Cruces, N. Mex., to and into Texas, thence returning to Santa Fé, N. Mex., consuming forty-seven days' time, from August 14, 1862, to September 30, 1862, he had disbursed and expended in payment of employés and in purchase of forage and quartermaster's stores the sum of $8,668.91.

That on September 1, 1862, he turned over to Lieut. A. H. French, of the First California Volunteers, the sum of $200; on the 5th of September, 1862, to Col. J. R. West, of the First California Volunteers, the sum of $3,000; and in Santa Fé, on the 30th of September, 1862, to Lieut. B. C. Cutler, of the First California Volunteers, assistant quartermaster, the further sum of $10,557.48, together with his accounts and vouchers for the disbursement of the sum of $8,668.91, to the said quartermaster's clerk, one J. S. Barbey, which amount, together with his return of moneys, equaled the amount he had received while acting as quartermaster, or $17,426.37, and was then and there relieved from duty as quartermaster and resumed his duty as lieutenant-colonel First California Cavalry; that from that day, the 30th of September, 1862, until December, 1875, thirteen years afterwards, when he was notified by the Department, he was unaware that his accounts and vouchers had not been forwarded to the Department, and hence his account as quartermaster stood debited with the exact sum of his expenditures, to wit, $8,668.91.

That had he been notified within any reasonable time he could have availed of the law of June 23, 1870, made and provided for the settlement of such cases as his (whose existence was limited to two years), and have settled the said balance now standing to his debit.

We find that the character of Colonel Eyre for truth and veracity is not nor ever has been questioned; that he has been and is a man of means and high social standing, well known and universally respected; and believing that the deficiency, as represented in his accounts, was expended for the uses and benefits of the United States, we therefore recommend the passage of the bill as an act of justice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. From what I can hear of the reading of the report, this is a case where an officer is allowed to settle his accounts without any vouchers being shown. I do not see why this should be taken out of the regular course.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? The Chair did not hear whether the gentleman from Kentucky objected to the consideration of the bill or not.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not object to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Then the question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not object to the consideration of the bill. I think the bill ought to be considered.

Mr. SPRINGER. If it is to take up any time I shall demand the regular order.

Mr. FELTON. If the gentleman had heard the report read, I do not think there would be any objection. It takes no money from the Treasury.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand the regular order.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not object to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Kentucky does not object to the consideration of the bill, and that the gentleman from Illinois announces that if it be desired that the bill should be debated he would demand the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let it go over.

Mr. MCKENNA. I understand the Chair said that the question was on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did; but the gentleman from Kentucky demanded consideration of the bill.

Mr. MCKENNA. Is it not too late?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The Chair will endeavor to dispose of it one way or the other if there can be order.

Mr. SPRINGER. If this bill can be disposed of in five minutes I have no objection to its consideration; and if it can not be disposed of in five minutes I object to taking it up.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill for five minutes?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not agree to its consideration being confined to five minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I demand the regular order.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I think it is of sufficient importance to go over and receive consideration.

Mr. SPRINGER. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. DOUGHERTY, leave of absence was granted to Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] demands the regular order, which is the special order for this day.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call up the special order, S. 185, which the Clerk will read. I have been requested, before this order be taken up, to ask unanimous consent that gentlemen having reports from committees to file may be permitted to hand them to the Clerk.

Mr. MCKENNA. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not care. I do not desire it for myself.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the State of South Dakota is hereby declared to be a State of the United States of America, and is hereby admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever; and that the constitution which the people of South Dakota have formed for themselves be, and the same is hereby, accepted, ratified, and confirmed, subject, however, to the provisos hereinafter contained.

SEC. 2. That the following shall be the boundaries of the said State of South Dakota, to wit: Beginning at the point of intersection of the western boundary line of the State of Minnesota with the northern boundary line of the State of Iowa, and running thence northerly along the western boundary line of the State of Minnesota to its intersection with the seventh standard parallel, where in its easterly course it intersects said boundary line; thence west along the said seventh standard parallel to the easterly bank of the Missouri River at low-water mark; thence up the said Missouri River, along the easterly bank thereof at low-water mark, to the point of intersection with the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude; thence west along the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude to its intersection with the twenty-seventh meridian of longitude west from Washington; thence south on the twenty-seventh meridian of longitude west from Washington to its intersection with the northern boundary line of the State of Nebraska; thence easterly along the northern boundary line of the State of Nebraska to its intersection with the western boundary line of the State of Iowa; thence northerly along the western boundary line of the State of Iowa to its intersection with the northern boundary line of the State of Iowa; thence east along the northern boundary line of the State of Iowa to the place of beginning.

SEC. 3. That the said State of South Dakota shall have concurrent jurisdiction of the river Missouri and of every other river bordering on the said State of South Dakota, so far as the said rivers shall form a common boundary to the said State and any other State or States or Territory or Territories now or hereafter to be formed, said rivers to be common to both; and that the said river Missouri shall be a common highway, and forever free as well to the inhabitants of said State as all other citizens of the United States, without any tax, duty, impost, or toll imposed by said State of South Dakota therefor.

SEC. 4. That until the next census and apportionment shall be made the said State of South Dakota shall be entitled to two Representatives in the House of Representatives of the United States Congress.

SEC. 5. That to defray the expenses of the constitutional convention held by the people of said State, and of elections held therefor and thereunder, the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid to the treasurer of said State upon the requisition of the Legislature thereof, setting forth the items and particulars of such expenses so incurred.

SEC. 6. That sections 16 and 36 in every township of the public lands of the United States within said State, and where such sections, or any part thereof, shall be mineral lands, or shall have been sold or otherwise disposed of by the United States according to law, other lands equivalent thereto, in legal subdivisions of not less than one quarter-section, are hereby granted to the said State for the support of common schools; and such sections shall not be subject to pre-emption or entry, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, but shall be reserved for school purposes only.

SEC. 7. That thirty entire sections of the unappropriated public lands within said State, to be selected and located by direction of the Legislature thereof, with the approval of the President, shall be, and are hereby, granted, in legal subdivisions of not less than one quarter-section, to the said State for the purpose of erecting public buildings at the capital of said State for legislative and judicial purposes, in such manner as the Legislature shall prescribe. The lands may be selected out of the public lands within the boundaries of said State, whether surveyed or unsurveyed.

SEC. 8. That so much of seventy-two sections of land granted by the act of February 18, 1881, to the Territory of Dakota for the use of a university as lies within the said boundaries of the State of South Dakota is hereby granted and confirmed to said State for such purpose, and, in addition thereto, a sufficient number of sections to make a total of seventy-two. If any of the lands granted by said act of February 18, 1881, and lying within the boundaries of said State, have been sold under the provisions thereof, then the proceeds thereof shall go to said State in lieu of the land sold.

SEC. 9. That ninety sections of land, to be selected and located as provided in section 8 of this act, are hereby granted to said State for the use and support of an agricultural college in said State, and none of the lands granted by this act, or the proceeds thereof, shall be used for any other purpose than that for which the grant is specifically made whatever.

SEC. 10. That so much of the lands belonging to the United States as have been acquired and set apart for the purpose mentioned in "An act appropriating money for the erection of a penitentiary in the Territory of Dakota," approved March 2, 1881, together with the buildings thereon, be, and the same is hereby, granted, together with twenty sections more of the unappropriated public lands, to be selected as herein provided, to the State of South Dakota for the purpose aforesaid.

SEC. 11. That 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of sales of all public lands made by the United States within the limits of the said State, prior or subsequent to the passage of this act, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, be, and the same is hereby, granted to the said State of South Dakota for the support of public schools.

SEC. 12. That all mineral land shall be excepted from the grants provided for in this act.

SEC. 13. That immediately after the taking effect of this act the governor and the commissioner of school and public lands of said State shall proceed to ascertain the number of sections 16 and 36 within the limits of said State which are mineral lands, or which shall have been sold or otherwise disposed of by the United States according to law; and the said officers shall then proceed to select, from any unappropriated public lands in said State, a number of sections equal to such mineral lands and the lands so sold or disposed of; and said officers shall also, in addition thereto, select a number of sections equal in number to the total number of sections granted in this act for other than common-school purposes; and when such selections shall have thus been made said officers shall certify a list of the same to the Secretary of the Interior, and if the same shall be approved by him the title to the same shall vest in the said State of South Dakota.

SEC. 14. That all lands herein granted for common-school purposes shall be sold only at public sale, and at a price not less than $5 per acre, and in parcels not exceeding one quarter-section to any one person, the proceeds to constitute a permanent school fund, the interest of which only is to be expended in the support of common schools.

SEC. 15. That the State of South Dakota shall constitute one judicial district, which shall be called the district of South Dakota, and the circuit and district courts therefor shall be held at the capital of said State for the time being. The judge of said district shall receive a yearly salary of $5,000, payable in four equal installments, on the first days of January, April, July, and October of each year, and shall reside in his district. There shall be appointed clerks of said courts, who shall keep their offices at the capital of said State. There shall be appointed for said district one district judge, one United States attorney, and one United States marshal. The regular terms of said courts shall be held at the place aforesaid on the first Monday in April and the first Monday in November in each year. For judicial purposes the district of South Dakota shall be attached to the eighth judicial circuit, and only one grand jury and one petit jury shall be summoned in both of said courts.

SEC. 16. That the circuit and district courts for the district of South Dakota, and the judges thereof, respectively, shall possess the same powers and jurisdiction and perform the same duties possessed and required to be performed by the other circuit and district courts and judges of the United States, and shall be governed by the same laws and regulations.

SEC. 17. That the marshal, district attorney, and clerks of the circuit and district courts of the said district of South Dakota, and all other officers and other persons performing duty in the administration of justice therein, shall severally possess the powers and perform the duties lawfully possessed and required to be performed by similar officers in other districts of the United States, and shall, for the services they may perform, receive the fees and compensation allowed by law in the State of Nebraska to other similar officers and persons performing similar duties.

SEC. 18. That that portion of the Territory of Dakota not included within the boundaries of said State upon the admission of said State of South Dakota into the Union shall, until otherwise provided by act of Congress, continue as a Territory by the name of North Dakota; and all provisions of the acts of Congress and of the Legislative Assembly of said Territory of Dakota, not locally inapplicable, shall continue therein in full force and effect the same as though no portion of the Territory of Dakota had been admitted into the Union; and the governor, secretary, United States marshal, and district attorney of the present Territory of Dakota shall continue to hold and exercise their respective offices within and for said Territory of North Dakota; and the chief-justice and three of the associate justices, to be designated by the President, shall continue to hold and exercise their respective offices for and within said Territory of North Dakota; and temporarily, and until otherwise provided by the Legislative Assembly of said Territory of North Dakota, the governor, chief-justice, and secretary thereof may divide said Territory into judicial districts and assign the judges thereto, and into twenty council and fifty representative districts, and apportion the representation therein to which each district shall be entitled in the Legislative Assembly: Provided, however, That the act of Congress approved March 3, 1879, creating the fourth judicial district for the Territory of Dakota, shall not apply to the Territory of North Dakota.

SEC. 19. That all cases of appeal or writ of error heretofore prosecuted and now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States upon any record from the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota, or that may hereafter lawfully be prosecuted from said court, may be heard and determined by said Supreme Court of the United States; and the mandate of execution or of further proceedings shall be directed by the Supreme Court of the United States to the circuit or district court of the district of South Dakota, or to the supreme court of the State of South Dakota, or to the supreme court of the Territory of North Dakota, as the nature of the case may require; and each of said last-mentioned courts, respectively, shall be the successor of the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota as to all such cases, with full power to proceed with the same and to award mesne or final process therein; and that from all judgments and decrees of the supreme court of the Territory prior to the admission of said State the parties to such judgment shall have the same right to prosecute appeals and writs of error to the Supreme Court of the United States as they shall have had by law prior to the admission of said State into the Union.

SEC. 20. That in respect to all cases, proceedings, and matters pending in the supreme or district court of the Territory of Dakota at the time of the admission of said State into the Union, whereof the circuit or district courts by this act established might have had jurisdiction under the laws of the United States had such courts existed at the time of the commencement of such cases, the said circuit and district courts, respectively, shall be the successors of said supreme and district courts of said Territory; and in respect to all cases, proceedings, and matters arising within the limits of the Territory of North Dakota, the courts of North Dakota Territory shall be the successors of the courts of the Territory of Dakota; and all the files, records, indictments, and proceedings relating thereto shall be transferred to said circuit, district, and Territorial courts, respectively, and the same shall be proceeded with therein in due course of law: Provided, however, That in all civil actions, causes, and proceedings in which the United States is not a party, such transfers shall not be made except upon the written request of one of the parties to such action or proceeding filed in the proper court.

SEC. 21. That the Legislature provided for in said constitution shall have the power to provide, by an act to that effect, for the transfer of all actions, cases, proceedings, and matters pending in the supreme or district courts of the Territory of Dakota at the time of the admission of the said State of South Dakota into the Union, arising within that part of the said Territory of Dakota herein prescribed as the proposed new State, and not included within the provisions of the foregoing sections, to such courts as shall be established under the constitution of said State; and no indictment, action, or proceeding shall abate by reason of any change in the courts, but shall be proceeded with in the State courts according to the laws thereof.

SEC. 22. That the following division of the public debt of the former Territory of Dakota is made: All the public indebtedness thereof which has been incurred for the purpose of public institutions within the limits of the State of South Dakota shall be assumed and paid by the said State of South Dakota. The said State of South Dakota shall make immediate provision for the settlement of said indebtedness. All the remaining funded indebtedness of the former Territory of Dakota shall be and remain a debt of the Territory which by this act is organized out of the remaining portion of said former Territory. The Legislature of said Territory shall make immediate provision for the settlement of said indebtedness. One-half of the funds remaining in the treasury of the Territory of Dakota at the passage of this act, and of all receipts from taxes imposed by former Legislatures thereof, less the expense of collecting, and after the payment of any unfunded indebtedness that may be a charge against the same, shall be paid by the treasurer of said Territory to the treasurer of the State of South Dakota. All archives and records of the former Territory of Dakota now in the custody of the secretary or governor of said Territory shall be turned over by said officers to the governor or the secretary of the said State of South Dakota: Provided, That the State of South Dakota shall furnish to the Territory of North Dakota full and accurate copies of all such archives and records at the cost of said State of South Dakota.

SEC. 23. That until otherwise provided by act of the Legislative Assembly of said Territory of North Dakota, the city of Bismarck shall be the place of holding the sessions of the Legislative Assembly therein, which place shall be the capital of said Territory until changed by such Legislative Assembly; and the governor thereof shall also have power to designate temporarily, and until otherwise provided by the laws of said Territory of North Dakota, the places in the first, second, and third judicial districts whereat the district courts shall exercise the jurisdiction of district and circuit courts of the United States.

SEC. 24. That in accordance with the stipulations contained in section 5 article 13 of said constitution of said State of South Dakota, there is hereby apportioned to the State of South Dakota, and said State shall assume, be liable for, and pay, all the indebtedness of the Territory of Dakota incurred for public buildings of the Territory which are built and situated, or which are provided by law to be built, within the limits of said State; and the Territory of North Dakota shall assume and be liable for all the indebtedness of the Territory of Dakota incurred for public buildings of the Territory which are built and situated, or which are provided by law to be built, within the limits of said Territory of North Dakota.

SEC. 25. That there is hereby granted to the Territory of North Dakota so many sections of the unappropriated public lands lying within said Territory as will, with the other lands lying therein selected and set apart under the act of February 18, 1881, make the full amount of seventy-two sections, such additional sections to be selected and set apart under the provisions of said last-named act and for the use therein mentioned; and any other grants heretofore made by act of Congress to the Territory of Dakota, for any purpose, of lands lying within the limits of said Territory of North Dakota, are hereby confirmed to said Territory of North Dakota for the same uses and in the same manner as the same were granted to said Territory of Dakota.

SEC. 26. Provided, however, That inasmuch as by this act the name of the State, which was adopted by the constitutional convention recited in the preamble hereto, has been changed from that of the State of Dakota to the State of South Dakota, and the boundaries of said State have been modified in this act by the change thereof, east of the Missouri River from the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude to the seventh standard parallel, before said State of South Dakota shall be admitted by her representatives to the Congress of the United States or be entitled to the other rights and privileges of a State in the Union, there shall be submitted to a vote of the people of the proposed State of South Dakota the question of the acceptance or the rejection of said amended boundaries and name; and to that end an election is hereby ordered to be held by the qualified electors of said portion of said Territory of Dakota included within the boundaries of said proposed State, on the 28th day of August, 1888, upon which day there shall be submitted to said electors the following propositions: First, Is the name of the State of South Dakota accepted? Second, Is the proposed change in boundaries east of the Missouri River to the seventh standard parallel accepted? The form of the ballots to be used shall be as follows: Change of name to South Dakota accepted. Yes. Or, change of name to South Dakota accepted. No. Change of boundaries to seventh standard parallel east of the Missouri River accepted. Yes. Or, change of boundaries to seventh standard parallel east of the Missouri River accepted. No.

SEC. 27. That at the time of the election herein provided for the people of said proposed State of South Dakota shall have submitted to them for their ratification or rejection the constitution heretofore in the preamble of this act stated as having been formed and adopted, together with each of the separate articles thereof, in conformity with the schedule of said constitution, not including the selection of the temporary seat of government.

SEC. 28. That said election shall be governed in all respects by the laws of the Territory of Dakota governing elections and the canvass and return of the votes thereof. Within twenty days after the day of said election, the respective officers and county canvassers having by the law of the Territory of Dakota such duties in charge shall make returns of the votes so cast for and against each of said propositions to the governor of said Territory of Dakota. And within ten days thereafter, or sooner, if the returns are all received by him, the said governor, calling to his assistance the auditor and chief-justice of said Territory of Dakota, shall with them aggregate said vote, and immediately certify the result thereof to the President of the United States, who shall issue his proclamation announcing the result of said vote.

SEC. 29. That if a majority of the votes cast at said election shall be in favor of the acceptance of both the change of name and boundaries, and also for said constitution, regardless of the separate articles, then said State of South Dakota shall be deemed admitted into the Union of States on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever. And this act of admission shall then have full force and effect, and said constitution shall be deemed amended so as to conform to said changes. But if a majority of said votes so cast shall not be in favor of both of said propositions, and not in favor of the adoption of said constitution, then this act shall cease to have further force or effect.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. MCKENNA] withdraws his objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], that members having reports to present may have leave to file them with the Clerk. Is there further objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

BENJAMIN E. SNYDER.

Mr. CHIPMAN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10780) for the relief of Benjamin E. Snyder; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM FOWLER.

ADMISSION OF DAKOTA.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Dakota [Mr. GIFFORD] desires to submit some amendments to perfect the text of the substitute, and as amendments to perfect the text will be in order first, I yield to him now for that purpose.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to say that some amendments were proposed to be offered to the substitute.

Mr. SPRINGER. Amendments to Senate bill No. 185.

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman said amendments to the substitute.

Mr. SPRINGER. They are amendments to Senate bill 185, which has just been read.

The SPEAKER. It is in order to offer amendments to the original bill first.

Mr. BURROWS. I had no question about that, Mr. Speaker, but I understood the gentleman to say they were amendments to the substitute, and I desire to have the matter distinctly understood.

The amendments proposed by Mr. GIFFORD were read, as follows:

Amend section 9 by striking out the words "ninety sections of," and insert in lieu thereof "one hundred and twenty thousand acres."

Amend section 26 by striking out the words "28th day of August, 1888," and insert in lieu thereof "the first Monday in June, 1889."

Amend section 27 by adding thereto the following: "And at said election there shall be elected the State, judicial, and other officers and members of the Legislature of the said State of South Dakota provided for in the constitution of said State, and also two Representatives in the House of Representatives of the United States Congress; and if a majority of the votes cast at said election, upon the acceptance of both change of name and boundaries and of said constitution, shall be in the affirmative, as hereinafter provided, the governor, judicial and State officers thus elected shall have power to at once qualify and enter upon the duties of their respective offices, and they and the members of the Legislature thus elected shall hold their offices until the next general election, in November, 1890, unless otherwise provided by the laws of said State, and until their successors are duly elected and qualified. The governor shall have authority to at once convene said Legislature, and said Legislature thus elected may, in the manner provided by law, elect for said State two Senators to serve in the Senate of the United States Congress, and the Representatives duly elected at said election provided for in this section, and the United States Senators thus chosen, if otherwise legally qualified, shall be admitted to represent said State of South Dakota in the Congress of the United States."

Mr. COX. Are those amendments printed?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes, in the amendments which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has had printed. I desire also to offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend section 27 by striking out the word "not" from line 7.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded upon these amendments?

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no objection to these amendments being agreed to, as they are submitted mainly for the purpose of perfecting the text of the original bill.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, would the adoption of an amendment to one of the sections of this pending bill preclude a motion hereafter to strike out that entire section?

Mr. SPRINGER. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. There had better be an understanding upon that point. The order under which the House is now proceeding provides that this bill shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union bills are read by paragraph for amendment, or by sections, as the House may choose, so that unless some understanding be had the Chair thinks that when a section is taken up and discussed and amended, that would preclude a recurrence to a previous section unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. ADAMS. Then I will ask unanimous consent (of which, however, I may not choose to avail myself) to submit a motion hereafter to strike out the sections providing for an election to ratify the change of name and the change of boundaries.

The SPEAKER. In order to prevent confusion hereafter, it would perhaps be best that the bill be read by sections, or that it be understood that amendments may be offered to the different sections without regard to their order, as the House proceeds with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. DUNN. I wish to make another parliamentary inquiry. It is generally understood that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] will offer a substitute for this bill after the text is completed. Now, the question is, will that substitute be read by paragraphs, so as to admit of amendments, as in the case of the original bill?

The SPEAKER. The substitute would be one entire amendment.

Mr. DUNN. And when adopted it could not be amended further?

The SPEAKER. After a substitute is agreed to, it is not subject to amendment.

Mr. REED. But it can be amended prior to a vote upon the substitute.

The SPEAKER. Of course.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The bill has now been read the first time. Is it not the regular order to read the bill by sections for amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire that the friends of the bill should have leave to put in just such amendments as they desire to perfect the text, being those prepared by the Delegate from Dakota [Mr. GIFFORD]. I ask unanimous consent that those amendments be now agreed to without prejudice as to any other amendments that may be offered.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. And that the bill be then read by sections.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is not necessary. Let this proposition be submitted first.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] asks unanimous consent that the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Dakota [Mr. GIFFORD] be now considered, and agreed to or disagreed to, as the case may be, without prejudice to the right of any gentleman to offer other amendments. Is there objection?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I object.

The SPEAKER. Then the Clerk will proceed in the regular order and read the bill by sections.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] will not insist upon his objection. These are the amendments which the friends of the bill desire to have adopted in order to perfect its text. The election provided for in this bill was to take place last August; and these amendments provide for fixing a time when that election can take place under the provisions of the bill. I desire that time shall not be occupied in the reading of the bill by sections. These amendments can be agreed to at once, as they are formal and there is no objection, as I understand, to any of them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] has objected to the request of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CUMMINGS. As the bill is to be read by sections, these amendments can be offered just as well when the sections to which they relate are reached.

Mr. GIFFORD. That will take a great deal of time.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. The objection is withdrawn. Is a separate vote demanded upon any one of the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Dakota? If not——

Mr. CUTCHEON. Is it understood that the action on these amendments is not to prejudice the right to offer other amendments?

The SPEAKER. It has been expressly so stated.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Is it in order to ask that the order under which the House is proceeding be read, so that we may knows it exact terms?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause it to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Territories be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill numbered 185, being a bill to provide for the admission of the State of South Dakota into the Union and for the organization of the Territory of North Dakota, and that said bill be made a special order to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole immediately after the reading of the Journal on to-morrow, and from day to day until disposed of, with leave to offer as a substitute therefor House bill 8166; that thereafter other bills in relation to the admission of the Territories reported from the said committee shall be in order in the House in like manner until disposed of, to be considered in the order fixed by the committee.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the order be carried out, and I object to any modification of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky objects to the request which has been made. The bill will be read by sections.

Mr. SPRINGER. No modification of the order is proposed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky objects, and the Chair has no control over the matter. The order provides that the bill shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and of course the bill must be read by sections unless some other arrangement be made.

Mr. BURROWS. To expedite matters I demand the regular order.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. At the request of the chairman of the Committee on Territories [Mr. SPRINGER] I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The objection is withdrawn. The question is upon the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Dakota.

Mr. BURROWS. Are those amendments to be voted upon in gross?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has asked two or three times whether any gentleman desired a separate vote, and there was no response.

Mr. BURROWS. I have no doubt the amendments are all right; but I doubt whether when they were read all members heard them.

Mr. SPRINGER. They have been printed for two weeks; and they are simply those amendments which are necessary in order to——

Mr. BURROWS. Let them be read one by one, so that we may understand them.

The first amendment, offered by Mr. GIFFORD, was read, as follows:

Amend section 9 by striking out the words "ninety sections of" and insert in lieu thereof the words "one hundred and twenty thousand acres."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

Mr. COX. Have I the right, Mr. Speaker, to take the floor now and speak on the general merits of the amendments to the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so. General debate must be allowed under the rules, if any gentleman desires to discuss the bill in that way. After that will come the discussion under the five-minute rule.

Mr. COX rose.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understood there was no objection to agreeing to the amendments in gross.

The SPEAKER. The statement was these amendments might be agreed to or disagreed to without prejudice to any other gentleman to amend any further section of the bill hereafter. Nothing was said about general debate.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] desires to discuss the bill generally.

Mr. COX. We want to understand the bill and the amendments before we are required to vote on either of them.

Mr. SPRINGER. There must be some understanding as to that fact.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is simply endeavoring to carry out the order of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. As soon as these formal amendments were agreed to in regard to the general features of this bill and the other bill then the members of the committee who desired to speak on the subject could do so. I was on the floor for that purpose, and so far as the gentleman from New York is concerned I intended to ask, after yielding the floor to the gentleman from New York on the other side of the House [Mr.

BAKER], to yield and to ask the members of the House to yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX]. I intended to follow the regular order of proceeding.

The SPEAKER. This is the regular order of proceeding. The general debate comes first.

Mr. SPRINGER. I thought we had proceeded to consider the bill by sections.

The SPEAKER. On the contrary, that was waived for the present in order that the amendment moved by the gentleman from Dakota [Mr. GIFFORD] might be disposed of.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I claim the floor for the purpose of opening the general debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was entitled to the floor under the usage of the House, and if he claimed it, it would have been given to him. The Chair is in some doubt what course should be pursued under the circumstances.

The gentleman from Illinois was undoubtedly entitled to the floor according to the practice of the House to open the discussion of this bill, and if the debate continued longer than to-day he was entitled to one hour to conclude the debate. But the gentleman from Illinois did not take the floor for that purpose, but on the contrary permitted amendments to be offered, and before those amendments were disposed of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] inquired of the Chair whether he could take the floor for the purpose of addressing the House, and the Chair said he could.

Mr. SPRINGER. I only wished to have those amendments introduced, then intending to take the floor for the purpose of opening the general debate. While they were trying to get unanimous consent to dispose of those amendments the gentleman from New York, I understand, asked to be recognized. I did not intend to yield the floor, but on the contrary had taken the floor and was then occupying it, intending to proceed as soon as I could do so to open the general debate on this subject.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Illinois will not be disturbed by my remarks in this connection.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. How long is it proposed this debate shall continue? There should be some arrangement, of course, as to the time to be devoted to general debate on this subject.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I must insist upon holding the floor. I will yield any ordinary courtesy to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], but he not being a member of the Committee on Territories, he is asking an extraordinary favor at my hands that he shall take the floor at this time before the general debate has been opened.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen can arrange it among themselves. The confusion arose from the fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] did not take the floor to debate the bill, but permitted amendments to be offered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I was endeavoring to get these amendments offered, and by unanimous consent they might be agreed to. Pending that the gentleman from Kentucky and other gentlemen asked they might be read, and they were read. While those amendments were being disposed of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] rose and took the floor. But, Mr. Speaker, I did not yield the floor to the gentleman from New York, but was standing here all the time, intending as soon as I could do so to open the general debate.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Illinois states that he had taken the floor to debate the bill that presents a different question.

Mr. SPRINGER. As these formal amendments were proposed by the friends of the Senate bill I thought they should be entertained and disposed of, but after they were disposed of I intended to go on with the general debate. I took the floor for that purpose, and did not yield it.

Mr. COX. If I can have the floor afterward, I will not insist on occupying the floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. After one hour has been occupied by the gentleman from New York on the other side, I will yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX].

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I do not propose to occupy the floor at present.

Mr. SPRINGER. If no gentleman on the other side of the House desires to occupy the floor, of course then the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] can take the floor.

Mr. COX. Then I will follow my friend from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. SYMES. There ought to be some understanding in regard to the time to be occupied by the members of the committee and others in this debate. Gentlemen of the committee have the prior right in this debate, but there are many other gentlemen on the floor who also desire to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The matter is in the control of the House.

Mr. SYMES. I withdraw the objection I was going to make, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. SPRINGER withholds his remarks for revision. [See Appendix.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I favor the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] and his committee. I favor it, provided there are adopted certain amendments. In the last resort, if these Territories can not be brought in within a reasonable time, I propose to help any conference between the two bodies looking to the statehood of Dakota and the other Territories.

Congress has been derelict with respect to the admission of these Territories. For reasons which can not be given within the hour, but reasons which appeal to the discretion of gentlemen, I ask that these Territories be admitted.

ROMANCE OF EMPIRE.

There is a sort of glamour and fascination about the admission of States into our imperial federation. I am subject to influences of a romantic character. But they have not disturbed, and I think will not disturb, that discretion which belongs to Congress when it votes to make complete the circle of our Federal felicities.

Mr. Speaker, as we approach the centenary in the life of our nation the mind becomes reminiscent. It would also be prophetic. In dim outline the ancient seers saw, through the mists of western seas, our hemisphere as the home of a race which rejoiced in a "golden age." These dreams take hold upon the imagination. They give an illusion to our "discretion" on bills like these looking to future empire.

The imaginary commonwealth of Plato was not altogether unsubstantial. Some of the visions upon the horizon of our early epochs have found realization. But a republic never imagined by Plato, nor dreamed of by Harrington or Sir Thomas More, has found its home in our hemisphere. Like all hope that has its fruition, this has come to us through toil, danger, and heroism. These sacrifices have no parallel in the adventures of our race or upon our planet.

Out of what were mere nebulæ four centuries ago, stars have been resolved. Our western heavens are aglow with political luminaries which have their symbolization upon our flag.

A few only of our Territories remain in their rudimentary state. They are fast assuming the proportions for statehood.

Wyoming, Idaho, Arizona, and Alaska are springing to the front. They are fulfilling the conditions of political independency, while our other Territories, in so far as population and resources are concerned, have already human souls and prosperous opulence enough for a more exalted relation in the hierarchy of statehood.

What concerns us immediately, Mr. Speaker, is the admission as States, with proper boundaries and suitable numbers, of five Territories. These are combined in the substitute—the two Dakotas, Montana, Washington, and New Mexico. I omit purposely any consideration of Utah.

As to Wyoming, Idaho, Arizona, and Alaska, provision will be made in time, that when they attain a population adequate under the Representative ratio steps may be taken for their admission.

So that in the consideration of Territorial questions we view it from a standpoint whose scope comprehends nearly all of our remaining domain.

FORMALITIES OF ADMISSION.

It is well to remember, notwithstanding certain precedents to the contrary, that these Territories can not become political States with equal privileges in a Federal way without certain formalities. There is no leaping, like Minerva from the brain of Jove, fully equipped and matured. Under our system there are provisions to be observed before the boon of stately equality and the regality of "unassuming pomp" are bestowed.

The examination of these formalities involves the question, first, of power; second, the array of precedents; and, third, the deductions of reason.

As to the power. Is it not ample on the part of Congress? Why, sir, there is only one limitation. That power is found in the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution. It says: "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." In a subsequent section it "guaranties to every State in this Union a republican form of government." Here is a power to admit. It is unquestionable. The meaning of the phrase "a republican form of government" was much discussed during the slavery agitation, before and during our civil war. It needs no rehearsal now. There is no danger that any constitution made by any of these Territories will be unrepublican in form. It will not only have the authority from Congress, the stamp of maturity and the reflection of the popular will, but in its very body as well as in its essence it will be republican.

The Territories which we propose to admit have an organic law from Congress and they are under certain clauses of our Federal statutes. The organic law does not provide for a convention of the people to form constitutions. There has been no legislation by Congress in that direction, and there is no inhibition in our statutes upon such action.

Whether it be necessary that Congress should initiate proceedings looking to a convention and a constitution and admission or whether a Territorial Legislature may do this I will not now discuss. If Congress has not done it in the organic act, it has certainly not delegated the power to do it to the Territorial Legislature, and therefore, although the precedents are not all one way, it would certainly be more regular and comport more with the dignity of the proceeding that the scepter of sovereignty should be derived from the people of the United States in Congress assembled. [Cheers.]

PRECEDENTS.

I am not unaware that some precedents can be quoted for the admission of States where the initiative did not begin with Congress, but in the body of the Territory; and although there may be absolute discretion, limited, as I have stated, in Congress to admit States, regardless of the initial steps, it is safer to follow the words of Jefferson as to the first constitution of Virginia, adopted in 1776, when he said that the Legislature of that time had been elected only for the ordinary purposes of legislation. He denied that the acquiescence of the people had supplied the want of original power to create the constitution. This was in 1824. He fortified his opinion by saying—

That of the twenty-four States then under the Federal organization, twenty-three have disapproved the doctrine and example of Virginia, and have deemed the formal authority of their people a necessary foundation for their constitution.

In the case of Arkansas, General Jackson's Attorney-General decided that the Legislature could not act in the formation of a State government. In the Michigan case, Mr. Buchanan held that such acts were usurpation. California is no precedent, for her case, like that of Texas, was exceptional. The Lecompton constitution is no precedent; the people of Kansas set aside the Lecompton constitution as null. She came in afterwards under the authority of Congress. I had the pleasure, under much objurgation from Republicans, of voting for Kansas. Kentucky was admitted without a constitutional convention. Her constitution was not even submitted to her people. Tennessee, in 1796, formed a State without asking Congress. The question was discussed in Congress. The majority of the statesmen who engaged in that discussion maintained the same right which was ordained in 1787, and upon that right Tennessee was admitted. Indiana came in under an enabling act. Iowa, Michigan, Florida, and Oregon came in under constitutions whose only authority were the conventions which were held under legislative acts.

In many of our States there were no enabling acts at all. So that there is no uniformity of procedure in matters of this nature.

In so far as this question can be distorted into a party question, I may say that there is a uniform line of precedent for the admission of States into the Union, under conditions not so urgent or favorable for statehood as those presented by the Territories named in the substitute of the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

The ordinance of 1787 was a compact. By it the people, in certain boundaries, when they attained 60,000 inhabitants, were authorized to form States and demand admission as "an act of justice." By the acts of Congress of June 20, 1834, and April 20, 1836, this ordinance was extended to the Territory of Wisconsin. That Territory then included Dakota. Section 1891 of the Revised Statutes recognized the same right in the present Territory of Dakota. [Cheers.]

Our custom, sir, as to population has not been uniform. If population is to be the test of admission, the Territories in the substitute have each a sufficient number for one member of Congress. This is the moral, though not the legal, touchstone by which the admission of States should be determined. Many of our States have been admitted with less than a representative ratio. Illinois was 380 less; Florida, 6,000 less; Oregon, 43,000 less; Kansas about 20,000 less, and Nevada 87,381 less than the ratio! The ratio in 1864, when Nevada was admitted, was 127,381. Nebraska was less than the ratio by 27,000, and Colorado by 31,425.

An observant foreigner, Professor Bryce, of Oxford, has carefully noted the relation of our Territorial government to the Union. I commend his words to your attention, and ask the Clerk to read it. It will serve as a relief to the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

If it were possible under the Federal Constitution to admit Territorial residents to active citizenship—that is to say, to Federal suffrage—admitted they would be. But the Union is a union of States. It knows no representatives in Congress, no electors for the Presidency, except those chosen in States by State voters. The only means of granting Federal suffrage to citizens in a Territory would be to turn the Territory into a State. This would confer a power of self-government, guarantied by the Federal Constitution, for which the Territory might be still unfit. But it would do still more. It would entitle this possibly small and rude community to send two Senators to the Federal Senate, who would there have as much weight as the two Senators from New York, with its 6,000,000 of people. This is a result from which Congress may fairly recoil. And a practical illustration of the evils to be feared has been afforded by the case of Nevada, a State whose inhabitants number only about 40,000, and which is really a group of burnt-out mining camps. Its population is obviously unworthy of the privilege of sending two men to the Senate, and has, in fact, allowed itself to sink, for political purposes, into a sort of rotten borough which can be controlled or purchased by the leaders of a silver ring. It would evidently have been better to allow Nevada to remain in the condition of a Territory till a large, settled, and orderly community had occupied her surface, which is at present a parched and dismal desert, in which the streams descending from the eastern slope of the Sierra Nevada soon lose themselves in lakes or marshes. On a review of the whole matter it may safely be said that the American scheme of Territorial government, though it suffers from the occasional incompetence of the governor, and is inconsistent with democratic theory, has in practice worked well, and gives little ground for discontent even to the inhabitants of the Territories themselves.

Mr. WOODBURN. I am glad the gentleman has been compelled to resort to British authority to sustain him.

Mr. COX. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOODBURN. Because he could not produce any American authority.

Mr. COX. I was just trying to say that you and I agree for the first time in our lives. [Laughter.] My authority is an intelligent and observant Briton. He seems to love our country. Mr. Speaker, wherever such discreet laudation of our country comes from I care not. If an Englishman praises our Western folk, I give to him, as I give to Gladstone, all honor for his idea of autonomy, whether applied to Erin or Dakota.

In regard to the admission of new States we must regard population and representation. We must do that not alone with reference to Nevada. I might take that State as an illustration of our worst dereliction. I do this not because her distinguished Congressman is not able to fill the bill for a dozen other members [laughter], and not because her two Senators are not able to represent Nevada as the older and larger States are represented, but because of the fact that in the discussion of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, in which I took a part, there was fixed at that time for admission a criterion. That criterion should guide us. It provided that no State should be admitted unless it had a sufficient population for one member of Congress. I think that was a good plan, because it gave a good test on a fair ratio. I believe that the good old motherly people of this country, who adhere with a great deal of reverence to proper precedents, will sanctify this standard, not because we would like to get rid of the gentleman from Nevada who represents Nevada, for we love him too dearly to part with him. [Laughter.]

When my friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] discusses all of the various details of the Senate bill and his own substitute, he seems to anticipate the future. In that future these States by their Legislatures or constitutional conventions may revoke any law, organic or otherwise, which they may pass for local interests, subject only to the Constitution of the United States.

Therefore I am ready to welcome any legislation looking to the admission of Territories which fills the conditions, knowing that by legislative enactment or constitutional changes all defects may be remedied under local influences.

In most of the States Congress has provided for a convention and has generally required the constitution to be submitted to the people. But there are some precedents which after ratification by the people indicate that the State can be admitted by the proclamation of the President. When such an amendment appears, with respect to these long-deferred Territories, as one is intimated by the eloquent Delegate from Washington [Mr. VOORHEES], I will cheerfully vote for it.

SUBMISSION OF CONSTITUTIONS.

Many of the earlier constitutions were not submitted. But in the great majority of States, the constitutions were submitted to the people. The weight of the precedents is in favor of the principle of submission.

Therefore it would seem to be wise, especially owing to the lapse of time since the South Dakotan constitution and the Montana constitution have been adopted, to require new conventions in order that in these fast-growing States the new order shall conform to the latest popular judgment.

If, therefore, it be said that the precedents are not one way, I answer that it is altogether more regular and more in accordance with sound discretion that enabling acts should be passed in order to induct our Territories within the circle of the Union.

DISCRETION THE TEST.

But after all, sir, whatever may be said or done in the last resort on this question of statehood, the admission of States depends upon the wise discretion of Congress.

Some States have come in like Texas—teres atque rotundus—a "Lone Star," a republic already instituted. But Texas is superbly exceptional! When she came in she had memories—tearful and patriotic memories—of the Alamo and of San Jacinto. Yet her statesmen made provision for an emergency of five States, each—not asteroids—but each a star, brilliant and beautiful. Other States, like California, came in with fixed limits, boundaries, and peculiar interests, and others again, like Michigan, having catastrophic origin, being impelled into prominence by the insurgent, volcanic action of her people irrespective of Congressional authority.

This question of discretion, therefore, addresses itself to our best reason. There is no absolute right on the part of the Territory for admission, unless it be derived from those abstract rights of human nature which, under our system, must be chrystalized into an organism before it becomes an object of Federal fraternity.

CONDITIONS OF ADMISSION.

The only remaining conditions which appeal to our judgment are those relating to the population, boundary, intelligence, prospects, and, I may add, character of the Territory.

In early days, when Kansas came forward with a constitution unauthorized, and with a mode of submission ambiguous and illusory, I voted against her admission. But I declared at that time, in the first speech I ever made here, and the first made in this Hall—and it was listened to for its acoustic properties [laughter]—that I would have voted for the admission of Kansas as a slave State if it had been fairly made so by the people. In the last analysis the popular will must be the foundation of sovereignty.

By the prompt admission of these Territories, and especially of Dakota, with her six or seven hundred thousand people, we avoid the invidious remarks which have been often made and which partake too much of partisan spirit.

It is the habit of some gentlemen to refer to the Southern States and the meagerness of their vote compared with the number of their Congressmen-elect, and then to make the further comparison that the Territories have a larger population than some of our States.

The question is asked cynically why should the votes of States of less population be used to prevent Dakota, which would have seven members of Congress in 1890, from voting at all?

NO MORE LARGE STATES.

Mr. Speaker, although in the discretion which each member here is authorized to exercise in admitting States, I give great heed to the judgment of the people of the Territories who are most affected by our action on the question of admission, which includes boundaries and population and even names. But I am not so bound that I would admit a State with such an extensive area as undivided Dakota. I would not so vote if every man, woman, and child in the Territory should demand it; for, sir, it then becomes a question affecting other States in the brotherhood; as other States are affected by representation in both branches of our Federal Legislature.

SHACKLES ON STATES.

Nor would I clothe a State with the robes of sovereignty and then shackle its limbs so that it might not change its own constitution at pleasure and within the limits of a "republican form."

If we give sovereignty to Utah and hamper her with conditions that she should do something or reverse something or abrogate something abnormal, incongruous, corrupt, or disgraceful, according to the standards of civilization, we do that which is futile, for we do not give to her State sovereignty, but make her still a dependency.

Governments are representative, says Jefferson, only as they embody the popular will and execute it; and in that popular will should reside the power to change and revoke whenever the wisdom of the people desire it. These, Mr. Speaker, are some of the preliminary propositions upon which to determine the votes which may be given upon the questions before us.

I propose, therefore, to consider in their order the admission of the Territories proposed by the bill reported from the Committee on the Territories.

OMNIBUS NOT FAVORED.

I would have preferred that each one of these Territories should have come in by her own intrinsic vigor and virtue, and not through any interdependence or leaning upon one or more of the other Territories embraced in the bill. Perhaps in the end our legislation may run in that channel. Certainly such a channel will be more easily navigable and free from quicksands and difficulties. I can not see why South Dakota should depend on the admission of Washington, or North Dakota upon the admission of New Mexico. There used to be some sort of implication when I first came into this body that we should balance a slave State with a free, and a free one with a slave State. But all that has happily gone to the rear.

MORE PRECEDENTS.

When Ohio came in she came in under the ordinance of 1787, as Tennessee came in under an ordinance made upon the same line. But they depended for their admission upon their intrinsic merits. And I should not hesitate to vote for each one of these Territories in this so-called "omnibus bill" separately and independently, one without the other, if by no other means we could accomplish the object.

PARTY BIAS.

Above all things, Mr. Speaker, this question of admission is not a party question. In the nature of things it can not be. The people of the Territories are not wedded to any party. They are remote and isolated; preoccupied with absorbing local matters. They are easily molded, like the clay in the hands of the potter. As the wheel whirls, a little pressure here and a little pressure there, and out comes the graceful vase, irrespective of the rude and selfish manipulations of our Federal politics. If these Territories be not admitted this session they will surely be admitted under Republican auspices in the next Congress, and their politics will take the reflection of the friends who give them their early nurture.

I have voted for many Territories to become States since I have been here. I have been taught some lessons from the result. Perhaps the only mistake I have made in my vote was in voting prematurely for Oregon; for we had no correct census returns of her population, and she did not, at that time, approach the ratio. We had to determine her population more from her resources and her tax returns than from any other source. She was ushered into the Union by the eloquent dialectics of Alexander H. Stephens. She bid fair to be a Democratic State, and she came in with Democratic Senators and Representatives. But how long did she remain so? I notice the honorable gentleman from Oregon—a Republican—smile as he recalls his splendid majority. [Laughter.] I voted for Kansas and Nebraska. They came in as Republican States, and though their population was not quite equal to the ratio, they were growing fast; and we but anticipated a sufficient population, while we settled a prolonged and vexatious controversy. Party bias is a fragile reed to rely upon when principles are at stake.

COLORADO.

When Colorado came up, lacking a sufficient number for even one Congressman, I gave my vote against her admission, because I did not see then from the quality of her soil and the peculiar occupations of her people that they had the elements of growth as other Territories have developed.

NEW MEXICO.

When New Mexico, fourteen years ago, appeared at the bar here, she was ushered in by a Republican Delegate (Mr. Elkins). You know Mr. Elkins.

Many MEMBERS. Oh! yes; we know Stephen. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. Yes; Stephen. He has not hidden his light since under a bushel. [Laughter.] I recall his personality. He tried with all the urgency belonging to a party full of the zealotry of the war and the glory of its triumph to have New Mexico admitted. I did not give it my vote, because New Mexico at that time was in such a confused and incongruous condition that I resented the attempts made by the Republican party to force her into the Union. New Mexico is here again.

Mr. PETERS. There has been a change of heart since.

Mr. COX. I can not change my party. I have been too long in it for that.

Mr. PETERS. I said a change of heart.

Mr. COX. Now, my friend represents Kansas. When I was a young Congressman from Ohio, he was my little constituent, about that high. [Indicating.] His heart was all Democratic then, for he used to peddle my tickets. [Laughter and applause.] I never could get over my affection for the gentleman from Kansas on account of his early partisanship for me. My heart toward him never changes. [Cheers and laughter.]

Mr. PETERS. Well, that is beautiful fiction. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. It is too late in the day for gentlemen of the Republican party to challenge the admission of New Mexico. Our RECORD (page 4129) shows that on the 21st of May, 1874, a Representative from Mississippi (Mr. McKee) proposed to take up the bill for the admission of New Mexico, which was the bill of Mr. Elkins, the then Delegate, and, although he was opposed by gentlemen on the Democratic side and by some Republican gentlemen, notably Mr. G. F. HOAR, of Massachusetts, now a Senator from that State—the House voted to admit New Mexico by 160 yeas to 54 nays. The strongest speech made against her admission by a Democrat was made by my then colleague, Mr. Clarkson N. Potter, of New York. The most urgent speech in its favor was by Mr. Kasson, assisted by Mr. Maynard and Mr. Hoskins, all Republicans.

In presenting the bill the Republican party gave their voice, through Mr. McKee, in favor of admission, because New Mexico had all the elements out of which we make States. He said:

It is large enough; it has population enough; it has prosperity enough; in fact, it has every element of statehood. In area it is three times as large as Ohio. It has more than 143,000 people. The vote by which the Delegate comes here is over 17,000. There are forty Representatives on this floor—who come here with fewer votes. In everything that goes to make a State, New Mexico is fully up to the standard.

Said Mr. McKee—

Certainly, since that time New Mexico has not diminished in population or prosperity. She has not been curtailed of her area nor disappointed in her hopes. At that time she had a Republican Legislature and a Republican Delegate. Well, has she not a Republican Legislature to-day? And if she has a Democratic Delegate, it is because he was more in sympathy with the large body of her peculiar people than his Republican competitor. I warn my Democratic friends that New Mexico is more nearly Republican than Democratic. If it be not Stephen B. Elkins as one Senator, it will be Stephen Dorsey as the other.

Much rhetoric has been expended on this subject. The attempt to force New Mexico in as a State has been stigmatized as nefarious. The Republicans in the Forty-third Congress had 49 of the 74 Senators, and 149 of the 200 Representatives, and they cried, "All hail to the half-breed, unprogressive population of New Mexico." They would have given her equal power in the Senate with New York and Pennsylvania. I do not say this because New Mexico had Republican proclivities at that time. I think she has the same proclivities now, and with more certainty.

I find, in looking at the RECORD, that I opposed her admission because of her lack of population, and this was what I said:

In the admission of States in those early days of Buchanan's administration, out of all that Red Sea of trouble, we got some little good, because at the end of this struggle we agreed to a certain rule, and that rule was that a population equal to the ratio represented by a member of Congress should always be sufficient for the admission of a State, and that was entered of record and a joint resolution passed to give effect to it.

Although it is within the discretion of Congress to allow or disallow admission, still is it not a safe rule that a population equal to the ratio for one Congressman, whether it be binding by joint resolution or not, should be the criterion for admission? Perhaps the Senate in its wisdom acted upon that doctrine then. But, inasmuch as the population is now fully up to the standard, the Senate may reverse their rule and admit New Mexico. Certainly it does not lie on the part of Republican partisans to refuse her admission on that ground.

If the Republican party could vote for New Mexico fourteen years ago, why can not they do it now? She has added 55,000 in population since the census of 1880 was taken. In the last year 384,000 acres of public land have been entered for actual occupation and improved. She is engaged in the construction of railroads across her territory, and is opening new sections to settlement and establishment. At the end of the year which has just passed there was completed 2,000 mileage of railroads. Her grain crops and other products, especially grapes and semi-tropical fruits, grow in profusion, while her cattle ranges are among the marvels of her growth. She had an increase of 135,000 head of cattle in 1888 over 1887, and her mines are becoming productive after the idleness of years, if not of centuries.

It will not do, therefore, to say that New Mexico has not enough population or wealth to support a State government; nor is it just to the elements which permeate that Territory to say that she has too much ignorance or too small an admixture of intelligence for the regulation of a State. It is no objection to her admission that the peon and mongrel race forms a portion of her population, for the same rule would have kept out California, and would to-day disbar the States south for their mixed colored elements. It is no objection that the New Mexicans speak a Spanish patois, for California had the same disability and has outgrown it promptly. The progress which New Mexico is now enjoying in mining and stock-growing, sheep-raising and agriculture, indicates that though portions of her soil may be barren, rainless, and arid, she has all the elements of growth, and will shine as a fit embodiment of statehood in the catalogue of States.

OTHER TERRITORIES.

From the reports of the governors of our Territories it will appear that as to population Alaska has 50,000 people and $25,000,000 in wealth; Idaho has 100,000 in population and $65,000,000 in wealth; Arizona 120,000 population and $75,000,000 in wealth. As to the other Territories, omitting Utah, Dakota is registered as having 600,000 in population and $320,000,000 in wealth; Washington 168,000 population and $250,000,000 in wealth; Montana 140,000 population and $70,000,000 in wealth. But I have no doubt that Montana has to-day a sufficiency for one member of Congress. So that in the bill proposed there is no objection to any of these five Territories on account of wealth or population.

MONTANA.

First, as to Montana. Her growth is at the rate of 10,000 a year and 100,000 over that of the census of 1880. Her financial condition is sound and stable, with money in the treasury and freedom from debt. She has every inducement to emigration, for her taxes are light. Her mines of gold and silver and lead are even greater than her agricultural and pastoral resources.

WASHINGTON.

Second, as to Washington Territory. Her governor believes that the population I have named to be a low figure and that at present her population is equal to nearly 188,000. Her gain in values, though not equal to that of Dakota, is simply enormous, being a gain of over $65,000,000 during the past ten years. She has nearly 1,200 miles of railroad, and over her bosom are borne the products of eastern Asia, as well as her own commercial and agricultural produce, in which fish and lumber figure prominently.

DAKOTA.

As to Dakota, it is to me amusing, if not astonishing, that those who have had charge of our Territorial affairs in this House should require another expression from Dakota as to the matter of division.

Again and again, through her conventions of both parties and her legislatures, has she asked for that division, respectfully, earnestly, and persistently. The fact is that by the action of this Congress the question of division has practically disappeared. Still it is submitted by the third section of the substitute, and I am content if gentlemen desire to have it submitted again. It is be no obstacle to my vote for admission, and it seems to give our friends some relief; since no one desires to force Dakota apart in order to admit her as twins. It seems to be practically concluded that she will be divided according to the provisions of the bill, upon the seventh standard parallel. The submission of the question of division may be wasteful excess, but so long as it comports with a certain regularity in procedure I will not object to it.

Dakota in length and breadth, in population, in area, in wealth, and in progress, stands unexampled in the annals of mankind for material, political, and, I may say, intellectual and spiritual advancement. [Cheers.]

DIVISION OF DAKOTA.

I will not argue the propriety of dividing her, nor will I discuss now the necessity of complying with the rule which I have laid down—of giving to her population members of Congress in proportion to her population. It is the rule of the Constitution and the rule of right. But I will say that the census of 1890 will show that Dakota, which began with 14,000 population in 1870, and rose to 135,000 population in 1880, and has to-day over 600,000 population—I will say, that a State which leaped in the last decade, from 1870 to 1880, 885 per cent. in the increase of her population, will have in 1890, by the least computation, 1,329,750 people, with seven members of Congress to represent her in her entirety.

Every element connected with the progress of this remarkable Territory, including her 4,000 miles of railroad, all point with no unmistakable gesture toward the division of the State. There can be no greater indignity, Mr. Speaker, than in keeping so vast a country, with a population so energetic and hopeful, so industrious and far-sighted, under a Territorial form of government. The people there desire to vote for the Chief Magistrate of the Union. They desire to have a voice under the Constitution of the United States. They desire to have representation at this Capitol. They desire to govern themselves by their own elected officials. They desire that their income-less school lands shall be utilized for the education of their children. They desire courts of their own judges. They desire the right to make their own laws and to reform them at pleasure. They want neither the satraps of the Orient, nor the satraps of reconstruction.

When they pay their taxes, they desire a voice as to the disposition of the moneys. They desire even when traveling from one part of their Territory to another, something less than a thousand miles of their journey, for the argument of cases. Because there is little or no commercial intercourse between North and South Dakota; because one part is reached by one system of railroad and the other by another, and because they are different in their very organizations north and south, as well as in their homes of charity and institutions of learning, they wish that independency which division will give them, and that liberty to which they were accustomed before leaving their homes in the States to build an empire in the wilderness.

Dakota has already spoken for division through her conventions as she had often spoken before. Joining with her sisters, Montana and Washington, she appeals in behalf of the Northwest to this Congress of the nation for the recognition of her movement toward statehood. She points to her population and her wealth, and with no unmeaning gesture to the history of our States. She admonishes us that Kentucky came in with 74,000; Tennessee with 67,000, and yet she has ten times as many people as had either of these States on admission. She points to the admission of Ohio with her 35,000; Missouri with her 66,000; Michigan with her 65,000; Florida with her 64,000; Iowa with her 78,000; California with her 92,000; Oregon with her 50,000; Kansas with her 107,000; Minnesota with her 120,000; Nebraska and Colorado with their 100,000 each; and Nevada!—what an anti-climax!—[laughter] with her 40,000. She says to the nation, "Behold our 600,000 people, and give us the habiliments of statehood according to our growth!" When divided, South Dakota is five times the average of our States in population and North Dakota four times.

EARLY HISTORY OF DAKOTA.

The history of the Territory is that of fur-trading upon the Upper Missouri. Lewis and Clarke—pioneers hardy and true from West Virginia—were there in the beginning of the century. The first steamers visited there in 1830. In 1839 Frémont, and in 1841 Catlin visited Dakota; then military posts began to be established. It was not until 1856 that the first settlements began on lands bought of the Sioux, near Sioux Falls. Part of Dakota became a part of Minnesota Territory in 1851. In 1857 a land company from Minnesota traveled overland and established the town of Medary, in honor of one of my constituents from Ohio, then governor of Minnesota. In spite of many contests with the Indians—some of them bloody and horrible—the Territory was organized on 2d March, 1861, and grew wonderfully.

She is too large, too unwieldy, too top-heavy, to be admitted as a whole. Let us not forget the lessons of our State history. California seeks for division, or begins the agitation. So does New York; and but for her superb ante-State annals, so would Texas.

AREA OF DAKOTA AND OTHER TERRITORIES AND STATES.

I can remember very well the jealousy between tide-water Virginia and Virginia west of the Alleghanies. The constant bickerings between the two sections of Virginia never ceased until the Cæsarian operation during the war, whereby West Virginia was brought forth from the womb of the mother.

Dakota was not made one Territory because of any homogeneity of its soil or other elements. When it was organized its population did not number more than 5,000. Had it been divided into two Territories then, who would think now of making its territory into one State?

Look at this table and draw your own inference as to the argument which may be made in opposition to Dakota as a whole:

	Square miles.
Maine	29,895
New Hampshire	9,005
Vermont	9,135
Massachusetts	8,040
Rhode Island	1,085
Connecticut	4,845
New York	47,620
New Jersey	7,455
Maryland	9,866
Dakota	150,932

A good deal has been said, sir, about the sectionalism of the recent tariff legislation. Much more will be said, likely, about sectionalism in connection with the Northern Territories if Democrats oppose their admission on party grounds. This is to be deprecated, and most of all by the Democratic party. Already it is hinted that the vote of South Carolina and Dakota is about the same; and yet South Carolina has nine votes in the Electoral College and Dakota none! Why none? it will be asked. Why no representation in Congress, and yet taxation? And if South Carolina or other Southern States prevent Dakota coming in, what will then be said? And if said, what is the answer? And who will respond?

TAXATION AND REPRESENTATION.

The question of the admission of Dakota is a question of taxation; for is it not the interest of the people even in the matter of money to have small States?

Oh, it may be said that it will cost more for salaries if there are two States instead of one; but those who say this do not know that about 100 per cent. is levied for general taxation when the area is undivided. That is the experience of Dakota. These facts demonstrate it:

Small States.	Levy per $100.	Large States.	Levy per $100.
Massachusetts	$0.09	Louisiana	$1.00
Rhode Island	.01½	Texas	.68
New Hampshire	.20	California	.56
Maryland	.17	Kansas	.50
New Jersey	.20	Missouri	.40
Michigan	.11	Minnesota	.30
Connecticut	.12½	New York	.30
Wisconsin	.10	Nebraska	.40
Delaware*		Georgia	.44
		Mississippi	.50

*None paid by railways.

These figures are taken from the census of 1880, and are authentic. They show that the larger the State and the farther the people are away from the seat of legislation, the more the fraud, the greater the corruption, combinations, and appropriations; and hence the greater the taxes. It is easy to see to which of the above classes of States Dakota would belong if she did not get division.

"The cost of paying our own officers," say the Dakota people, "is not a drop in the bucket compared to the appropriations we would save paying."

If it be true that the remoteness of the administrative offices from the seat of government tends to corruption and prodigality, then a large State like Dakota is an element of weakness, while a State of less size has an element of strength. Besides, it has been said by those who have urged the division of the State that the Territorial expense of Dakota by the last Legislature amounted to thousands more than the State of Wisconsin, and that there has been a constant increase of Territorial expense for the past few sessions of the Legislature. This statement shows the increase:

So that representation and taxation have some meaning in connection with the admission of Dakota.

There are many complaints of the tyranny exercised by the "one-man power" in Dakota, which no Territorial legislation and no restraints by Congress have suppressed or can suppress. The governor—not chosen by the people, and generally an outsider appointed by the President—names ninety officers. These control the expenditure of all the revenues of the Territory. He appoints most of the other officers connected with the charities, colleges, and other institutions. There is a revenue of over half a million per annum expended by these officers, subject to the approval of the governor. In the last Legislature the governor refused to approve of any appropriation bills unless the expenditure was subject to his approval. So that the old American doctrine of taxation and representation was substantially nullified.

AREA AND RESOURCES.

But as Professor Bryce, the British observer, remarks, these Territories to be autonomous must be States, and here the question arises, Shall these States be top-heavy in the unpopular branch, the Senate? I beg pardon of the Senate, Mr. Speaker. I did not mean that the Senate was unpopular. [Laughter.] It is only plutocratic. [Laughter.] I meant to say it was not the popular branch. But to resume: Shall Nevada cancel New York? Shall these remote Territories, with mixed populations, be admitted, and nullify the votes of such imperial States as Texas, Georgia, and Pennsylvania in the national Senate?

Assuming that Montana, Washington, and New Mexico combined have three times the unit of representation, or about 450,000, and that Dakota has 600,000, there would be enough in Dakota, according to the unit rule of representation, for three or four members of Congress. So that Dakota would have in excess, if she were admitted as one State, enough for two other members of Congress in addition to the two which the "omnibus bill" would give her.

Moreover, a strong plea can be made for Dakota on the ground of her resources and her marvelous progress in all that makes up the State. Her area is 151,992 square miles. Her sister Territories, whom my friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] would seat in the same "omnibus" with her, have the following area: Montana, 145,310; Washington, 66,880; New Mexico, 122,460; or a total of 334,650 square miles.

This is somewhat more than double that of Dakota. But Montana, Washington, and New Mexico are mountainous, and likely to remain so for some time; their population is sparse, and also likely to remain so.

We know that nearly all of the soil of Dakota is fertile. It is filled up with the homes of people who are industrious and who can stand anything in the shape of disaster—from a March blizzard down to a summer's drought. When it comes to making grain Dakota can beat all the rest of the "omnibus." When it comes to banks, newspapers, and schools, she has the same preponderance.

Bishop Hare, in writing to the New York Herald, indicated the rapid growth of this great community when he said:

> You may stand ankle-deep in the short-burned grass of an uninhabited wilderness. Next month a railroad train glides over the waste. I have ridden into Dakota valley and pitched my tent. Lolling on my buffalo robe, I looked around and could see nothing but a wolf. When I visited the valley next year, lo! a train of Pullman palace cars. I camped on the flat bottom of land near the Missouri River that same trip. There was only a log hut, with a mud roof. No other sign of civilization. Within a year I revisited the spot, and lo! there was a town of two thousand.

"Seven thousand new-comers a month," exclaims the author of the Resources of Dakota, published in 1887.

Dakota's wheat crop in 1887 exceeds the record of any State in the Union. It was one-seventh of the entire crop of the United States in 1886. In 1886 the wheat crop of New York was 11,093,000 bushels, while Dakota's was 30,704,000; yet in 1860 Dakota raised only 945 bushels, and in 1887, 62,553,499 bushels. Whereas in 1860 the live stock of Dakota was worth about $40,000, in 1887 it was over forty-three millions! Her corn crop was 20,000,000 bushels per year; barley, oats, rye, flax, grass, buckwheat, and vegetables in proportion. Her railroad mileage was over 4,207 in 1887, and of railroads graded in 1887, 301 miles more. She has more completed railroad than either California, Tennessee, Nebraska, Virginia, North Carolina, Colorado, Alabama, or Georgia; twice as many miles as either Massachusetts, South Carolina, Florida, New Jersey, Mississippi, or Kentucky; more than three times that of either Maine, Maryland, West Virginia, Louisiana, or Oregon; more than four times that of New Hampshire, Vermont, or Connecticut; thirteen times the railway mileage of the gigantic State of Delaware, and twenty times that of the Brobdignagian State of Rhode Island!

Surely she is fitted for statehood if railroads or transportation facilities indicate a prosperous community. Even if she were divided, is she not entitled to a double statehood? Her manufactures and mining, as well as her crops, indicate ample prosperity. Besides, she has a cultured, moral, and refined people, whose schools, churches, and other moral advantages are the peers of those farther east. These indicate a preponderance of citizens of advanced nationality who have moved on isothermal lines to better their fortunes in the new Territory, which has shown so much alluring prosperity.

Of the population now at the end of 1888, likely numbering 650,000, one-third are of foreign birth, of which one-sixth are Canadian, and a few hundred Chinese, colored, and Indian citizens. The rest are of the stock which makes up New England and the Middle States.

It is not necessary to analyze, as the Department of Agriculture has, the samples of her soil in order to show why her percentages are so great of that organic matter out of which her grain stuffs and, ultimately, her meat stuffs are made.

The rich, dark drifts of alluvial loam, with its properties for holding moisture and for growing crops, illustrate the bounty of nature toward Dakota, for her very soil hoards her wealth, and this enrichment, with no need of manures, contains a "surplus" that no legislation can dissipate. Indeed, her surface is nearly all arable land. It is easily tilled and miraculously productive. There is no necessity to clear trees or remove stumps. This fertility beckoned the plow of the pioneer, and the plow came. Those interested in her advancement have given her resources in columns which astound the statistician. She has nearly 100,000,000 of acres of tillable land—more than that of any other State or Territory except Texas and California. Only one-half of it is occupied, and this would furnish farms of 160 acres each to three hundred thousand families, or two millions of people.

WHY NOT DIVIDE DAKOTA?

Why should she not be divided? She has within her breast two political communities. They are distinct in their interests, character, associations, and institutions—more so than the people of any of the contiguous States. To insist upon their admission as one State, in defiance of all the proprieties and utilities, would be to run counter to all that has been done both by parties and all legislators in the Territory and out. Why, her Territorial Legislature has located hospitals, asylums, penitentiaries, universities, colleges, and schools with a view to this natural division. Even bonds have been issued based upon a division of the Territory. The very names—North and South Dakota —have been fixed with as much distinctness as these designations to the Carolinas. Is there any interest which requires that there should not be a separate and distinct political organism for each portion of the Territory? If it be political or partisan, let it be shown. Is the Republican party, which is sure to divide it, as they have the next Congress, to have all the merit of this act of wisdom?

The Territory, as a whole, is larger in extent than New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland, Delaware, and Virginia put together. It is 430 miles from its northern to its southern boundary, and 400 miles from its eastern to its western boundary.

It is as far from the southern to the northern boundary as Chicago is from Memphis, or New York from Raleigh.

To be candid, it must be stated that one-fourth of the acreage of the Territory is in Indian reservations. They are not within the Territorial jurisdiction; but the reservations are melting away before the progressive Caucasian!

It is proposed to divide the Territory not quite east or west or north or south, but nearly upon the forty-sixth parallel, or rather, on the "seventh standard parallel" which is some 5 miles south of the forty-sixth parallel, and that has been adopted as the boundary line of organized counties which are cut by the forty-sixth parallel. If divided into two States, South Dakota will have an area greater than any one of the States, except California, Colorado, Kansas, Minnesota, Nevada, Oregon, or Texas. It would exceed the whole of New England with New Jersey thrown in. It would be one-third larger than Iowa. It has a population running from 375,000 to 400,000. It is bounding ahead with a tremendous energy. Its wheat crop in 1887 was 60,000,000 bushels; its corn crop 26,000,000. Its mineral opulence figures up over $33,000,000 of gold and silver from the Black Hills since 1877. In addition to her soil and climate she has lignite coal, with 20-foot veins, which is quite a useful thing when the blizzards come.

A PEERLESS BEAUTY.

The report on these topics, gentlemen will recall—the report from which all others on the Republican side are taken—is from the urgent pen of General Harrison; and it must be heeded. Even my honored friend and colleague [Mr. BAKER] has learned from that report.

I might sum it all up in the lyric language of my colleague from New York [Mr. BAKER], who made the report of the minority in favor of South Dakota:

For ten years she has pressed herself, a peerless beauty in resources, wealth, numbers, and intelligence; the pride of all America, yet ignored by Congress and denied the right to enter her father's house!

This personification of Dakota as a fair female has received the imprimatur of many publications, for I have seen a picture of the Territory in female form, pointing with some pride to a stately column of figures showing the resources of other States and then pointing with sublime gesture and tearful indignation to a roll on which is inscribed her own magnificent area, accomplishments, and destiny.

NORTH DAKOTA.

The bill for North Dakota, or the territory lying north of the seventh parallel of surveys, authorizes the election of delegates to a convention to form a constitution. It is in the usual form. The Democratic majority of the House Committee, however, have interposed an adverse report.

What reasons will be given in favor of such a measure? First, the State will have an area of 74,000 square miles. It will be 400 miles long from east to west, and 214 miles wide from north to south. Its area will be equal to that of our largest States, with the exception of eight, namely: Nebraska, Kansas, Minnesota, Oregon, Colorado, California, Nevada, and Texas. It is a prairie and, like the rest of the Territory, fertile. It is capable of sustaining an immense population. It had already 225,000 people on the 1st of January of this year, as shown by official data in the office of the Secretary of the Interior.

It will be urged in favor of her admission that no State was ever organized from the public domain with such a population. The assessed value of her property for the purposes of taxation, including railroads, was seventy-two millions and a half, and her railroad mileage 1,966. The value of her school property and the outlay for schools, her schoolhouses, her newspapers, banks, and banking capital, all play their part in the argument which the Republicans and the friends of the division of the Territory will urge for the admission of North Dakota. The question is, Shall that party have the monopoly of the credit for its admission?

This immense growth has occurred since 1880. In 1870 her population was only 2,000. In 1880 it was 38,000. It is now 225,000. The next census will probably show enough for two members of Congress. However, that is dependent upon the ratio as it will be fixed by the Fifty-second Congress.

Much will also be said in favor of the patriotism, the institutions of learning and religion, and the soldier element, as well as the precedents which have been fixed by Federal legislation for statehood.

WHO DEFEATED THE ADMISSION OF THE DAKOTAS?

Why, then, has not one or the other or both of these Territories been admitted? Is it because their admission has been made the sport of party or of politics? I am afraid there has been too much of it. I remember to have read in the Chicago Times an article headed "Dakota the victim of both parties." It fixed the odium of denying Dakota admission to the sisterhood of States six years ago upon a Republican Senator. That Senator was Hon. EUGENE HALE, of Maine, because, as he thought, one county in Dakota had acted in bad faith as to a small amount of bonds held by his constituents. He interposed the fatal objection. He relegated her to a position of an outlying province. And yet Maine had at that time about the same population as Dakota and hardly one-half of the square miles of South Dakota.

It will be asked, why should Maine be favored with our Federal ægis and Dakota disfavored? Why should there be an ostracism upon this people, irrespective of the doctrines of Jefferson, Jackson, and Douglass, and popular sovereignty? Why should we oppose Mr. HALE'S party in building up the great Republican States in the Northwest, when the liberalities of trade and interchange, growing out of our philosophy and economy, would make them, in time, Democratic States?

DAKOTA AS SHE WAS.

Dakota has only recently been organized. It was within a decade a desolate wilderness, held only by the buffalo, the bear, and the not less savage Indian. Gradually the change began through the influences of our adventurous population and with the aid of steam and lightning. From a rude country, thinly settled, inhospitable to strangers and armed with ruffians, cowboys, and gamblers, with revolvers, the ramshackle stage, and the glittering bowie-knife, with an Indian war constantly menacing, all has been changed.

Already the ruffian is a myth; the gambler has gone to his last account; the cowboy rides upon the foothills of the Rocky Mountains, and the Indian at least is acquiescing in his changed condition, for his children, if not himself, are being educated and civilized under our institutions. The old fort, Sitting Bull, and all the wildness of those early days have given way to cities and towns and railroads and farms, and a population larger than that of many of the States looms up in majestic proportions, with all the paraphernalia of government and all the refinement of Christian civilization.

THE DEMAND FOR ADMISSION.

It is impossible, Mr. Speaker, to resist the demand of such a State even when divided. You can not enchain this Prometheus to a rock. Its organisms—counties, towns, and cities—governed just now as Indians are governed, by a remote Department in this city, can not afford to wait upon a Congress whose recreations are filibustering and whose best business habits are the ridicule of the nation. Why should such a country, so rich and prosperous and intelligent, be governed differently from Georgia or Massachusetts, Illinois or New York? You can not keep such a people down. Your Territorial organization and your two hundred Federal officers chosen outside; your governor, with his little brief authority, exacting that every dollar spent of the people's money should pass through his palms, is an alien system. Our fathers would have none of it in the Revolution, and our country were prompt to be rid of it after our civil war.

RESULT OF REFUSAL TO ADMIT.

Refuse to admit this State and its Territorial sisters? Why, sir, you may enact that frost shall cease in the North and blooms in the South, or try to fix the figure of Proteus by statute, but you can not prevent the people of this Territory from their demand, and you must accede to it; and if this Congress does not, we know that the next Congress will.

The spirit of this people of the Northwest is that of unbounded push and energy. These are the men who have tunneled our mountains, who have delved our mines, who have bridged our rivers, who have brought every part of our empire within the reach of foreign and home markets, who have made possible our grand growth and splendid development. They are the men who have made our national life. There is no parallel in history to their achievements. You can not hold them as captive to the Federal system. You must give them self-reliant statehood.

The historian of Rome draws a picture of the proud Queen of Palmyra arrayed in purple and loaded with golden chains to aggrandize the procession in honor of the conqueror of Asia. It needs no such imagination to picture the condition of our inchoate States in the West. They will wear no golden chains. No, sir! They will march in no procession of dishonor. Such exhibitions do not belong to our country. Our people are not to be led in fetters at the car of an imperial Congress. Why, such exhibitions were unfit even for pagan Rome. So that in every possible equipment, whether divided or united, this remarkable Territory is ready to join that circle of felicity which makes up the Federal fraternity.

PROGRESSIVE MOVEMENTS WEST.

In speaking of the admission, of Kansas, Mr. Speaker, on December 16, 1857, I made some remarks illustrative of the vast changes in our political and social existence upon this hemisphere as compared with the laggard movements of other nations. Here, change was the very condition of existence—here, States are formed in the twinkling of an eye; cities grow up in a night, as if under the magic of Aladdin's lamp; here, economical ideas, more powerful than political tenets, are ever permeating the body political, to change its form and substance; here, the border men are students of politics, and seek popularity and wealth by ameliorating institutions; here, the telegraph throws its thought from the very Capitol in which we speak to the borders of our territory; and the "goblin of steam," under the aid of Congressional land grants, is doing the work of years in a week, and the work of a hundred years in one. Behind its power the dwarf removes mountains and bridges rivers; civilization follows in the train.

Here, in America, where the changes of a year are equal to the changes of a century in Europe, and where the changes of a lustrum only herald greater changes; and all through change, working out that secular magnificence which is the destiny of our land.

We should be mindful of those laws that bring to the front those States upon our border whose destiny will be our own. I will not say that all the hardy sons of New England, New York, and the other Middle and Eastern States have emigrated to the West and followed the isothermal line to make up the million of men who now ask under this bill for statehood. But such an emigration of men who can grapple with the hardships of pioneer life do drain the best element of our older States.

There is a class of peculiar people remaining in New England, if not in New York. It is stranded on some rock-bound farm in some bucolic town. [Laughter.] This class generally has a big family. Its head raises blueberries in spite of the mortgage on his worthless acres. [Laughter.] He has found that the lucky, thrifty, and unshiftless neighbor has gone to the West, where no isolation depresses him, and where he is energized by new surroundings; but he remains—or it, the class, in blocks of five or fifty—on its paternal acres, while the evolution goes on which brings to the new order and new lands the fittest as survivors!

The emigration from the Eastern States constitutes the nerve, the sinew, the muscle, and the mind which penetrates the wilderness and builds up our commonwealth. It is the unaided energy which has made a million of men stand in intelligent masses and ask of the Federal Government participation in its blessings and its glories. The pioneer recks not of the past; he works in the living present. All the energies of his nature are aroused by the splendid prospect and by the glowing inspiration of budding commonwealths. Government itself is but an incident in the march of his civilization. No figures of speech, no flights of imagination can picture or compass the achievements of this State-creating and man-ennobling advancement. Like the eagle, to which our nation is often compared, he seeks a wider ether for his wing and the fire within his heart seeks the source of all illumination—the sun itself. [Cheers.]

How much nobler and wiser is the effort to install and institute such States of our own land, rather than chase the ignis fatuus of Canadian annexation. There will be time for that when our nebulous Territories put off their rudimentary and don their stately stoles of independence!

At this time in the world's history, when the overgrown nations of Europe are seeking fresh colonial dependencies, when the centers of Asia and Africa and the coasts and islands of every sea are scrutinized as homes for immigration, is it not ennobling to contemplate the quiet yet immense expansion of our numbers and our realm within our own boundaries during the past hundred years, and to feel that glowing pride over the prediction of what our country shall be when another century comes around?

This energetic and hopeful population have in their veins the vigorous blood of many races. They have inherited the material, intellectual, and moral triumphs of the Old and New Worlds and their civilizations. They settle upon soil which has no rival in richness and no peer in production. Their faith in their future is buoyant. No perplexity about their fortune; no weariness in their work; no despondency in their hope—exulting ever in their strength, these millions move on to fill up our territory from sea to sea, from Canada to the Gulf, and from north to south. Restless, active, and yet steady, like the movements of the heavenly bodies, shining as they move in orbits of their own, and yet to the casual eye fixed in our heavens as the stars.

There is a chapter in the book of Professor Bryce, whose spirit, outvying the careful analysis of De Tocqueville, is of the very essence of democratic-republicanism. It deals with the temper of the West.

A HOROSCOPE OF THE GREAT WEST.

Western America, to this author, is the most interesting subject of study which the modern world has seen. Its territories, resources, and climate; its variety of production, such as mountains of minerals, forests of trees of fabulous height, appliances of modern science, and other phenomena, make Western America, to the eye of this observer, without precedent in history. He says that it may not recur elsewhere, because our planet contains no such other favored tract of country. He lays most stress upon the character and temper of the men of this region. The West is to him the most American part of America. Here those features which distinguish America from Europe come out in the strongest relief. He exclaims:

What Europe is to Asia, what England is to the rest of Europe, what America is to Europe and England, that the Western States and Territories are to the Atlantic States. The heat and pressure and hurry of life, always growing, is that following the path of the sun.

He sees what we are very prone to forget, that in Eastern America there are still quiet spots in the valleys of the Alleghanies, in the nooks of old New England and in our university towns, which doubtless reminded him of some places in England and elsewhere in Europe, as they have reminded me of places in the Orient. But in the West there is none. All is bustle, motion, and struggle, more so, of course, among the native Americans. Yet, even the alien from the secluded valleys of Bohemia or the shores of some Norwegian fiord learns the ways almost as readily as the tongue of the country, and is soon swept into the whirlpool. This is the frontier spirit, with its passionate eagerness and strenuous effort. It would extract the greatest amount of values from mining, hills, territories, and fields, and with a passion so absorbing as to be unselfish. It takes from its very vastness a tinge of ideality. It makes routes for exchangeable commodities with a rapidity which seeks a market with one hand and throttles a monopoly with the other.

He sees this remarkable people intoxicated by the majestic scale of nature in which their lot is cast. Their imagination revels in every sight. They gild their own struggles with the belief that they are the missionaries of civilization and the instruments of Providence in the greatest work the world has ever seen. They live in the future rather than in the present; not that they fail to work while it is called to-day, but they see the country not merely as it is, but as it will be twenty, fifty, or one hundred years hence, when the seedlings shall have grown to forest trees.

Before this all-pervading spirit governments become mere incidents in the race of advancement. Their people will use governments as they use plows and saw-mills and ore-crushers and locomotives, and when they come to Congress in the robes of statehood they little care what party may have made the robes or embroidered them with land largesses for schools, political franchises for men, decent domesticates for women, and liberty and independence for all. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced the passage of a bill (S. 205) for the relief of the State National Bank of Louisiana; in which concurrence was requested.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (H. R. 5349) for the relief of James Trabue, executor of James Trabue, deceased, Thornton Thatcher, Michael Callahan, and the widow of John Waters; when the Speaker signed the same.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Before the gentleman from Dakota takes the floor, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the proposed substitute of the gentleman from Illinois, and the amendment which I understand the gentleman from Minnesota proposes to offer, be printed in the RECORD, so that members of the House may read them in the morning, with the amendments offered by the gentleman from Dakota.

The SPEAKER. The amendments offered by the gentleman from Dakota will necessarily be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MACDONALD. I ask that it include the amendments proposed by anybody.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois how much space the substitute and amendments would occupy.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is the substitute which I desire to submit.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER submitted the following substitute for "An act (S. 185) to provide for the admission of the State of South Dakota into the Union, and for the organization of the Territory of North Dakota."

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

SECTION 1. That the inhabitants of all that part of the area of the United States now constituting the Territories of Dakota, Montana, Washington, and New Mexico, as at present described, may become the States of Dakota, Montana, Washington, and New Mexico, respectively, or in lieu of the State of Dakota, the States of North Dakota and South Dakota, as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That all persons who shall have resided within the limits of said proposed States for sixty days, and are otherwise qualified by the laws of said Territories to vote for representatives to the Legislative Assemblies thereof, are hereby authorized to vote for and choose delegates to form conventions in said Territories; and the qualifications for delegates to such conventions shall be such as by the laws of said Territories respectively persons are required to possess to be eligible to the Legislative Assemblies thereof; and the aforesaid delegates to form said conventions shall be apportioned among the several counties within the limits of the proposed States, in such districts as may be established as herein provided, in proportion to the population in each of said counties and districts, as near as may be, to be ascertained at the time of making said apportionments by the persons hereinafter authorized to make the same, from the best information obtainable, in each of which districts three delegates shall be elected, but no elector shall vote for more than two persons for delegates to such conventions; that said apportionments shall be made by the governor, the chief-justice, and the United States attorney of said Territories; and the governors of said Territories shall, by proclamation, order an election of the delegates aforesaid in each of said Territories, to be held on the Tuesday after the second Monday in May, 1889, which proclamation shall be issued at least thirty days prior to the time of said election; and such election shall be conducted, the returns made, the result ascertained, and the certificates to persons elected to such conventions issued in the same manner as is prescribed by the laws of the said Territories regulating elections therein for Delegates to Congress. The number of delegates to said conventions respectively shall be seventy-five, except in the Territory of Dakota, in which the number of delegates shall be one hundred and fifty; and all persons resident in said proposed States, who are qualified voters of said Territories as herein provided, shall be entitled to vote upon the election of delegates and upon the ratification or rejection of the constitutions, under such rules and regulations as said conventions may prescribe, not in conflict with this act: Provided, That in the apportionment of delegates to the convention in the Territory of Dakota, the districts shall be so constituted that one-half of the delegates to be elected in said Territory shall be elected in districts north of the seventh standard parallel produced due west to the western boundary of said Territory, and one-half in districts south of said parallel.

SEC. 3. That at the election for delegates to the constitutional convention in the Territory of Dakota provided for in the foregoing section of this act, each qualified elector may have written or printed on his ballot the words "For division" or the words "Against division." The returns on this question shall be made and the result ascertained in the same manner as provided in said section. And if a majority of the votes cast in that part of the Territory south of the seventh standard parallel produced due west to the western boundary of said Territory shall be "For division," and also if a majority of the votes cast in that part of the Territory north of said parallel shall be "For division," then in both those events the following provisions in this section set forth shall take effect and be in force and all subsequent sections of this act shall be changed and modified accordingly, namely:

First. The area comprising the Territory of Dakota shall, for the purposes of this act, be divided on the line of the seventh standard parallel produced due west to the western boundary of said Territory; and the delegates elected to the constitutional convention in districts north of said parallel shall assemble in convention, at the time prescribed in this act, at the city of Bismarck; and the delegates elected in districts south of said parallel shall, at the same time, assemble in convention at the city of Sioux Falls. The convention which shall assemble at Bismarck shall form a constitution and State government for a State to be known as North Dakota or as Dakota, if said convention shall so determine, and the convention which shall assemble at Sioux Falls shall form a constitution and State government for a State to be known as South Dakota, or by any other name than that of Dakota which said convention may determine. Each of said conventions shall form such constitution and State government in accordance with and subject to all the provisions of this act the same as if the States of North Dakota and South Dakota had been provided for in the first section of this act, and mentioned instead of the State of Dakota in all the subsequent sections of this act.

Second. Each of the States of North Dakota and South Dakota shall be entitled to one Representative in Congress until the apportionment for Representatives in Congress under the eleventh census of the United States.

Third. If the constitutions formed for both North Dakota and South Dakota shall be rejected by the people at the election provided for in this act, the Territorial government of Dakota shall continue in existence the same as if this act had not been passed. But if the constitution formed for either North or South Dakota shall be rejected by the people, that part of the Territory so rejecting its proposed constitution shall continue under the Territorial government of the present Territory of Dakota, but shall, after the State adopting its constitution is admitted into the Union, be called by the name of the Territory of North Dakota or South Dakota, as the case may be.

SEC. 7. That sections numbered 16 and 36 in every township of said proposed States, and where such sections, or any parts thereof, have been sold or otherwise disposed of by or under the authority of any act of Congress, other lands equivalent thereto, in legal subdivisions of not less than one quarter-section, and as contiguous as may be to the section in lieu of which the same is taken, are hereby granted to said States for the support of common schools: Provided, That the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections embraced in permanent reservations for national purposes shall not at any time be subject to the grants nor to the indemnity provisions of this act, nor shall any lands embraced in Indian, military, or other reservations of any character be subject to the grants or to the indemnity provisions of this act until the reservation shall have been extinguished and such lands be restored to and become a part of the public domain.

SEC. 8. That when either or any of the proposed States shall be admitted into the Union in accordance with the provisions of this act, fifty sections of the unappropriated public lands within said State, to be selected and located in legal subdivisions by direction of the Legislature thereof, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, on or before the 1st day of January, 1892, shall be, and are hereby, granted to said State for the purpose of erecting public buildings at the capital of said State for legislative, executive, and judicial purposes.

In all cases where actual settlers have located, resided upon, and made valuable improvements on section 16 or 36, prior to the 1st day of January, 1890, with the intention in good faith of purchasing such lands from the State upon its admission, the respective Legislatures may provide for disposing of so much of the lands so settled upon, to such settlers, their heirs, or legal representatives, at a price not less than $6 per acre, to be fixed by appraisement of the value of the lands, exclusive of improvements.

SEC. 70. That in lieu of the grant of land for purposes of internal improvement made to new States by the eighth section of the act of September 4, 1841, which act is hereby repealed as to the States provided for by this act, and in lieu of any claim or demand by the said States, or either of them, under the act of September 28, 1850, and section 2479 of the Revised Statutes, making a grant of swamp and overflowed lands to certain States, which grant it is hereby declared is not extended to the States provided for in this act, and in lieu of any grant of saline lands to said States of Montana, Washington, and New Mexico, the following grants of land are hereby made, to wit:

To the State of Montana: For the establishment and maintenance of a school of mines, 100,000 acres; for State normal schools, 100,000 acres; for agricultural colleges, in addition to the grant hereinbefore made for that purpose, 50,000 acres; for the establishment of a State reform school, 50,000 acres; for the establishment of a deaf and dumb asylum, 50,000 acres; for public buildings at the capital of the State, in addition to the grant hereinbefore made for that purpose, 150,000 acres.

To the State of New Mexico: For the establishment of permanent water reservoirs for irrigating purposes, 250,000 acres; for the establishment of an insane asylum, 50,000 acres; for the establishment of State normal schools, 50,000 acres; for the establishment of a school of mines, 50,000 acres; for the establishment of a deaf and dumb asylum, 50,000 acres; for the establishment of a reform school, 50,000 acres.

To the State of Washington: For the establishment and maintenance of a scientific school, 100,000 acres; for State normal schools, 100,000 acres; for public buildings at the State capital, in addition to the grant hereinbefore made for that purpose, 100,000 acres; for State charitable, educational, penal, and reformatory institutions, 200,000 acres.

That the States provided for in this act shall not be entitled to any further or other grants of land for any purpose than as expressly provided in this act. And the lands granted by this section shall be held, appropriated, and disposed of exclusively for the purposes herein mentioned, in such manner as the Legislatures of the respective States may severally provide.

SEC. 71. That all lands granted in quantity or as indemnity by this act shall be selected under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior from the surveyed, unreserved, and unappropriated public lands of the United States within the limits of the respective States entitled thereto. And there shall be deducted from the number of acres of land donated by this act for specific objects to said States the number of acres in each heretofore donated by Congress to said Territories for similar objects.

SEC. 72. That the conventions herein provided for shall have the power to provide, by ordinance, for the transfer of actions, cases, proceedings, and matters pending in the supreme or district courts of the Territories of Montana, Washington, and New Mexico at the time of their admission into the Union, arising within said Territories, respectively, to such courts as shall be established under the constitutions to be formed as provided in this act; and no indictment, action, or proceeding shall abate by reason of any change in the courts, but shall be proceeded with in the State courts according to the laws thereof.

SEC. 73. That the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to each of said Territories for defraying the expenses of the said conventions, and for the payment of the members thereof, under the same rules and regulations and at the same rates as are now provided by law for the payment of the Territorial Legislatures. Any money hereby appropriated not necessary for such purpose shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 74. That the constitutional conventions may, by ordinance, provide for the election of full State governments, including members of the Legislatures and Representatives in Congress; but said State governments of North Dakota, Montana, Washington, and New Mexico shall remain in abeyance until the constitutions framed by said conventions shall have been approved by Congress. In case the constitution of any of said proposed States shall be ratified by the people, but not otherwise, the Legislature thereof may assemble, organize, and elect two Senators of the United States; and the governor and secretary of state of such proposed State shall certify the election to Congress; and when the constitution so framed is approved by Congress, and such State admitted into the Union by special act of Congress therefor, the Senators and Representatives shall be admitted to seats in Congress, and to all the rights and privileges of Senators and Representatives of other States in the Congress of the United States; and the State governments formed in pursuance of said constitution, as provided by the constitutional conventions, shall proceed to exercise all the functions of State officers; and all laws in force, made by said Territories, at the time of their admission into the Union, shall be in force in said States, except as modified or changed by this act or by the constitutions of the States, respectively.

SEC. 75. That the constitutional convention to assemble in the Territory of New Mexico, as hereinbefore provided, may submit to the people, as a separate proposition to be voted upon at the same time that the vote upon the constitution is taken, the question of changing the name of the State from that of the State of New Mexico to that of such name as such convention may propose, and if a majority of voters shall be in the affirmative the name of the State shall, upon its admission, be Montezuma; and all the powers, rights, privileges, grants, and obligations pertaining under this act to the State of New Mexico shall attach to, be vested in, and imposed upon the State of Montezuma; and the constitutional convention of Washington Territory shall, in like manner, and with like effect, submit to the people the question of changing the name of that State from Washington to Tacoma.

SEC. 76. That all acts or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act, whether passed by the Legislatures of said Territories or by Congress, are hereby repealed.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to enable the people of Dakota, Montana, Washington, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, to provide for the division of Dakota into two States, and to make donations of public lands to such States."

Amend further by striking out the preamble of said bill.

By Mr. COX:

On pages 4 and 5 of substitute strike out all after the word "second" to the end of the paragraph, and insert "the State of North Dakota shall be entitled to one Representative in Congress and South Dakota shall be entitled to two Representatives in Congress until the apportionment under the eleventh census of the United States.

By Mr. ADAMS:

Amendment No. 1 to S. 185: In section 1, line 7, strike out the words "South Dakota" and insert in lieu thereof "that part of the Territory of Dakota lying south of the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude."

Amendment No. 2: In section 1, line 8, strike out "subject, however, to the provisos hereinafter contained" and insert in lieu thereof "as the constitution of the State of South Dakota."

Amendment No. 3: Strike out sections 26, 27, 28, and 29.

Mr. GIFFORD. Before proceeding I wish to ask unanimous consent that a memorial or petition of the convention of North Dakota be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The memorial is as follows:

NORTH DAKOTA'S REQUEST.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States Congress:

The undersigned, a committee appointed at a convention held in the city of Jamestown, Dak., on the 5th day of December, A. D. 1888, for the purpose of considering the question of division of said Territory and the admission into the Union of the northern portion thereof, at which convention all counties north of the seventh standard parallel of north latitude were represented, respectfully represent that said convention unanimously agreed that Dakota Territory should be divided on the seventh standard parallel; that the northern portion thereof should be speedily admitted into the Union of States; that it should be admitted under the name of North Dakota, and that the Fiftieth Congress provide for such admission.

Illinois was admitted into the Union with a population of 31,420; Kentucky, 73,677; Tennessee, 67,096; Ohio, 45,365; Indiana, 63,897; Missouri, 66,557; Michigan, 65,000; Florida, 64,000; Iowa, 78,819; California, 92,597; Oregon, 50,000; Nevada, 40,000; Nebraska and Colorado, 100,000; and Minnesota, 120,000. The said committee appointed as above state, as facts showing the qualifications of the said section of Dakota Territory for statehood, the following:

North Dakota has an area of 72,000 square miles. It contains over 40,000 cultivated farms, or over 1,000,000 acres of cultivated land, showing the surprising fact that it contains nearly one cultivated farm for each voting inhabitant, and if admitted would be the ninth State in the Union in area of territory. It had in 1885 a population of 152,199, and from facts appearing from the assessors' returns in 1885 it is shown to now have a population of more than 245,000, or more than twice the number required of any of the States above named, and more than six times as many as Illinois or Nevada contained when admitted to statehood. It has 700 manufacturing establishments of various kinds, 150,000 head of horses and mules, and over 600,000 head of live-stock, 2,000 miles of completed railroads, 129 newspapers, more than 200 churches, 1,137 public school-houses, and an assessed valuation of $70,039,893, and paid a postal revenue in 1885 of $140,534.

It has as public Territorial buildings: The capitol building at Bismarck; hospital for the insane at Jamestown; the penitentiary at Bismarck, and North Dakota University at Grand Forks, costing in all more than $900,000.

It has a Congregational college at Fargo; a Baptist college at Tower City; a Presbyterian college at Jamestown, and Ursalyn college at Grand Forks.

There were raised in North Dakota in 1888 more than 20,000,000 bushels of wheat and 11,000,000 bushels of oats and barley.

It is universally conceded that whenever any Territory possesses the qualifications presented by North Dakota, such Territory shall be admitted into the Union on terms of equality with older States.

North Dakota having attained to all the conditions of statehood according to any and all precedents heretofore observed for the admission of States, these conditions should entitle its citizens by all laws and rules of civil government to the rights enjoyed by an equal population in any one of the States. Which rights can be long withheld without the perpetration of a great wrong, and which can find explanation only in the ability to inflict it.

Now, therefore, the people of North Dakota, through its committee appointed as aforesaid, without regard to political preferences, do most respectfully ask and petition your honorable bodies to enact such measures as will divide the present Territory of Dakota on the seventh standard parallel. Pass an enabling act or such other measure as will most speedily provide for our adoption of a constitution, election of proper officers, and admission into the Union of States.

R. N. STEVENS,
SMITH STIMMEL,
J. MORLEY WYARD,
Committee appointed by the Convention.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I will first notice some of the objections raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to the details or provisions of the constitution of the proposed State of South Dakota, and of the Senate bill. Some of these objections are of public importance, concerning the whole country, and no doubt must be adjusted by Congress. His first objection is in regard to the vote cast upon the adoption of this constitution by our people. There were thirty-odd thousand votes cast upon the adoption of the constituton; and permit me to say that no greater or larger vote has been cast in the whole history of the admission of States upon the adoption of a first constitution, with but one exception, and that was the State of Minnesota. The vote cast in Dakota was satisfactory to the people there. No objection has ever been offered to it. It was a full, free, and fair vote.

Now, in regard to the legislative apportionment under that constitution. This same answer which I shall make will apply to several of these objections. If the State of South Dakota, or the proposed State of South Dakota, had been admitted when it should have been, some years ago, these objections would not be tenable. They would not lie against the provisions of the constitution, provided that Dakota had been admitted into the Union during the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress. The adjustment of our legislative districts and all details in regard to the apportionment would have been perfectly proper and just. Of course they need readjustment, and if the delays in regard to the admission of Dakota be continued much longer we would need still further changes in the constitution.

Another objection which the gentleman from Illinois makes is in regard to this election committee. I mean the committee to audit the expenses, etc., of our constitutional convention. He says that extraordinary powers were conferred upon that committee. Mr. Speaker, not one word of criticism has ever been made upon the action of that committee, nor upon the manner in which they performed or executed their duties—not one word of reflection has ever been cast upon them, and if they had extraordinary powers, then it redounds to their credit that they did not exercise those powers improperly.

Another matter to which the gentleman from Illinois refers demands special attention. That is the question of the adjustment of the State debt and the disposition of the archives, etc. Our people have wisely provided for this very contingency. They propose not to suffer any such embarassment as has been suffered by the States of Virginia and West Virginia in the past. They propose that this whole matter of the adjustment of the State debt and the disposition of the joint property shall be arranged, and I will read the provision of the Senate bill in regard to that:

SEC. 24. That in accordance with the stipulations contained in section 5 of article 13 of said constitution of said State of South Dakota, there is hereby apportioned to the State of South Dakota, and said State shall assume, be liable for, and pay, all the indebtedness of the Territory of Dakota incurred for public buildings of the Territory which are built and situated or which are provided by law to be built within the limits of said State; and the Territory of North Dakota shall assume and be liable for all the indebtedness of the Territory of Dakota incurred for public buildings of the Territory which are built and situated or which are provided by law to be built within the limits of said Territory of North Dakota.

Then follows the provision in regard to the Congress of the United States making further adjustment in case any matter shall remain unprovided for under this act. What better, what more business-like provision could you ask for than that? And our constitution further provides that there shall be furnished to North Dakota, at the expense of South Dakota, a complete record of everything they wish for, and we have to pay for that out of our own pocket. In this connection I wish to notice a provision in the substitute bill which will be found on page 5, the fifth subdivision of section 3. It says it shall be the duty of the constitutional conventions of North and South Dakota to appoint a joint commission to be composed of not less than three members of each convention. Now, supposing they do not do that, what then? Why, this act fails. A part of the duty imposed upon those conventions is to do this and appoint the commissioners. This is to be a joint body composed of three commissioners from North Dakota and three from South Dakota. Supposing they do not agree, there is no other body to which they can appeal. There is no provision made for anything further in regard to this, and in case of disagreement your bill fails and Dakota is not admitted.

Mr. SPRINGER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. That part of it fails, but that is all. That is not made a condition-precedent.

Mr. GIFFORD. It is one of the duties to be performed by this convention.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, but if they should come to Congress and say that they could not agree, we might let that pass; but I think the duty should be urged upon them.

Mr. GIFFORD. Supposing that they fail to agree, then what? Why, the whole measure fails. The embarrassment and the trouble caused by this property still remaining joint property would still hang over us. Is not our provision a much better one? In case of a disagreement there can be no readjustment of the joint debt. No appeal lies to anybody, and there is no provision in the omnibus bill for any other way of adjustment.

Ours is a perfect act within itself. It leads to an absolute adjustment of every question that can arise in connection with this subject.

There is another question here to which the gentleman has referred which requires special mention, and that is found in subdivision 2, of section 4, in reference to Indian lands and Indian property. I desire to say in this connection that this constitution and the Senate bill underwent severe criticism on this point in the Senate committee, and in the Senate itself when it was considered and discussed there. It is precisely the same provision that has been placed in the compact between the States in several instances and the United States upon their admission to the Union. There can no trouble arise out of that provision. Why, sir, our Territory has had jurisdiction over certain Indians for many years, and those Indians have suffered no hardships in consequence. The provision is the usual one.

But I want to call attention now to the peculiar provisions of this subdivision of this section. I can not imagine where the gentleman from Illinois found them or what he drew them from. They are most extraordinary. Why, sir, under this subdivision if a man who has a single drop of Indian blood in his veins holds a section of land we can not even lay out a highway over it. We can not exercise any right of eminent domain over the land, no matter whether he has held it one year, or twenty-five years, or fifty years; and every man is held to be an Indian who has Indian blood in his veins, and there are many such in Dakota. I will read the provision:

Second. That the people inhabiting said proposed States do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within the boundaries thereof, and to all lands lying within said limits owned or held by any Indian or Indian tribes.

We must have jurisdiction over these Indians to a certain extent.

We are perfectly willing that the United States shall exercise jurisdiction over the lands belonging to Indian tribes, and over all public lands.

Under the Senate bill and the Constitution we will have no more jurisdiction over these matters than has the State of Michigan, Minnesota, or any other State.

We are to recognize tribal relations in connection with Indians for only a very short time longer. Our proposed State can not submit or consent to any such provisions as these.

Except such lands as have been or may be granted to any Indian or Indians under any act of Congress containing a provision exempting the lands thus granted from taxation.

That provision is all right. We have no objection to the usual provision for the protection of Indians in their property, but extraordinary provisions of the character found in this bill are unjust and ought not to be made.

I apprehend that if this bill fails it will be for other reasons than defects in the Sioux Falls constitution; or that the proceedings in connection therewith are improper or ill considered in detail. I do not suppose that Congress, nor any Member or Senator, will undertake to dictate to a people the provisions of their constitution, except in such several matters as concern public policy and the spirit of our Government.

If this bill for the admission of South Dakota as a separate proposition fails in this House it will be because a majority of the members are unwilling to vote upon and determine the claims of South Dakota for statehood, without coupling with it some other question which may determine the fate of the bill, without even touching the merits of Dakota's claim. Certainly, then, objections to our constitution can not have much weight in deciding this question.

I am only surprised that more and greater objections have not been found to it. There have been for three years among the files of this House and the Senate complete, engrossed, and certified copies of the proceedings of the convention which framed this constitution; records of everything done, votes taken and words spoken in that convention, are now and have been for years here for inspection. All of the proceedings of our people in connection with this business from first to last are and have been for years a public record in possession of this House; and it appears that the only mistakes we have made are in not stating specifically that a woman shall not be a judge, and that we have been too liberal with the right of suffrage.

If gentlemen will take the trouble to examine the constitution of several States they will find identically the same provisions.

Considerable stress is placed upon the fact that it is proposed to resubmit this constitution and many questions therein contained to a vote of the people of the proposed State. If this matter had been disposed of when it should have been, nothing would now be heard of these propositions.

Our people, in connection with those of North Dakota, desire that the name "Dakota" shall attach to both sections. We undertook in the beginning to satisfy some sentimental people concerning this matter of name, and we found it much more difficult to satisfy them than ourselves, and have gone back to our first love. Not a very serious matter—simply one of adjustment, and only requires a formal vote of our people. I wish to say that our people desire the names of North and South Dakota. They are attached to the name of Dakota just as strongly as the members of a family or the people of a community or State are attached to a favorite name of their own. And why should we not have it? If we are willing to live and grow up under these names, why not be permitted to do so?

Undoubtedly our great prairies will bloom as brightly and our people be as prosperous and happy under another name; but why can not we be accorded the privilege that has been given to every family, tribe, city, community, and State since the "morning stars sang together," and have given us the name of our choice? It is dear to us, we are attached to it and we want it. It not only represents blizzards, but it represents warmth and sunshine; not only the hardships incidental to a frontier prairie life, but also as well a country of unexampled fertility and productiveness, and a people qualified and anxious to perform their whole duty in life, both to themselves and to the Government.

Another formal question to be submitted is a slight change to our proposed northern boundary to a fixed, surveyed line, a difference of only three or four miles, perhaps.

The other questions that were submitted to our people with the constitution as separate propositions it is proposed to resubmit to them. There is nothing unusual or strange about this. Quite likely it would have been done anyway about this time had we been admitted as a State three years ago, when we should have been. Among other propositions we propose to submit the question of the location of the temporary capital.

Among these questions is prohibition. Our constitution provides for submitting amendments, provided a majority of the Legislature so determine. This was done that we might have, as the country grew, a ready means for amending the constitution.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say again, if this bill fails it will be because gentlemen are unwilling to meet this question squarely. Nobody will be misled, neither now or hereafter, by coupling with it the question of the admission of other Territories, to which some people have objections.

The people of Dakota would like to see this question presented and decided upon its merits. South Dakota is satisfied with this constitution and the State government they have provided for; and the people of North Dakota are perfectly willing this should be done.

We want no further vote upon this question of division. Not even a petition, not even a letter, so far as I have heard, has been written or sent during the present session of Congress either protesting against the passage of the Senate bill or asking for another vote on division. Our people are not asking for anything of the kind.

The question is, will the House consider and pass upon the claims of our people for statehood as an independent proposition? It is conceded by all that we are fully prepared and qualified to enter the Union. This was conceded years ago, and still we live under a miserable, unsatisfactory, Territorial government. Our condition would be almost unbearable did we not feel that relief would soon be given.

Think of a Territory containing 700,000 people, with a wealth of $320,000,000, as estimated by the governor of the Territory in his last report, with more than 4,500 school-houses, over 5,000 teachers, with a school fund of nearly $2,500,000 and a thousand post-offices. What a criticism upon the theory that our Government is in favor of home-rule and self-government Dakota furnishes! It costs us almost $700,000 per annum to support our Territorial government and public institutions. An average of almost $45,000 per annum of this is paid by the United States, and the balance is paid by our people and out of their own pockets.

Not one of the officers who disburse and pay out these Territorial moneys is chosen by the people. Not one of them is responsible to the people for his official acts. Every one is appointed by a governor who comes from abroad. They are responsible only to those who appoint them, and not to the people whose money they handle and whose laws they execute. Not a public officer in our Territory above county officers is elected. Even clerks of court are appointed.

In the matter of insufficiency of our courts, the sufferings of our people have been intolerable. Dockets are two and three years behind, and parties charged with crime have awaited in confinement for almost years a trial, simply because the judge had more business than he could possibly reach. Counties with many thousands of people and with populous towns have had no court at all, in some cases, and in many others not to exceed three days in a year. Crimes go unpunished and property rights are frittered away from sheer lack of sufficient courts.

Dakota to-day is a province, and not a Territory, except in name; as much a province in the formation of its government as was ever attached to the British Empire.

We are in no sense a Territory. We are ruled over by officers not of our choosing. We bear the expense of our own government, schools and all, to within $30,000 or $40,000 per annum, and our people pay more than three times these sums back into the Treasury as internal revenue.

Even our postal service would be more than self-supporting were it not for the great transcontinental service across the Territory. Comparisons are ofttimes instructive, but generally odious. I can scarcely forbear making a few comparisons between our Territory and some States; I mean our Territory as a whole.

First, as to population, wealth, and material prosperity. The area of the proposed State of South Dakota will be about 75,000 square miles and North Dakota the same area or larger. The country is eminently an agricultural country throughout, and capable of supporting as dense a population as any of the States adjoining us—Minnesota, Wisconsin, Illinois, Iowa, or Nebraska—which can be easily shown by reference to the official report on immigration of Dakota and official census reports.

The number of farms in Dakota in 1885 was 50,235 in the south and 31,781 in the north, according to the official census. From reliable data there are now nearly 70,000 in the south and over 40,000 in the north.

The crop reports of 1887—those of 1888 are not in—show that we raised nearly 60,000,000 bushels of wheat and 25,000,000 bushels of corn, while hundreds of thousands of horses and cattle graze upon our boundless and fertile prairies.

In the matter of stock, we have more cattle than any one of twenty-one States; more horses than any one of twenty States; more swine than any one of fourteen States; more sheep than any one of twelve States.

In the matter of banking institutions, we have sixty-two national and two hundred and thirty-seven private banks; we have more banks than either one of twenty-eight States, including Indiana, Connecticut, California, Kentucky, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Texas, and Colorado.

We have more than the eight States of North Carolina, West Virginia, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Delaware, and Nevada combined; more than twice the number credited to the States of Maine, New Jersey, New Hampshire, or Maryland; nearly three times as many as Georgia, Virginia, Colorado, or Tennessee combined; and more than the States of Vermont, Oregon, and all the Territories put together.

In the matter of railways, we have nearly 4,500 miles of completed railroad in Dakota, and more than is contained in any one of twenty-five States of the Union that could be named, it being the thirteenth State in this regard.

I do not care to enter upon a comparison of school-houses, educational institutions, and expenditures for educational purposes with other States.

Suffice it to say that we have nearly, or quite, 4,500 school-houses, with about 5,500 teachers, and expended nearly $2,500,000 for school purposes, the proceeds of taxes raised by the people, or more than was expended by any one of twenty-two States in 1885.

These figures and comparisons will give the House some idea of our population and wealth, which is so essential to every State and community.

But we have not neglected that important particular, which may be regarded as the foundation of true greatness in every State, the education of our children.

Dakota may justly feel proud of her common-school system and the educational advantages which are placed within the reach of every youth of the Territory.

We have two Territorial universities, three normal schools (Territorial), and an agricultural college, besides a school of mines and one for deaf-mutes, and also a very large number of sectarian colleges and academies belonging to different religious denominations.

In the matter of the value of school property Dakota exceeds any one of twenty-three of the States. Not one dollar of money or aid have we received from the Government towards the support of our schools either from lands or in any other way. Our public lands are not yet available for school purposes.

As another evidence of the intelligence of our people, it is proper to state that we have in Dakota three hundred and fifty-two different newspapers, and more than are published in any one of twenty-three States.

In the matter of post-offices, we have forty-six Presidential offices, and nine hundred and sixty fourth-class offices; a number equal to or exceeding that of any one of twenty-two States.

But, Mr. Speaker, I grow weary of giving these statistics and comparisons, however interesting and instructive upon this question they may be. I could continue to do so indefinitely, and each comparison given would only make stronger the argument in favor of the proposition I have presented.

It must be remembered that the proposed State of North Dakota contains at least 300,000 people, and South Dakota 400,000, and that each of the proposed States contains a like proportion of the material wealth and educational advantages possessed by the whole Territory.

North Dakota had a population, even under the census of 1885, which was official, of 152,199, and South Dakota 263,465, and there have been added at least 150,000 people to each of the two sections since.

It is admitted, indeed there can be no question, that so far as population is concerned in the matter of the admission of new States, the basis is that there shall be a sufficient number to entitle them to a Representative in the lower House of Congress, and therefore there can be no question about the eligibility of each of the proposed States to admission so far as population, wealth, material prosperity, and capacity for self-government are concerned.

The total vote of Dakota at the last election, held in November, 1888, for the election of Delegate to Congress was 114,500, of which nearly 71,000 was cast in South Dakota and over 43,000 in North Dakota. There are something over forty counties in the Territory unorganized, which contain a considerable population that is not allowed to vote.

I append the following from the last report of the governor, 1888, in regard to our population:

The population of Dakota in 1860, according to the national census of that year, was less than 5,000; in 1870 it was 14,181, showing an increase during that decade of about 200 per cent.; in 1880 the number of inhabitants in the Territory amounted to 135,177, or an addition of 850 per cent. to the population of the previous census, and five years later this number had increased, as shown by a Federal census, to 415,610, a gain of more than 200 per cent. in the period between the years 1880 and 1885.

There has been no official count of the population since the Federal census of 1885, and the only figures available for the years 1886, 1887, and 1888 are estimates approximately correct, made by the commissioner of immigration, and based on the public-land entries as reported by the ten United States land offices within the Territory.

On June 30, 1886, the commissioner estimated the number of Dakota's inhabitants to amount to 500,000 souls. A year later, June 30, 1887, the same authority gave the Territory a population of 568,477; and his estimate for the year ending June 30, 1888, indicates a gain, since the date of my last report, of 62,346, or a total population to-day of 640,823. This, of course, does not include Indians, Government employés, nor the other inhabitants of the numerous Indian and military reservations, which cover one-fifth of the entire area of the Territory. Add these, and the whole number of people within the boundaries of Dakota will approach closely to 700,000.

The proportion of foreign-born to the entire population is about one in three, or at least that was the ratio in 1885, as shown by the Federal census, and there is no reason to suppose it has changed very much with the increase during the three years since that enumeration.

A majority of the settlers of foreign nativity are Scandinavians; next come the Germans, Canadians, Irish, and Russians in the order mentioned. One can scarcely name a foreign country which is unrepresented among the inhabitants of the Territory. Colonies of Jews from Poland, Mennonites from Russia, Turks from Roumelia, natives from Iceland, and representatives of nearly every clime, color, and religious sect upon the globe are here engaged side by side in that struggle for home and independence which marks the better civilization of the world.

But as the admixture of the brain and the brawn of the world has produced in our nation a race which ranks in energy, intelligence, and all the distinguishing traits of civilization, just so has this commingling, in the settlement of Dakota, of the best elements of foreign and native ambition and enterprise yielded its return in a prosperous people whose happy homes and well-tilled farms surround the thrifty villages, marked by towering spire of church and school.

Mr. Speaker, what are the qualifications of a Territory or people for statehood? It is conceded that they must possess—

Those conditions as to area, productiveness, capacity, population, loyalty, and good disposition of her people as are in keeping and in harmony with the spirit of our Constitution and policy of our Government.

Does the proposed State of South Dakota possess these qualifications? I need not reiterate what has been said regarding this in the many speeches and reports both in this and the other end of the Capitol. As I understand, there remains no question over our possessing these qualifications.

Then, sir, have not the people of the proposed State of South Dakota an absolute constitutional right to be admitted as a State? We claim it as a matter of right. In the language of the appeal that was made in behalf of California:

These people request admission to the Union as a State. They understand and estimate the advantages which will accrue to them from such a connection, while they trust they do not too highly compute those that will be conferred upon their brethren.

They do not present themselves as suppliants, nor do they bear themselves with arrogance or presumption. They come as free American citizens, by treaty, by adoption, and by birth, and ask that they may be permitted to reap the common benefits, share the common ills, and promote the common welfare as one of the United States of America.

There has been considerable discussion over the question of the right of a Territory, qualified in all respects to be admitted as a State—an absolute constitutional right. Can there be any question regarding that proposition?

It is true there is no court or tribunal wherein the right may be tried or enforced. No decree can be rendered, no mandate issued, therefore we appeal to Congress again and again. An act of Congress is necessary to admit a State. Some claim that it is discretionary with Congress whether to admit Dakota or not. Then to refuse us admission, under the circumstances, is an abuse of discretion, proportionate with the wrong and injury of depriving us of statehood.

Abuse of discretion has dethroned kings, destroyed courts, and impeached judges. It has frequently deprived parties of political power in the history of our own country. Our people have but one recourse left, if Congress does not give us justice, and that is to appeal to the popular sense and fairness of the American people at a general election. Let the people of the country understand the case of Dakota, which they in part do, and there can be no doubt of the result.

Dakota was organized as a Territory in 1861, and was carved out of the Louisiana purchase. It was proposed in the celebrated treaty between Napoleon as the representative of the French, and Jefferson of our people, that the inhabitants of that region should have guarantied to them all the rights of American citizenship, including the right of admission into the Union of States. The treaty was more far reaching than the mere cession of territory to be ruled and governed as the United States should see proper. It contemplated, and the obligation was assumed on the part of our Government, to ingraft and incorporate the people who might settle in the new Territory into full rights of citizenship, including self-government and statehood.

The third article of the treaty is as follows:

The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and in the mean time they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess.

What can be plainer than this?

Is there any "discretionary" ground in this stipulation, provided it is conceded the necessary conditions regarding population, intelligence, etc., exist?

This provision of the treaty was in harmony with a policy this Government adopted at and even before its formation.

Some years before, and prior to the adoption of the Federal Constitution, certain of the States had ceded and relinquished to the United States all of their several claims to a vast region which lay northwest of the river Ohio. In order to govern this territory, and also to inevitably destine to admission into the Union the commonwealths which it was clearly seen would arise within it, the ordinance of 1787 was enacted. This revered instrument, like the Constitution which immediately followed it, was framed by statesmen who "looked into the seeds of time to see which grain would grow and which would not." It also provided in most explicit language of law and of inviolable compact that the communities thereafter to come into being in that territory should, under certain conditions, be entitled to enter the Union as it then was, without the formality of special precedent license.

The ordinance of 1787 provided as follows:

SEC. 13. And for extending the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty, which form the basis whereon these republics, their laws and constitutions, are erected; to fix and establish those principles as the basis of all laws, constitutions, and governments which forever hereafter shall be formed in the said Territory; to provide also for the establishment of States, and permanent governments therein, and for their admission to a share in the Federal councils, on an equal footing with the original States, at as early periods as may be consistent with the general interests.

SEC. 14. It is hereby ordained and declared by the authority aforesaid that the following articles shall be considered as articles of compact between the original States and the people and the States in said Territory, and forever remain unalterable, except by common consent, to wit:

* * * * * * *

Whenever any of said States shall have 60,000 inhabitants therein, such State shall be admitted by its delegates into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State government.

By this ordinance Virginia, with a generosity that has been of immeasurable benefit to our Union, ceded to the Government the territory out of which the great and populous States of Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, and Illinois were taken.

This ordinance was over and over again extended after the adoption of the Federal Constitution to territory of which Dakota now forms a part.

We see, upon examination, that the ordinance of 1787 and the Louisiana treaty have been successfully and repeatedly used as authority for the right of new States to be admitted to the Union. No better authority or language regarding the duty of Congress to admit new States need be given than the following from Chief-Justice Taney in the Dred Scott case (19 Howard, 446):

In the case of Dred Scott vs. Sandford (19 How., 446), the court (Chief-Justice Taney delivering the opinion) said upon this subject:

"There is certainly no power given by the Constitution to the Federal Government to establish and maintain colonies bordering on the United States, or at a distance, to be ruled and governed at its own pleasure, nor to enlarge its territorial limits in any way except by the admission of new States. That power is plainly given, and if a new State is admitted it needs no further legislation by Congress, because the Constitution itself defines the relative rights and powers and duties of the State, and the citizens of the State, and the Federal Government. But no power is given to acquire a Territory to be acquired and held permanently in that character.

* * * * * * *

"We do not mean, however, to question the power of Congress in this respect. The power to expand the United States by the admission of new States is plainly given; and in the construction of this power, by all the departments of the Government, it has been held to authorize the acquisition of territory not fit for admission at the time, but to be admitted as soon as its population and situation entitle it to admission. It is acquired to become a State, and not to be held as a colony and governed by Congress with absolute authority; and as the propriety of admitting a new State is committed to the sound discretion of Congress, the power to acquire territory for that purpose, to be held by the United States until it is in a suitable condition to become a State upon an equal footing with the other States, must rest upon the same discretion."

Appeals have been made over and over again and repeatedly sustained in behalf of other States based upon this article of the treaty quoted above, and also upon the ordinance of 1787, and their application to us. I quote the following from the report submitted in the Senate upon the Dakota bill, as follows, concerning the ordinance of 1787:

The ordinance of 1787 gave to the Northwestern Territory at first a colonial form of government. The executive, legislative, and judicial powers were lodged in officers appointed by Congress. But this was of necessity and temporary. So soon as 5,000 inhabitants were found in the district, authority was given to the people to elect a legislature and to enact laws. The end to which these expedients of government looked was statehood. In the fifth article it was provided:

"And whenever any of the said States shall have 60,000 free inhabitants therein such State shall be admitted, by its delegates, into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State government: Provided, The constitution and government so to be formed shall be republican and in conformity to the principles contained in these articles; and so far as it can be, consistent with the general interest of confederacy, such admission shall be allowed at an earlier period and when there may be a less number of free inhabitants in the State than 60,000."

By an act of Congress passed April 20, 1836 (5 Stat. L., p. 10), the Territory of Wisconsin was organized, and embraced within its limits a large, perhaps the larger, part of the present Territory of Dakota. Section 12 of that act extended all the rights, privileges, and advantages secured to the people of the Northwest Territory by the ordinance of 1787 to the inhabitants of the Territory of Wisconsin. A prior act of Congress, relating to the Territory of Michigan, which embraced all that part of Dakota east of the Missouri and White Earth Rivers, and a later act, relating to the Territory of Minnesota, which included the same region west of the Mississippi, also expressly guarantied to the people the privileges and advantages o the ordinance of 1787.

The ordinance of 1787 was a wise and beneficent compact. It guarantied certain rights to the people who should settle the western wilderness, and among the most valuable of these was the right to form a State government and to be admitted on terms of equality to the Union of the States. The hardy men and women who pushed back our frontier and developed the vast resources of the West were to be also builders of States. We do not stop to discuss at any length the question whether one of these States contemplated by the ordinance of 1787 could become de jure and de facto a State without the sanction of Congress. The existence of a State is a political fact, and involves the admission of its Senators and Representatives to the Congress of the United States. Again, by the terms of the compact the right of admission as a State was upon the condition that "the constitution and government so to be formed shall be republican and in conformity to the principles contained in these articles." Congress must judge whether these conditions have been complied with.

Whatever views may be entertained by the committee regarding a strict construction of the Louisiana treaty and the ordinance of 1787, it certainly will strike the average mind that Congress is under an "imperious moral obligation" to admit both North and South Dakota as States into the Union, if the conditions as to area, production, capacity, population, good disposition towards the Government and institutions of the country are found to exist.

It appears that Dakota comes within the provision both of the ordinance and the treaty.

Time and again have Territories within the great region included within the ordinance and treaty proceeded, as we have done in South Dakota, in the formation of a constitution and State government without authority of Congress, and over and over again have this treaty and ordinance been quoted and invoked as authority therefor.

Now, what is the history of other Territories regarding this matter of admission?

By the act of March 26, 1804, the Louisiana purchase was divided into two Territories. That portion north of the thirty-third parallel of latitude was constituted the Territory of Orleans.

By the act of March 2, 1805, a Territorial government was instituted for this Territory, and it was ordained that the inhabitants thereof "shall be entitled to enjoy all the rights, privileges, and advantages secured by such ordinance (1787) and now enjoyed by the inhabitants of the Mississippi Territory."

This act further provided that—

"The inhabitants of the Territory shall be authorized to form for themselves a constitution and State government, and be admitted into the Union upon the footing of the original States in all respects, conformably to the third article of the treaty of Paris. * * * Provided, That the constitution shall be republican in form and not inconsistent with the ordinance of 1787, so far as the same is made applicable to the Territory of Orleans: Provided, That Congress shall be at liberty at any time prior to the admission of the inhabitants of the said Territory to the rights of a separate State, to alter the boundaries thereof as they shall judge proper, except only that no alteration shall be made which shall procrastinate the period for the admission of the inhabitants thereof to the rights of a State government according to the provisions of this act."

It will have been observed that the provisions of the ordinance of 1787 were extended to the Territory of Louisiana to the same extent that they were enjoyed by the inhabitants of the Territory of Mississippi.

The application of this ordinance to that Territory was by the act of April 7, 1798, and it provided that the people of the Territory of Mississippi—

"Shall be entitled to enjoy all and singular the rights, privileges, and advantages granted to the people of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio"—

By the ordinance of 1787—

"in as full and ample a manner as the same are possessed and enjoyed by the people of the last-mentioned Territory."

The Territory of Missouri was established by the act of June 4, 1812. By implication these rights were continued to the people of that Territory, the act repealing only the repugnant portions of the acts in reference to the Territory of Louisiana.

The present Territory of Dakota has been, in part, successively a part of the Territories of Missouri, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, and Minnesota, and in part of the Louisiana purchase. By the act of June 28, 1834, all that region north of Missouri, and east of the Missouri River, and west of the Mississippi River, and south of the northern boundary of the United States, was attached to the Territory of Michigan by an act which provided that—

"The inhabitants therein shall be entitled to the same privileges and immunities, and be subject to the same laws, rules, and regulations, in all respects, as the other citizens of Michigan Territory."

By act of April 20, 1836, this region last described was transferred to the Territory of Wisconsin, and it was provided—

"That the inhabitants of the said Territory shall be entitled to and enjoy all and singular the rights, privileges, and advantages granted and secured to the people of the territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio River, by the articles of the compact contained in the ordinance for the government of the said territory, passed on the 13th day of July, 1787."

Iowa became a Territory by the act of June 12, 1838, and comprised all the Territory of Wisconsin west of the Mississippi River and west of a line drawn due north from its headwaters to the international boundary. This act provided that—

"The inhabitants of the said Territory shall be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities heretofore granted and secured to the Territory of Wisconsin and its inhabitants."

All of the region in question had previously been part of the Territory of Michigan, under the statute enacted in 1834, which so extended the western boundary of that Territory as to comprise all of the territory between the northern line of Missouri and the northern international boundary lying east of the rivers Missouri and White Earth.

Michigan had been a Territory ever since 1805, by an act which declared that—

"The inhabitants thereof shall be entitled to all and singular the rights, privileges, and advantages granted and secured to the people of the territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio River by the said ordinance"—

In 1849 the above portion of Dakota became part of the Territory of Minnesota, under an act for the Territorial government, which ordained that the inhabitants of the Territory "shall be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities granted and secured to the Territory of Wisconsin and its inhabitants,"

Among which, as has been shown, were those conferred by the ordinance of 1787, both by the ordinance itself and by subsequent re-enactment of its terms.

It thus appears that Dakota stands upon the equities of both the ordinance and treaty.

By the act of May 26, 1790, the ordinance of 1787 was extended to all of the territory south of the Ohio River. It constituted all of that region one district for the purposes of temporary government—

"The inhabitants of which shall enjoy all the privileges, benefits, and advantages set forth in the ordinance of the late Congress for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio."

By the act of August 14, 1848, Oregon and its inhabitants were invested with the "rights, privileges, and advantages" of the ordinance of 1787.

The preamble to the constitution of Arkansas, adopted in 1836, asserted—

"The right of admission into the Union by virtue of the treaty of cession by France to the United States of the province of Louisiana."

In the case of Kansas, the preamble of the Topeka constitution asserted—

"The right of admission into the Union by virtue of the treaty of cession by France to the United States of the province of Louisiana."

The same assertion of right under the treaty is found under the Lecompton constitution. It was also put forth in the Minneola or Leavenworth constitution.

Turning to another passage of our diplomatic history which records the acquisition of territory by treaty, it is found that the treaty with Spain, concluded in 1819, by which the United States acquired the Floridas, contains this article:

"ART. 6. The inhabitants of the territories which his Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States by this treaty shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States as soon as may be consistent with the principles of the Federal Constitution, and admitted to the enjoyment of all privileges, rights, and immunities of the citizens of the United States."

Accordingly, in 1839, Florida adopted a constitution, the preamble of which declares that—

"We, the people of the Territory of Florida, having and claiming the right of admission into the Union as one of the United States of America, consistent with the principles of the Federal Constitution, and by virtue of the treaty of amity, settlement, and limits between the United States of America and the King of Spain."

The treaties with France and Spain became, by constitutional mandate, the supreme laws of the land, and so remain to this day.

The ordinance of 1787 was extended by act of Congress, May 26, 1790, to the territory south of the Ohio River.

The case of Tennessee is of the utmost importance in considering this question, because it establishes beyond a possible doubt the right of our people to form a constitution without authority of Congress.

A convention met at Knoxville, January 11, 1796, for framing a State constitution. A committee was appointed to frame a constitution, and a bill of rights was reported to the convention within a few days. The labors of the convention were completed on the 6th of February by the adoption of a constitution, and on the 19th an engrossed copy was forwarded to President Washington with a notification that on the 28th of March the Legislature of the proposed State would meet to act on the constitution, and on that day the temporary government established by Congress would cease.

Thus, nearly a hundred years ago, a people took position far in advance of Dakota to-day. There was no pretense on their part that an act of Congress, even, was necessary to admit a State to the Union. It was the proposed State government or nothing with them. They so distinctly notified the Government. Neither was there any arrogant claim on their part. They relied squarely upon the same authorities that Dakota relies upon to-day, and their claim was successful after an energetic discussion and considerable opposition. Washington referred the matter to Congress with the following message:

GENTLEMEN OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES: By an act of Congress passed on the 26th of May, 1790, it was declared that the inhabitants of the territory of the United States south of the river Ohio should enjoy all the privileges, benefits, and advantages set forth in the ordinance of Congress for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio; and that the government of said territory south of the Ohio should be similar to that which was then exercised in the territory northwest of the Ohio, except so far as was otherwise provided in the conditions expressed in an act of Congress passed the 2d of April, 1790, entitled "An act to accept a cession of the claims of the State of North Carolina to a certain district of western territory."

Among the privileges, benefits, and advantages thus secured to the inhabitants of the territory south of the river Ohio appear to be the right of forming a permanent constitution and State government, and of admission as a State, by its delegates, into the Congress of the United States on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever when it should have therein 60,000 free inhabitants, provided the constitution and government to be so formed should be republican, and in conformity to the principles contained in the articles of the said ordinance.

As proofs of the several requisites to entitle the territory south of the river Ohio to be admitted as a State into the Union, Governor Blount has transmitted a return of the enumeration of its inhabitants, and a printed copy of the constitution and form of government on which they have agreed, which, with his letters accompanying the same, are herewith laid before Congress.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, April 8, 1796.

The admission of Tennessee under this movement was objected to upon the ground that no previous act of Congress authorized it. The debate was spirited and participated in by men who assisted in forming this Government, notably Mr. Madison. The House acted upon the message, and passed a resolution declaring Tennessee a State and admitting it to the Union.

The debate upon that resolution is exceedingly instructive, and among the proceedings is the following:

"Mr. RUTHERFORD. They have erected a State government and wish to come into the Union, and to resist their claims would be out of character.

"Mr. DEARBORN. As to passing a previous law recognizing the Territory as a State before it was admitted into the Union, he did not believe it to be necessary.

"Mr. LYMAN. In his opinion, according to the ordinance they had a clear right to be admitted as a State into the Union, for it was then said that when they had 60,000 inhabitants they should be admitted.

"Mr. SEDGWICK quotes Mr. Madison as saying that they, 'the inhabitants were in a degraded condition because controlled by laws which were made independent of them.'

"Mr. MACON. The question before the committee was on admitting the Territory to be a State of the Union. There appeared to him to be only two things necessary to be inquired into: First, was the new government republican? It appeared to him to be so. And, secondly, were there 60,000 inhabitants in the Territory? It appeared to him there were; and if so, their admission as a State should not be considered as a gift, but as a right. To admit this Territory as a member of the Union appeared to him as a matter of course. It also seemed as if the Executive were of that opinion. The President having been duly informed from time to time of the proceedings of that Territory toward being admitted into the Union, if he had thought they had been doing wrong, he would have set them right."

I come now, Mr. President, to the opinions of one whose words upon everything connected with the Federal Constitution are of more than judicial authority, Mr. Madison. He said:

"The gentleman from South Carolina seemed to think that the ordinance by which this State should be admitted into the Union required that the Territory should first be acknowledged as a State, and then have the inhabitants of it as such numbered under the authority of Congress. He thought this would be spinning a finer thread than was necessary, and would give the people reason to suppose that the General Government was disposed to keep them in their present condition as long as possible. If the Legislature of the United States should be convinced that the Territory contained a sufficient number of inhabitants to entitle them to admission into the Union, it was matter of form only how the census had been taken, or whether the Territory had been previously acknowledged as a State by Congress or not. The fact of population was the only necessary one, and would no evidence satisfy the gentleman but such as they themselves should direct? * * *

"The inhabitants in that district of country were in a degraded situation at present; they were deprived of a right essential to freemen—the right of being represented in Congress. Laws were made without their consent, or by their consent in part only. An exterior power had authority over their laws; an exterior authority appointed their executive, which was not analogous to the other parts of the United States and not justified by anything but an obvious and imperious necessity. * * * He thought when there was doubt Congress ought to lean towards a decision which should give legal rights to every part of the American people."

"Mr. Gallatin was of the opinion that the people of the Southwestern Territory became ipso facto a State the moment they amounted to 60,000 free inhabitants, and that it became the duty of Congress, as a part of the original compact, to recognize them as such and to admit them into the Union whenever they had satisfactory proof of the fact."

"Mr. Colt said it is declared by the ordinance for the government of the Territory that when there should be 60,000 inhabitants in any one of the States there, they should be admitted into the Union. If, then, it is not in contemplation to divide the Territory into two States, he considered the right to be admitted was complete as soon as there was the requisite number within the whole Territory."

Mr. Kitchell proposed a resolution in the place of the one agreed to in the convention of the whole, as he thought some law should be passed by Congress recognizing the Territory as a State before they were admitted into the Union. It was negatived, and the original resolution was agreed to by a vote of 43 to 30.

Among the nays were James Madison, Albert Gallatin, William R. Giles, Wade Hampton, Robert Goodloe Harper, Nathaniel Macon.

The committee of the Senate reported against admission, because—

"1. The Territory had not been laid out by Congress into a State or States, as provided by the ordinance of 1787.

"2. The census had not been taken under authority of the United States."

And recommended a bill laying out the Territory into a State, and providing for an enumeration of its inhabitants. Such a bill passed the Senate and went to the House. The result finally was a report from Mr. Giles upon the bill as it came from the Senate, "which went to change the principle of the bill from the Senate."

"The House contended that the proceedings of these people had been so far regular as to authorize the admission of them as a State into the Union; but by the bill sent from the Senate it was proposed to lay out this Territory into a State and order a census taken before it could be admitted. This report of the committee confirmed the bill to the opinion heretofore expressed in the House."

The bill thus conformed was adopted by a vote of 48 to 30. The House bill was disagreed to by the Senate; a committee of conference was appointed; the Senate finally receded from its plan and passed the House bill or resolution.

The case of Michigan is one of the most remarkable in the history of the admission of States. Michigan applied for admission in 1835.

The facts are stated in the following extract from the report of the Senate committee of the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress upon the question of the admission of Dakota:

"The history of the formation of a State government in Michigan is very familiar. In the year 1833, and again in 1834, memorials were presented to Congress asking for the admission of the State. No action having been taken by Congress, the Territorial Legislature, January 26, 1835, passed an act authorizing the holding of a convention to form a State constitution. The convention assembled at Detroit on the second Monday of May following, and proceeded to frame a constitution, which was submitted to a popular vote in October of the same year, and ratified, and at the same time State officers were elected. The schedule attached to the constitution provided that a certified copy thereof, together with an abstract of a census which had been taken, and a copy of the act of the Legislature referred to, should be transmitted to the President. No memorial praying for the admission of the State was provided for or sent, nor was there, so far as we have seen, anything in the constitution staying the going into effect of the State government for any action of Congress thereon.

"The communication to the President, which accompanied the copy of the constitution sent, was as follows:

"'WASHINGTON, December 9, 1835.

"'SIR: The undersigned, elected Senators and Representatives to Congress from the State of Michigan, have the honor to transmit to you herewith an additional authentic copy of the constitution adopted by the convention of Michigan on the 24th day of June, 1835, and ratified by the people of the same on the first Monday and the succeeding day in October, 1835.

"'We have the honor to be, with the highest respect, your most obedient servants,

"'JOHN NORVELL.
"'LUCIUS LYON.
"'ISAAC E. CRARY.

"'The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.'

"Andrew Jackson, then President of the United States, transmitted the documents to Congress, accompanied by the following message:

"'To the Senate and House of Representatives:

"'GENTLEMEN: By the act of the 11th of January, 1805, all that part of the Indiana Territory lying north of a line drawn due "east from the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan until it shall intersect Lake Erie, and east of a line drawn from the said southerly bend, through the middle of said lake, to its northern extremity, and thence due north to the northern boundary of the United States," was erected into a separate Territory by the name of Michigan.

"'The territory comprised within these limits, being part of the district of country described in the ordinance of the 13th of July, 1787, which provides that whenever any of the States into which the same should be divided should have 60,000 free inhabitants, each State should be admitted by its delegates "into the Congress of the United States on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State government, provided the constitution and government so to be formed shall be republican and in conformity to the principles contained in these articles," etc., the inhabitants thereof have, during the present year, in pursuance of the right secured by the ordinance, formed a constitution and State government. That instrument, together with various other documents connected therewith, has been transmitted to me for the purpose of being laid before Congress, to whom the power and duty of admitting new States into the Union exclusively appertains, and the whole are herewith communicated for your early decision.

"'ANDREW JACKSON.'

"A dispute between Michigan on the one side and the States south of her on the other as to the boundary line complicated and delayed her admission as a State; but meantime the new State government was exercising the functions of government.

"In the debates in Congress Michigan found many able defenders of her cause. Others denied her claim to be a State without some act of Congress authorizing or ratifying her proceedings. The result was the act of June 15, 1836, by which Congress ratified what Michigan had done and admitted the State into the Union upon the condition that her convention should consent to a change in the southern boundary.

"In the proceedings of the Senate, on December 10, 1835, the following appears:

"'Mr. Benton presented the credentials of Hon. Lucius Lyon and Hon. John Norvell, elected by the Legislature of Michigan Senators from that State; which were read. Mr. Benton then moved that seats be assigned to Mr. Lyon and Mr. Norvell on the floor of the Senate until the decision of the question of their admission as Senators. This [Mr. B. said] had been done by courtesy in similar cases.'

"The remarks of Mr. Benton upon this subject, a few days afterwards, are of present interest, as they refer to his own experience when he first appeared as a Senator from Missouri. He said:

"'When a gentleman brought a letter to him from a respectable source he at least asked him to take a seat until he read it; and here (said he) these gentlemen have brought a letter from a State de facto, signed by a high official functionary, and we are to hesitate before we extend to them an act of common courtesy. * * * But it has been said that the adoption of the resolution would prejudge the case of the admission of Michigan into the Union; that the mere courtesy of asking the gentlemen to sit down was to commit the Senate as to their admission as Senators. Are we of such treacherous memories as not to recollect what took place with regard to the admission of Missouri into the Union? Were the Senators from Missouri not sent back after having had seats assigned them? Was there one single Senator influenced in the vote he gave on that occasion by the fact that seats had been assigned to the Missouri Senators pending the question of their admission? He [Mr. B.] was here as one of those Senators, and was told by that accomplished gentleman and amiable man who then filled the chair [Mr. Gaillard] to take his seat; and he [Mr. B.] had all the incidental privileges of a Senator extended to him. He had the right to frank documents to wherever he pleased, and he had the privilege of using the stationery of the Senate, notwithstanding the question of right was decided against him and he was sent home. As to the question of the admission of Michigan he, for one, remained not only uncommitted but undecided as to the course he should take.'

"Afterwards Mr. Benton withdrew his resolution and offered another, which, on motion of Mr. Hendricks, of Indiana, was modified so as to extend to these gentlemen the same privileges on the floor of the Senate that were extended to members of the House, and in that form the resolution was adopted.

"In the course of the debates in the Senate Mr. Buchanan said:

"'I think their course is clearly justifiable, but if there is anything wrong or unusual in it, it is to be attributed to the neglect of Congress.

"'For three years they have been rapping at your door and asking for the consent of Congress to form a constitution and for admission into the Union; but their petitions have not been heeded and have been treated with neglect. Not being able to be admitted in the way they have sought, they have been forced to take their own course and stand upon their rights—rights secured to them by the Constitution and a solemn irrepealable ordinance (of 1787).

"'They have taken a census of the Territory; they have formed a constitution, elected their officers, and the whole machinery of a State government is ready to be put in operation; they are only awaiting your action. Having assumed this attitude, they now demand admission as a matter of right; they demand it as an act of justice at your hands.

"'Are they now to be repelled or to be told that they must retrace their steps and come into the Union in the way they first sought to do, but could not obtain the sanction of Congress?

"'In fear of the consequences of such a decision, I tremble at an act of such injustice.'"

In the case of Arkansas there was no enabling act. Congress had refused to pass one. In 1836 the people adopted a constitution the preamble of which asserted the right to admission by virtue of the articles of the treaty with France. The State was admitted June 15, 1836, by an act which recites the adoption of a constitution by a convention, and that the convention had on behalf of the people asked Congress to admit the Territory into the Union as a State. From the fact that the act of the admission prescribed the boundaries there seems to have been some question upon that point. A supplementary act of June 23, 1836, submitted to the General Assembly "of the State of Arkansas" certain other conditions; as to schools, salt springs, 5 per cent. from sales of Government lands, five sections for public buildings, two townships for a seminary of learning, and on October 18, 1836, that Legislature accepted the required conditions.

Mr. Morris, of Ohio, justified the right of the people of a Territory, when amounting to 60,000, to mee tand form their own constitution. He said:

"I hold that any portion of American citizens, who may reside on a portion of the territory of the United States, whenever their numbers shall amount to that which would entitle them to a representation in the House of Representatives in Congress, have the right to provide for themselves a constitution and State government, and to be admitted into the Union whenever they shall so apply; and they are not bound to wait the action of Congress in the first instance, except there is some compact or agreement requiring them to do so. I place this right upon the broad and, I consider, indisputable ground that all persons living within the jurisdiction of the United States are entitled to equal privileges; and it ought to be a matter of high gratification to us here that in every portion, even the most remote, of our country our people are anxious to obtain this high privilege at as early a day as possible. It furnishes clear proof that the Union is highly esteemed and has its foundation deep in the hearts of our fellow-citizens.

"By the Constitution of the United States power is given to Congress to admit new States into the Union. It is in the character of a State that any portion of our citizens, inhabiting any part of the territory of the United States, must apply to be admitted into the Union; a State government and constitution must first be formed. It is not necessary for the power of Congress, and I doubt if Congress has such power, to prescribe the mode by which the people shall form a State constitution; and for this plain reason, that Congress would be entirely incompetent to the exercise of any coercive power to carry into effect the mode they might prescribe. I can not, therefore, vote against the admission of Arkansas into the Union on the ground that there was no previous act of Congress to authorize the holding of her convention. As a member of Congress I will not look beyond the constitution that has been presented. I have no right to presume it was formed by incompetent persons, or that it does not fully express the opinions and wishes of the people of that country. It is true that the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government, meaning, in my judgment, that Congress shall not permit any power to establish, in any State, a government without the assent of the people of such State; and it will not be amiss that we remember here, also, that that guaranty is to the State and not as to the formation of the government by the people of the State; but should it be admitted that Congress can look into the constitution of a State in order to ascertain its character, before such State is admitted into the Union, yet I contend that Congress can not object to it for the want of a republican form, if it contains the great principle that all power is inherent in the people and that the Government draws all its just powers from the governed.

"The people of the Territory of Arkansas having formed for themselves a State government, having presented their constitution for admission into the Union, and that constitution being republican in its form, and believing that the people who prepared and sent this constitution here are sufficiently numerous to entitle them to a Representative in Congress, and believing also that Congress has no right or power to regulate the system of police these people have established for themselves, and the ordinance of 1787 not operating on them, I can not, as a member of this body, refuse my vote to admit this State into the Union."

In the course of the debate in the House, John Quincy Adams yielded his profound convictions on the subject of slavery to his sense of other obligations, saying:

"I can not, consistently with my sense of my obligations as a citizen of the United States, and bound by oath to support their Constitution—I can not object to the admission of Arkansas into the Union as a slave State; I can not propose or agree to make it a condition of her admission that a convention of her people shall expunge this article from her constitution. She is entitled to admission as a slave State, as Louisiana and Mississippi and Alabama and Missouri have been admitted, by virtue of that article in the treaty for the acquisition of Louisiana which secures to the inhabitants of the ceded territories all the rights, privileges, and immunities of the original citizens of the United States; and stipulates for their admission, conformably to that principle, into the Union."

It has been shown that Florida adopted a constitution in 1839, and stood upon the right to be admitted under the terms of the treaty with Spain.

It has been objected to the proceedings of our people, and this the Senate will propose to validate, that we seek to fix the boundaries of our proposed State.

The cases of Iowa, California, Kansas, and Oregon are squarely in point, and fully sustain our proposition.

Iowa and Florida were admitted together. The former State arranged its own boundaries.

Iowa, assuming the right to take the action she did, adopted a constitution in 1844. There was no enabling act as to either of these Territories. The people of each had memorialized Congress repeatedly, but in vain, for admission, until March 3, 1845, when both were admitted by act of that date. with the following preamble:

"Whereas the people of the Territory of Iowa did, on the 7th day of October, 1844, by a convention of delegates called and assembled for that purpose, form for themselves a constitution and State government; and whereas the people of the Territory of Florida did, in like manner, by their delegates, on the 11th day of January, 1839, form for themselves a constitution and State government, both of which said constitutions are republican; and said conventions having asked the admission of their respective Territories into the Union as States on an equal footing with the original States."

The act of Congress changed the boundaries of the State of Iowa, as defined in her constitution, and required the consent of the people to this change. This proposition was defeated at a popular election. A second convention, called by the Territorial Legislature, met and formed a new constitution in May, 1846, which was adopted by the people, and on December 28, 1846, an act of Congress admitting the State was passed.

In the case of Oregon the claim was made in behalf of the people of the right to originate a State government without authority of Congress under the ordinance of 1787, which had been extended to that Territory.

In December, 1856, the Territorial Legislature passed an act providing for a constitutional convention. The delegates were duly elected and the convention held. It met at Salem in August, 1857, and framed a constitution, which was ratified at a popular election. The boundaries, as provided for in that constitution, are the present boundaries of the State of Oregon, except that the territory lying north of the forty-sixth parallel of latitude and included between the Columbia and Snake Rivers, was, by the act of Congress admitting the State, taken from the State of Oregon and attached to the Territory of Washington. There was no enabling act, the movement for admission having originated wholly with the people. The State was admitted to the Union on the 14th day of February, 1859.

In the case of Oregon some question arose concerning its population. In the House, Mr. Stephens, of Georgia, reported a bill for the admission of Oregon, and after quoting the ordinance of 1787, he said:

If there were any questions as to whether there were 90,000 people there, if there were any question as to whether Oregon comes up to the ratio of representation, yet, sir, I hold that there is a solemn guaranty and a contract made with those people which we ought not to disregard. That there are more than 60,000 people there it seems to me no gentleman upon this floor can doubt.

Mr. Clark, of Missouri, also said, upon the same subject:

"I claim that Oregon has a right to come in under the ordinance of 1787, and that it is the duty of Congress to admit her on the same principle and according to the same rule established in that ordinance for the Northwest Territory."

California applied for admission in a manner much more self-assertive than was that adopted by the other States. The treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, properly construed, gave little warrant for the proceedings that were instituted. Two fruitless efforts were made in 1848 in Congress to establish a Territorial government in California, and a bill which was introduced for her admission as a State came to naught. In 1849 the military governor of that conquest called a constitutional convention by proclamation. This body adopted a constitution and elected State officers. The governor was inaugurated December 20, 1849. The military governor proclaimed the constitution to have been adopted, and delivered the government to the State thus organized. President Taylor transmitted this constitution to Congress in a message which took no exception to the manner in which it had been formed. Mr. Douglas presented to the Senate the memorial of the Senators and Representatives elect, praying the admission of California as a State. The report of the conference committee of thirteen, made by Henry Clay, contains this passage:

"There are various instances prior to the case of California of the admission of new States into the Union without any previous authorization by Congress. The sole condition required by the Constitution of the United States in respect to the admission of a new State is that its constitution shall be republican in form."

It was under these circumstances that California came into the Union by the act of September 9, 1850.

The territory which is now the State of Vermont was claimed by Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and New York. The people of Vermont adopted a constitution in 1777, and adopted another in 1781. Massachusetts assented to the independence of Vermont.

The claim of New Hampshire was relinquished in 1782 and that of New York in 1790. Vermont was admitted into the Union February 18, 1791, and in the long history of this effort of her people to become a State no pretense was ever made that she could not approach Congress as a claimant to the right of admission without the credentials of an enabling act.

So in the case of Maine. Massachusetts, by act passed June 19, 1819, submitted the question of separation to the people of Maine, who thereupon voted (17,091 to 7,132) in favor of forming a separate State. In 1820 a constitution was adopted by a convention and ratified by the people and the State admitted.

Mr. Speaker, what more need be said upon the two propositions:

1. That our people have the constitutional right to frame a constitution and organize a State government precisely as we have done.

2. That as a matter of right we are entitled to admission to the Union.

If anything in reason or authority was ever established it is these two propositions; and they are supported by Washington, Madison, Macon, Benton, Clay, Buchanan, Douglas, John Quincy Adams, Mr. Stephens, and many other statesmen of almost equal eminence.

It is unquestionable that the ordinance of 1787 has been extended since the adoption of the Federal Constitution over the greater portion of Dakota, and that this ordinance has been regarded as conferring this right upon the people of a Territory to frame a constitution and demand admission into the Union. And the stipulations of the treaty with France have been regarded in many instances as conferring the same right.

Now, there is no consistent practice in regard to the admission of States. About as many have been admitted in one way as another. In some instances, like Kentucky and one or two others, a popular vote was not required, even upon the adoption of a constitution. The people of at least three States arranged their own boundaries without previous authority from Congress.

It can not be said that it is wholly within the discretion of Congress whether a State shall be admitted. It has been declared over and over again by the highest authority, by Chief-Justice Taney, speaking for the court in the Dred Scott case, that the United States has no right to acquire territory except with the intention to admit it as a State. Do the States of the Union consent to the acquisition of new territory for the purpose of keeping and maintaining a province? Did the people of Dakota go out from the various States, where they enjoyed full rights of citizenship and self-government, upon the vast prairies of Dakota to make homes for the purpose of being disfranchised—themselves and their children—by living in a province?

Talk about the admission of Dakota being discretionary with Congress. To refuse her admission is doing violence to the very name of discretion. It is a burlesque upon the name of discretion. How much discretion has the majority of this House exercised during the past four years in neglecting and refusing, during all this time, to give even a moment's time to the question of the admission of Dakota or of any other Territory? How much discretion did the distinguished Senator from South Carolina and his Democratic colleagues exercise, in presenting to the Senate and voting for an enabling act for the admission of Dakota as a whole, by permission of Congress some time hereafter—no definite period fixed—and insisting that Utah shall be admitted at once upon proclamation by the President, which were precisely the terms of the so-called enabling act?

Is that what you call "exercising discretion" in the admission of new States? We call it in Dakota, and the people of the country call it, the very height of partisan blindness and folly, of injustice and tyranny.

I come now to the question of the division of Dakota—the boundaries and area of the proposed State. Are they not sufficient in all reason for a State? It will contain more than 75,000 square miles, and exceeded in size by only seven States—California, Colorado, Kansas, Minnesota, Nevada, Oregon, and Texas. The proposed State will be about 200 miles wide and 400 long, larger by far than any State east of the Mississippi, and will exceed in size all of New England and New Jersey added.

Can the gentlemen from Illinois or Georgia, from Iowa or South Carolina, object to the admission of South Dakota on the ground that it is not large enough for a State? What a condition of things we would now have had Ohio and Indiana been admitted as one State, and yet both combined are much smaller than the proposed State of South Dakota. It is not for political parties nor for the present generation that we construct States. It is for the future—for those who are to come after us. It is for the millions who are to live in Dakota that the foundations for statehood are now laid. Admit Dakota as a whole, and you have a State nearly twice as large as Minnesota—larger than all New England, New York, and Pennsylvania combined.

Have the climate and soil sufficient productive capacity for two States? Permit me to give a few figures and comparisons in this regard. It must be remembered that the area of the proposed State of North Dakota is about equal to that of South Dakota. I will give the population and area of the States when admitted into the Union:

The present basis of representation in the House of Representatives is 151,911. No State ever created out of the public domain had at the time of admission anything like the population which is contained in either of the proposed States, and the claims of every State admitted or annexed into the Union to this time bear no comparison whatever to the claims of Dakota. Treaty obligations have been violated, constitutional guaranties trodden upon, and the spirit as well as the letter of our Government cast contemptuously aside in the case of Dakota. Can there be any doubt about each of the proposed States containing sufficient area for a State? Can the gentleman from Georgia, or Iowa, or Missouri, or Illinois, or South Carolina consistently raise the question or object to the admission of either Dakota upon the ground that it does not contain sufficient area?

Mr. Chairman, there is no question that the work of creation and constituting States into the Union is of serious and most important import.

There may be questions connected therewith which seriously affect the body of the States, which should be fairly taken into account; and, on the other hand, there may be, and in the case of Dakota certainly are, considerations of higher importance affecting her people that are of the utmost concern and urgency to them.

It must be considered that we have outgrown to a vast degree all and every condition contemplated or intended to come within the provisions of a Territorial government. We have six judges, with the most urgent need of two more. The usual number allotted to a Territory is three. Our Legislature has double the number of members that Territorial Legislatures usually contain.

The government which is provided for the Territories of the United States is almost identical with that which was extended by England over her colonies a century and a half ago, and against which the fathers of this Republic so successfully rebelled.

Regarding the object and purposes of a Territorial government, I can do no better than to quote the following language, which comes to us from high authority:

"The policy of the United States from the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and even before, has been to encourage the settlement of the public lands lying outside of the boundaries of the States, and to organize the communities thus formed into States as soon as the requisite population was found within a suitable area. Territorial governments were always regarded as formative and temporary, to be superseded by State governments as soon as the necessary conditions existed. The vast domain acquired by cession from Virginia, by the treaty of Louisiana, and by conquest from Mexico, has been carved into States, which have been admitted to the Union as fast as sufficient population was found therein."

It will be seen that the proposed State of Dakota would be the eighth State in area—only California, Colorado, Kansas, Minnesota, Nevada, Oregon, and Texas having a larger area—while the Territory of Lincoln would be only exceeded in area by one additional State, namely, Nebraska. The proposed State would be more than twice as large as Indiana; 20,000 square miles larger than Illinois; 23,000 square miles larger than Arkansas; 8,000 square miles larger than Missouri; more than two and a half times larger than South Carolina, and more than 10,000 square miles larger than the six New England States.

South Dakota cast over 70,000 votes at the election of November last, and North Dakota more than 44,000, with no officers of importance to be voted for, except a Delegate to Congress, members of the Legislature, and county officers—nothing of interest to excite people or draw out a vote. There are organized counties in Dakota with many inhabitants where the right of suffrage is not exercised.

Now, concerning the wishes of our people upon the question of division:

As early as the Territorial legislative session of 1870-'71 the agitation of the question of division of Dakota upon the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude took form, and at that session a memorial to Congress, praying for such division, was passed in both houses unanimously, and approved by the governor January 12, 1871.

Again, December 31, 1872, there was passed and approved a similar memorial, with 4 dissenting votes in the house and none in the council.

Again, December 19, 1874, another passed unanimously in the house, with 1 dissenting vote in the council.

Again, January 24, 1877, another passed unanimously, with no negative votes in either house.

In 1879 a protest against admission of the whole Territory as one State was passed.

In 1881 a memorial praying for a division into three Territories passed both houses, but received 10 negative votes in the house and 3 in the council.

In 1883 the bill for the constitutional convention for South Dakota, to be held that year, was passed, as heretofore stated, which was withheld by the governor.

(Since 1889 the legislative sessions have been biennial.)

"In 1885, at the last session of the Legislative Assembly, there was an increased number of members of both houses, Congress having recognized the absurdity of governing this great Territory with the machinery of government usually allotted to an ordinary Territory. It will be observed this was after the agitation of the question of division in Congress, incident to the passage through the Senate of the enabling act for South Dakota. It will further be borne in mind that these members of the Legislative Assembly were just elected by the people of both sections of Dakota, the northern as well as the southern portion; that the questions of division and admission had been prominent subjects of discussion for years; that they were fresh in the minds of everybody; a bill for a constitutional convention for South Dakota had passed the previous session; it had been defeated by the executive, but the convention was nevertheless held, the constitution ratified, and presented to Congress.

"Now, with all this agitation and with double the number of members elected to this Legislative Assembly formerly allowed, thus necessarily reflecting the public sentiment of both sections of the Territory, they passed unanimously, in addition to the act calling a constitutional convention for South Dakota, a memorial to Congress praying for the division of the Territory and admission of the south part as a State, which was approved by the governor February 2, 1885, he thereby honorably recognizing public sentiment."

In the matter of the location of public institutions the ultimate division of Dakota has been kept in view in the Legislative Assembly; these institutions have been duplicated, as shown by the following acts:

By act of February 22, 1879, an insane asylum was located at Yankton, in South Dakota, for which bonds have been issued to the amount of $215,000.

By act of March 9, 1883, the North Dakota Hospital for the Insane was located at Jamestown, in North Dakota, for which bonds have been issued to the amount of $168,000.

By act of February 17, 1881, a penitentiary was located at Sioux Falls, in South Dakota, for which bonds have been issued to the amount of $94,000.

By act of February 27, 1883, a penitentiary was located at Bismarck, in North Dakota, for which bonds have been issued to the amount of $41,000.

By act of February 3, 1883, the University of Dakota was located at Vermillion, in South Dakota, and bonds to build the same were authorized to the amount of $85,000.

By act of February 27, 1883, the University of North Dakota was located at Grand Forks, in North Dakota, and bonds for the same have since been issued to the amount of $74,000.

By act of February 21, 1881, an agricultural college was established at Brooking, in South Dakota, for which bonds have been issued to the amount of $100,000.

By act of February 27, 1883, an agricultural college was located at Fargo, in North Dakota, but the buildings have not yet been constructed.

By act of March 5, 1881, a normal school was located at Madison, in South Dakota, and bonds have been issued therefor to the amount of $55,000.

By act of March 9, 1883, a normal school was authorized at Larimore, in North Dakota, the buildings for which are yet to be constructed.

In all of these acts authorizing the issue of bonds it was provided that the part of the Territory in which was located the institution for which bonds were issued should, upon the division of the Territory, assume all obligations incurred for the erection of such institutions.

Many other instances of legislation specifically adapted and made applicable to the different sections of the Territory might be adduced, but the above examples will suffice to illustrate and emphasize the separate and distinct interests of the people in the southern and northern portions of the Territory.

The political division of Dakota into North and South is as distinctive as possible. These terms are used with us as common, and are as necessary as the terms North and South Carolina are used in those respective States. Our people desire division because they believe that a better and more economical government can be secured in a State of medium size than can possibly be realized in so large, unwieldy, and populous a State as Dakota would be if admitted as one State. The best possible data that can be secured regarding State expenditures show that small and medium States can be more economically managed per capita than large ones.

This has not been a matter with us of the mere isolation of the people of the two sections of the Territory from each other. The foundation of our whole political structure has been laid with a view of division, because we realized the fact that it is more for coming generations than for ourselves that States are built, and I verily believe, whatever may be the fate of the division movement in Dakota, posterity will insist as the result of sad experience, and when too late to be remedied, that sound government in a State of moderate size is far better than glory and lavish expenditure is in a State of great area. It may well be said that except in matters which are necessarily compulsory through one Legislature, and trammeled by acts of Congress, North and South Dakota are quite distinct.

We even have two boards of agriculture, one for North and one for South Dakota, two public examiners, and, in fact, almost everything connected with our system over which we have any control or about which we are permitted to legislate is duplicated to accommodate and harmonize with our peculiar and distinctive relations.

Even the religious societies realize the necessity of duplicating their institutions in Dakota, and recognize the political distinction between the two sections.

The South Dakota Congregational College is built at Yankton, the North Dakota Congregational College at Fargo. The South Dakota Baptist College is at Sioux Falls, the North Dakota Baptist College at Tower City. The South Dakota Presbyterian College is at Pierre, the North Dakota Presbyterian College at Jamestown. The Episcopal Church has its diocese of North Dakota and South Dakota, each with its own bishop.

The Roman Church has recently located a missionary bishop for South Dakota. I am informed, and also learn, that the Pope has recommended the establishment of one for North Dakota, to be located at Jamestown.

And again, at the session of the Legislature held in January, 1887, a memorial was adopted by a unanimous vote praying for division, and at the session just convened the same memorial has been adopted by a like vote. In addition to that, a succession of conventions and mass-meetings have been held in North Dakota in favor of division, and not a voice has been raised in favor of admission as a whole at any of them.

The whole history of Dakota, from beginning to end—of its political parties, legislation, and tone of its press—shows all through that it is the overwhelming desire of the people to be admitted as two States. The declarations of the Democratic party of the Territory have been consistently for division throughout. I quote from a reliable publication in regard to this:

[From the Huron Herald-Democrat (Democratic).]

RECORD OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF DAKOTA ON DIVISION—VOTES OF ALL THEIR CONVENTIONS—DIVISION AN ORIGINAL DEMOCRATIC MEASURE.

Inasmuch as the question of division of the Territory of Dakota is now before Congress, and as Ordway, Johnson, and other self-constituted leaders of the Democratic party here are endeavoring to make Congress believe that the Democrats are opposed to the division of the Territory and in favor of admission as a whole, the Democrat proposes to give the attitude of this party upon this important question in the past, so that all may be informed on the subject.

At the Territorial Democratic convention which assembled at Bon Homme July 18, 1872, and which nominated Moses K. Armstrong for Delegate in Congress, who was afterwards elected to his second term, the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That a division of the Territory should be made, giving to the settlement of Dakota a separate and distinct Territorial government north of the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude."

At the Territorial Democratic convention held at Elk Point, August 20, 1874, in which W. A. Burleigh was nominated for Delegate in Congress, the following resolution was passed:

"Resolved, That we believe the best interests of the public demand the erection of a new Territory out of that portion of Dakota lying north of the forty-sixth parallel, and we pledge the influence of the Democratic party to secure the organization of such new Territory."

At the Territorial anti-monopoly convention held at the same time and place, and which also nominated Dr. Burleigh for Delegate, the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That we are in favor of the organization of a new Territory out of the northern portion of Dakota at the earliest possible day."

The Territorial Democratic convention held at Yankton, July 6, 1876, which nominated Hon. S. L. Spink for Delegate in Congress, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That we earnestly favor the organization of a new Territory out of the northern part of Dakota, and believe that such organization will largely tend to enhance the interests of the people of both sections."

In the Territorial convention which nominated Bartlett Tripp for Delegate in 1878 no expression upon the division question was made. In the convention of 1880, which nominated M. L. McCormack for Delegate, it is asserted by those who were present that a division resolution was passed, but the record is not available.

In 1882 the Democrats of Dakota assembled in Territorial convention at Mitchell, and after nominating W. E. Steele, of Deadwood, for Delegate, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That we are in favor of the division of Dakota on the forty-sixth parallel and retaining the present name of Dakota for the south half."

In 1884, at Sioux Falls, where the Territorial Democracy in convention assembled nominated John R. Wilson, of Deadwood, for Delegate, the resolutions adopted embraced the following:

"Resolved, That we are in favor of the division of the Territory on the seventh standard parallel, and appeal to the Democratic members of Congress to favor such division."

At the Democratic Territorial convention, held at Aberdeen, September 30, 1886, in which Hon. M. H. Day was nominated for Delegate in Congress, plank No. 7 in the platform of principles adopted was as follows:

"That we favor the submission to a vote of the people of the whole Territory the question of the division of the Territory on the seventh standard parallel."

This is the consistent, outspoken attitude of the Democratic party of Dakota for fourteen years upon the question of division. This party has been the originator, fosterer, and promoter of division. The unselfish, thoughtful Democrats who have resided here for years, and who have studied the needs and wishes of the whole people of this Territory, have pronounced time and again for division. The last Democratic convention elected its chairman upon the issue of division, nominated its candidate for Delegate upon the same issue, and came very near electing him. Every man who attended the Aberdeen convention of September 30, 1886, remembers that W. I. Quigley was nominated by the one-State men for temporary chairman. The divisionists put up Hon. John R. Wilson, who was elected by an overwhelming majority. When it came to the selection of a candidate for Delegate the same question was presented. It was a trial of the strength of the divisionists and anti-divisionists. What was the result? On the informal ballot L. G. Johnson, who represented the one-State men, received 70 votes; M. H. Day, who represented the two-State men, received 204 votes; and D. W. Maratta received 69 votes. On the formal ballot Mr. Day received 228 votes, D. W. Maratta 76 votes, and L. G. Johnson 4 votes, most of the Johnson men voting for Maratta.

Thus it will be seen that every time this question has been before the Democratic party of this Territory, in whatever form, the party has pronounced emphatically for division.

When the resolution favoring the submission of the question to a vote of the people passed the Aberdeen convention every good and true Democrat was bound to stand by the result. And what was the result? In favor of division by nearly 5,000 majority.

If Mr. Johnson was a good Democrat he would submit to this verdict. But he does not, and hence forfeits his right to be called a Democrat. In fact, his course in this matter is in keeping with his past political record. Up to a very recent date Mr. Johnson was an active Republican. When the Territorial Republican convention assembled at Pierre in 1884 he was heading the Republican delegation from Brown County and assisted in nominating Judge GIFFORD, the present Republican Delegate, and in the same year he was a prominent member of the Territorial convention which met in Huron to select delegates to the national Republican convention at Chicago. If he has since been converted to Democracy his acts do not prove it.

The plain truth is, a large majority of the Democrats of this Territory are now, and have always been, in favor of division. And the Democrat is getting pretty tired of having a man with the political record of Mr. Johnson assuming to represent and reflect the sentiments of the Democracy of Dakota.

At the election held in the Territory in November, 1887, the question of division was voted upon; over 70,000 votes were cast, with a majority of about 4,000 in favor of division. The people of North Dakota gave a majority of about 10,000 against division.

The cause of this majority in North Dakota is easily accounted for. They had been told repeatedly, over and over again, by the chairman of the House Committee on the Territories, that we never could be admitted as two States. It was understood the present Administration had declared against it.

Our people were weary of a Territorial government. A long line of governors and other officers had been sent to rule over us from abroad—from Maine, New Hampshire, New York, and from almost every State in the Union.

Very rarely indeed was an officer appointed from among our own people. These officers came, disbursed and spent the money our people paid in the way of taxes, interfered in our political and other affairs, and a great many departed unregretted by us. About the time of this election a letter was written by the distinguished member from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], from which I herewith quote.

Mr. SPRINGER says:

This is the first concerted movement on the part of the people of Dakota for single statehood which has come to my knowledge.

And I think in that respect the letter is true.

Heretofore the organized efforts of your people have been in the direction of division of the Territory into two parts, while individuals, partisan localities, and newspapers of the Territory have opposed such efforts. These contending factions among your own people have had the inevitable result of preventing any affirmative action whatever by Congress.

This is his pronunciamiento, the ukase and decree of a man in a certain respect absolutely powerful, or assumed to be so, over this question, prepared in advance to be submitted to these people in that convention.

Those who are wedded to the idea of division may well postpone the realization of their hopes until a more convenient season—

Referring, I suppose, to some time after the then next Presidential election—for I can assure them, from my knowledge of public sentiment here, that the division of Dakota at this time, and the erection of two States within her border, is utterly impossible.

He concludes as follows:

I therefore bid you Godspeed in the work of the convention of the 15th of December, and trust that its labor will result in the early admission of Dakota as a State in the Union.

Is it strange in the face of all this that some of our people were inclined to accept the dire and exceedingly distasteful alternative and favor admission as a whole? This illustrates the kind of influence that was brought to bear upon our people to affect their vote. Is it strange the margin for division was small in view of these facts? Those people in North Dakota felt that their only chance to get into the Union at all was for Dakota to be admitted as a whole. What is the sentiment there now? They have taken courage since the recent election, and not a voice is heard against division, not a petition is sent, nor a letter written asking even for a vote upon the proposition. Those people want no further voting upon the question of division.

They take it for granted that it will come soon, and they hail with delight the prospect. There may have been a time when our people could have been tempted and induced to accept admission as a whole, as the speediest method of getting rid of their burdens, but that day is forever past. The people of Dakota will never accept admission as one State. They do not say this defiantly or arrogantly, but with the full knowledge and belief that the affairs of medium-sized States are much better administered, the interests of the people better cared for, and the American Union strengthened by their formation, as compared with States of vast area. And we believe this is the sentiment of a vast majority of the people of our country.

The responsibility of this injustice to Dakota is well understood. It is impossible to cloak the senses of the people to any great extent. The theory that it is the mere exercise of discretion to refuse us statehood has long since been exploded. Call it the abuse of discretion and the people will agree with you. What further can we say upon this subject? The people of Dakota, as patriotic and intelligent as ever settled a new country, a part of your own flesh and blood, have asked for simple justice for years, and have been refused. And now that this question is before us, it has coupled with it other matters which tend to complicate and burden it. I will say frankly that the hopes of our people that relief would come through this Congress have not been high, and no keen disappointment will they feel if nothing is done now.

Broken promises and continued harsh treatment have educated us to look upon defeat and disregard of our claims with considerable complacency. If I may be permitted to allude to a personal matter, permit me to say that near the close of four years' service in the House as a Delegate from Dakota, I look upon my refusal to listen to the voice of the tempter to consent to the admission of Dakota as a whole with very much satisfaction indeed. It would be a calamity to coming generations were we admitted as a whole. Admit Dakota as two States and the interests of those people will be better cared for and the great union of States stronger and more complete and the policy of the founders of the Government more nearly complied with.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ROGERS). Twenty-two minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, I shall address myself to the omnibus bill which will be offered hereafter as a substitute. In January, 1884, a constitutional convention was held at Helena, in the Territory of Montana, at which a constitution was adopted and submitted to a vote of the people for ratification or rejection. The constitution was ratified by the people at an election held in November, 1884. This constitution was forwarded to Congress, and a memorial was adopted and presented, praying for the admission of Montana into the Union as a State, upon an equal footing with the original States. The memorial is as follows:

To the President of the United States and the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

Your memorialists, the people of Montana Territory, through their representatives in convention assembled, respectfully represent:

That, since the organization of the Territory of Montana, we have cheerfully yielded obedience to the laws of the United States, and recognized the right of Congress to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territories.

That we now disclaim any purpose of disloyal action, but, renewing our fealty to the Constitution of the United States, and recalling to mind the right of the people to peacefully assemble and by petition represent their grievances to Congress, do further represent:

That the policy which has so long prevailed, of sending strangers to rule over us and fill our offices, has become distasteful to us, and is wholly unsuited to our present condition and the growing importance of the diversified interests of our country.

That within the past few years our population and resources have been largely augmented, whereby the proper administration of our laws demands a more perfect and comprehensive system of government than ever can be attained under our Territorial organization.

That in order to enlarge our liberties, secure a closer connection with the American Union, and for the establishment and maintenance of a better government, your memorialists, with the consent of the Legislative Assembly, have met in convention and formed a constitution, republican in form, for the State of Montana, and herewith present a certified copy thereof for your approval; and if, upon consideration of the same, you find it unobjectionable in substance and form, your memorialists pray that the Territory of Montana be speedily admitted into the Union of the United States thereunder, and your memorialists will ever pray.

It will be observed that the application here made for statehood is based upon the well-considered and deliberate action of the citizens of Montana, with a full confidence in their ability for self-government. It is our desire to be admitted under that constitution, and at the proper time I shall offer an amendment to that effect. I proceed at once to present for your consideration the merits of our claim. Montana was carved out of Idaho and organized as a Territory May 26, 1864. Our progress has been onward and upward from that day steadily. We base our claim for statehood upon no flimsy pretense, but are willing to be measured by the same standard proposed by three-fourths of the States of the Union at the time of their admission. We have outgrown a system designed only for a weak and sparsely inhabited Territory.

We are twenty-four years old, out of debt, of sound integrity, and good citizens. Our Territorial pupilage, which is only a stage of training necessary to precede the responsibilities of statehood, justifies us in putting aside the restraints of Territorial government and assuming a more important place in the future. Like a child grown beyond the capacity of its garments, our pride is wounded and we are restive under the promise of more suitable habiliments. We stand in many respects in the same relation to the Federal Government that a child does to its parent or a ward does to its guardian, but unhappily the same principles are not applicable or we might go into a court of equity and get immediate relief.

We are bound by the highest duty to admit these Territories as soon as they are qualified for statehood. We are a Republic of States and not of Territories, and yet we are fringed by despotism. Our Territories, forming the border of the great Northwest and Southwest, are dominated and controlled by a centralized power at this capital which was never designed to continue a day longer than the necessity therefor existed. Professions of sympathy no longer assuage us, and no amount of insincerity will hereafter put us aside. The brief time allotted me is insufficient for a recital of our wrongs, but I will venture to inquire for a moment what Congress has done for the Territories. I will answer for the benefit of those who care to know.

It has given us a system of courts inherently wrong, and which never can be made suitable to large communities.

It has regulated the number of our judges, which is grossly inadequate in every instance, resulting in the delay, and in many cases the denial of justice.

It has arbitrarily fixed the time when our local Legislature shall meet and adjourn, to our great damage and inconvenience.

It has denied us the authority to call an extra session of our Legislature without the consent of the President, adding untold burdens to a dependent people.

It has reserved the right to invalidate any law which our Legislature may pass, thereby destroying that full faith and credit which our legislation ought to command.

It has bound us hand and foot by a law which restricts these growing and ambitious communities in the expenditure of money for public improvements.

It has declared what we shall teach in our public schools, and manifested a lack of confidence in us in other instances of legislation too numerous to mention.

It has attempted to stifle our industries by prohibiting us from selling our mining properties in foreign markets, thus laying upon us an embargo not borne by citizens of the States.

It has exempted a railroad and the improvements on its right of way for 820 miles in length from taxation, furnishing another evidence of the gross inequality of citizenship in and out of the Territories.

It has withheld from us our dowry of lands which belong to our school fund and refuses to give to us any kind of supervision or control over it until we become a State, and then sets deliberately to work to prolong the time when that event shall happen.

It has professed to give us a representative in the lower House of Congress, but denies to us a vote, the only element of representation which gives character or influence to a member.

It has left us without any kind of representation in the Senate, and remits us to the beggarly methods of the lobbyist.

It has imposed upon us, with an iron hand, the obligations and burdens of citizenship, while it withholds its corresponding benefits by steadily denying to us participation in the framing of Federal legislation and the right of suffrage in national elections.

It has, by a failure to appropriate the necessary money, made it impossible at three successive terms of our court to summon or procure the attendance of jurors and witnesses in causes arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, whereby persons accused of crime, invoking the constitutional right to a "speedy trial by an impartial jury," were compelled to be discharged without trial.

It has refused to appropriate the salaries provided by law for the hungry officials whom it has been pleased to send us [laughter], and compels them to accept a measly sum in full compensation, notwithstanding an overflowing Treasury.

It has refused to appropriate sufficient money to extend the public surveys in the Territories, but has doled out annually its driblets, which have ofttimes been covered back into the Treasury, leaving our boundaries undefined and our titles insecure.

It has, by a false economy in the appropriation and expenditure of the public money, deprived the frontier settlements of proper postal facilities, proceeding upon the unjust and impracticable basis that every office should be self-sustaining.

It has failed to cause to be surveyed, selected, and conveyed to the grantees the lands falling to railroad grants in the Territories, as required by law, whereby millions of acres of land owned by rich corporations escape taxation.

It has persistently refused to pass laws by which timber or timber lands in the Territories (except Washington) may be leased or purchased, professing, however, to give the right to actual settlers to cut and remove the same for domestic purposes, while it has hedged in this privilege with an odious and impracticable system of rules and regulations which has resulted in harassing our citizens with expensive civil and criminal proceedings based wholly upon the ex parte statements of a crouching and obsequious special agent or spy, who has been taught to believe that his term of office will be measured by the extent of his activity in stirring up strife. [Applause.]

It has, by the organization of these Territories, invited settlement and occupancy of the frontier upon the promise and obligation that our persons and property should be protected against depredations by hostile Indians. These promises have been honored more in the breach than in the observance. The history of our early settlement is red with the blood of the pioneers who blazed the trails of civilization in these remote lands by the lurid light of their burning homes, which went down in ashes before the merciless savage. Millions of dollars of unpaid claims, mildewed by age, growing out of these atrocities, are piled up in the Departments, while the heroes of those troublous times, overcome with the weight of years and no longer able to conquer their feelings, have gone to join the silent majority, leaving destitute widows and orphans to keep alive before Congress the memory of their trials and tribulations. Verily the cruelty of Congress cuts as keenly as the scalping-knife or the tomahawk. [Cheers.]

It has suffered to be fastened upon us the odious system of carpet-bag rule and domination which seems to inhere more or less in the Territorial form of government. The administration of President Garfield and the present Administration were alike bound by party platforms to relieve us from the obnoxious system, but both have failed. We know our capacity for local self-government. We remember that "sending hither a swarm of officials," etc., was one of the causes which led to our declaration of independence. From that day to this carpet-baggers have always been odious, and their presence amongst us is and ever will be as poisonous and destructive to good government as the insidious growth of communism. [Laughter and applause.]

Tradition informs us that the wise men all came from the East; and so our Republican friends, unwilling to depart from the teaching of the past, determined that history should repeat itself, and proceeded to treat us in their own good time to a fine assortment of imported political dudes. [Laughter.] Some of these hot-house specimens who were too frail to stand transplanting in a northern clime soon gave up their commissions and returned to the genial influences of their own civilization. Others, holding religiously to the doctrine that a Federal officer should neither die nor resign, staid with us, became acclimated, and promise in the years to come to develop into tolerably good and useful citizens. [Laughter and applause.] But under Democratic supremacy we find that quite an invasion has been made upon what was supposed to be inflexible fact. Instead of the wise men coming from the East, we now learn that they come from the South. Kentucky furnished us a governor; Tennessee a chief-justice; Louisiana an associate justice and a surveyor-general; Texas an associate justice, and Mississippi, Maryland, and Tennessee each an Indian agent.

Be it far from me to reflect upon the integrity of any gentleman sent to us by this Administration, or by implication reflect upon the section from whence he came; these considerations do not disturb or annoy us.

If there is a warm spot in my heart it beats for the generous and courageous South. I never knew one of her sons who could not be touched by the recital of a wrong, or who would not respond promptly to the call of duty. [Applause.]

The insolence of office consequent upon these alien appointments and the lack of confidence thereby manifested in us constitute the gravamen of the affront. Time, instead of healing, simply intensifies it. Nearly every day added to the score of time brings some new appointment from abroad, thus adding insult to injury. Ages of forgiveness can not condone it, and statehood alone can prevent its recurrence. We had hoped for better things from this Administration. The glorious aspirations which were born on its accession to power were confident of co-operation and promotion at its hands four years ago. We knew we were entitled to statehood then. We feel confident that a failure to receive it, together with a violation of the platform concerning Federal appointments, did much to bring about a political revulsion in the Territories last fall.

I say this more in sorrow than in anger. The great national Democratic party was right upon this absorbing question. The great popular heart of the country was right. The Administration acted unwisely because it did not press one to an issue and observe the other. Those who comprise the Administration may have been sincere, and doubtless were, but they were certainly lacking in political sagacity. Barnacles will fasten upon the proudest ship, the brightest blade will gather rust, and the surest rifle will sometimes foul. This is all that we can offer in extenuation. [Applause.]

When Moscow burned the world was lighted up so that the nations of the earth might behold the scene. If I could summon a trumpet tongue on this occasion the proclamation of our protest against carpetbagism would be so loud that it could be heard all over this broad land.

Early in this Administration, and at the beginning of the Forty-ninth Congress, I endeavored to remove the temptation to Senators, Representatives, and other politicians to urge the importation of officials into the Territory by giving to the platform on that subject the sanction and validity of law. I introduced a bill containing this single section:

That from and after the passage of this act no person shall be eligible for appointment to any office under the laws of the United States in any Territory of the United States now organized who at the time of his appointment is not a qualified elector of the Territory to which he is appointed.

The Committee on Territories, to whom it was referred, after considering it for six months, brought in the following elaborate and exhaustive adverse report:

The Committee on the Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2883) concerning the appointment of Federal officials in the Territories, beg leave to report:

That, while believing that whenever practicable the Territorial offices should be filled by appointment of persons who are qualified electors of the particular Territory, they think it would be unwise to require by statute that this should be done in all cases. They therefore report adversely the bill referred to them, and recommend that it lie on the table.

It is needless to remind you that it has continued to "lie on the table" in blissful oblivion ever since. But while this bill has remained in statu quo, the author of the report accompanying it has been more active. Less than two months ago he was appointed chief-justice of Washington Territory from the State of Pennsylvania, from which my good friend and colleague from Washington Territory will doubtless infer that it was not "practicable" to appoint any person learned in the law from amongst the large number of deserving and aspiring residents of that Territory. [Laughter.]

In short, Mr. Speaker, it has made the Territories the dumping-ground for all the experimental legislation which the whims and caprices of Congress can invent. Let me illustrate: At the last session of this Congress the chairman of an important committee called up for consideration a certain bill; objection was made by a member; the chairman simply said that the bill only applied to the Territories and the District of Columbia. The objection was immediately withdrawn, and the bill was passed without a dissenting vote or another word of explanation. [Applause.]

These are briefly some of the wrongs and hardships imposed upon us by the provisional government established in the Territories, but in this connection it is only fair to say that they are not exclusively the offspring of either political party of to-day, but the joint heirs of both. Every count in this indictment can be sustained against both. Obviously there is but one remedy—a place in the galaxy of States; a star on the flag; a vote and voice in both branches of Congress. Without it there is nothing but political insomnia and internal unrest.

We are accustomed to see States with far less resources and possibilities, mounted, as it were, on steeds of steam, rushing swiftly past us, equipped with all the paraphernalia which sovereignty can invent or supply, contesting in a spirit of generous rivalry one with another for the first place in the race for political power and prestige, while we are compelled to "sit solemnly astride a dead horse, in a reverential calm, with the reins held firmly in our hands," only to see the flag fall in our face. [Great laughter.] Take off the handicap! Start us under as favorable circumstances as greeted the States at the time of their admission, and if the race is not always to the swift we will promise not to be last at the finish.

Look at our pitiable political condition—great in numbers, wealth, intelligence, patriotism, and all that makes a State, with no political autonomy save the alleged government provided for a Territory. We know what it is to sympathize with others. There is a homely but pregnant maxim, however, about charity commencing at home.

For years we have heard much about home rule in Ireland, and contributed much to establish that inestimable blessing in that sad land; we needed no urging to enlist our sympathies; it was in keeping with the genius and spirit of our institutions. We were guided and controlled by a generous and humane impulse—the offspring of our national independence.

Their condition was and is lamentable. It touches the tenderest chords of our feelings, and I would not abate the slightest interest in so worthy a cause; but I beg of you not to forget that here at home, under your own flag, are Territories with resources equal to the most favored States in the Union, with a citizenship below no standard which can be established, where constitutional government has never raised its head, where home rule lies bleeding and pleading at the feet of despotism for that same recognition which you so justly and with one accord would give to Ireland. [Applause.] Under these wrongs we have smarted and chafed, but never have we been wanting in loyalty to the Union. We have been patient and long-suffering, hiding our humiliation behind our pride; but as we advance in years we find our modesty departing and our independence asserting itself. We realize that to aspire to be on an equal footing with the States of this Union is a worthy ambition, and without which our political life is incomplete.

Henceforth honor bids us forget pride, and compels us to publish to the world the infirmities of that system under which we live, and which is little better than that suffered by the colonies before the birth of the Republic and the uncertain dawn of independence. Public sentiment has been aroused upon this question and stands ready to applaud our efforts. Our demands are not those of a rude and hostile people. Four-fifths of the adult population of Montana were born and have resided in the several States of this Union, and consequently know and appreciate the blessings of constitutional government. They were born and bred under the same influences and civilization that surround you; they represent a sturdy race of men of strong intellects and vigorous constitutions.

It was a long overland trip to get to that country. There were many perils to encounter and great difficulties to surmount. Only the courageous dared to start, and only the strong and indomitable survived the hardships of the journey and reached their destination. Their home is a tract of mingled mountains, rolling lands, and expansive prairies. Men who mature in such a land are bound to be patriotic. They are as brave as they are strong, and when in the years to come the nation may need defenders it is certain that the contingent from Montana can be counted upon for everything that men can do in the way of toil or dare in the way of danger. [Applause.]

They are your kindred by the ties of a common country, and closer still by the ties of blood. In behalf of such, and for the recognition of their right to enlarge their liberties, to enjoy a closer connection with the American Union, and for the establishment and maintenance of a better government, I appeal to your native justice and magnanimity, in the same spirit that the colonies did to the mother country; and in the solemnity of thought and freedom from partisan bias which ought to attend your deliberations I beg of you to listen to the voice of justice and consanguinity. I make this appeal to gratify no personal ambition. I am commissioned to do so in the name of Montana, a Territory whose valleys of gold and mountains of silver have never ceased to swell the volume of precious metals of the world for a quarter of a century. [Applause.]

A Territory which, if measured by the grandeur of its mountains, the fertility of its valleys, the majesty of its rivers, the splendor and utility of its water-falls, the richness of its mines, the number and value of its herds and flocks, the wealth and density of its forests, the health and vigor of its climate, the intelligence, aspiration, and patriotism of its citizens, ought to admonish you that the time is at hand when we should be accorded a political status upon this floor which will no longer be an empty honor and a delusion, but a full realization of the benefits designed by the Constitution, and for the expectant coming of which we shall anxiously wait and watch.

Let us in this investigation inquire first concerning

THE CONDITION AND EXTENT OF OUR PUBLIC LANDS.

In order to be accurate in the presentation of the facts here submitted, I have obtained the following data from the records of the General Land Office, from which it will be seen, among other things, that the entries upon Government lands in Montana by actual settlers embrace 3,000,000 acres of land independent of those lands falling within the Northern Pacific Railroad grant, large quantities of which have been sold to and improved by the settlers:

First. The number of original homestead entries made in the Territory of Montana to June 30, 1888, was 4,547, embracing an area of 678,252.71 acres.

Second. The number of final homestead proofs made to above date is 1,804 and the area 266,340 acres.

Third. The number of pre-emption filings made in Montana to June 30, 1888, was 9,208, covering an estimated area of 1,383,200.

Fourth. The number of original desert entries made in Montana to June 30, 1888, was 2,469, embracing an area of 876,029.74 acres.

Fifth. The number of final desert-land entries to June 30, 1888, was 760, with an area of 224,782.63 acres.

Sixth. The number of acres sold as coal land to June 30, 1888, was 8,818.25.

Seventh. The number of mineral applications filed to June 30, 1888, is 2,135.

Eighth. The number of mineral entries made to June 30, 1888, is 1,804.

Ninth. The area of Montana in square miles is 143,776.

Tenth. The number of acres in Montana is 92,016,640.

Eleventh. The number of acres surveyed to June 30, 1888, is 18,604,729.

Twelfth. The estimated area embraced in Indian reservations is 10,818,760 acres.

Thirteenth. The estimated area embraced in military reservations is 855,703.84 acres.

Fourteenth. The estimated area of the grant, in Montana, to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, is 17,838,000 acres, of which there have been selected to June 30, 1888, 4,185,187.95 acres.

Fifteenth. The total amount received from the disposals of the public lands in Montana to June 30, 1888, is $1,651,423.77.

Sixteenth. The amount deposited by individuals for surveying the public lands in Montana to June 30, is $77,268.25.

INDIAN LANDS—ESTIMATED AREA OF EXISTING INDIAN RESERVATIONS IN MONTANA.

Reservations.	Acres.
Crow	4,712,960
Flathead	1,433,600
Northern Cheyenne	371,200
Fort Peck	1,932,000
Belknap	460,000
Blackfoot	1,909,000

Many of these lands will ultimately become a part of the public domain, as they are far in excess of the needs of the Indians.

At the first session of the present Congress I introduced a bill which became a law, by which nearly 18,000,000 acres of Indian lands were restored to the public domain, being carved out of the Blackfoot reservation in Northern Montana, leaving less than 11,000,000 acres embraced within our reservations. What is known as the Dawes severalty law is being put into practical operation in Montana among the Crows. One thousand and sixty-three allotments have been made to the Crows, and 1,337 persons belonging to that tribe remain entitled to allotments. It is estimated that after all allotments have been made to these Indians there will be a surplus of about 4,250,000 acres of land which may be disposed of under the severalty act of February 8, 1887.

POPULATION.

There has been no census since 1880, but the rapid increase of the population of the Territory can be nearly determined by the vote cast in the Territory at elections held for Delegate in Congress in 1884, 1886, and 1888, which was as follows:

Total vote polled in—

It must be remembered that in the great extent of country covered by Montana a considerable number of people must necessarily live remote from voting precincts and do not vote. It is also proper to note in this connection that the laws of the Territory require six months' residence as a condition-precedent to the right to vote.

It is therefore fair to say, in view of the causes just mentioned, that the non-voting population was fully 10 per cent. of the vote cast, or about 4,000. If we estimate four inhabitants to one voter, a conservative estimate, we will find that the population at the last election was about 176,000; and estimating the increase for the future according to the ratio of the six years last past, we will have considerably over 200,000 people before we could possibly perfect our State organization and secure admission under the present bill. I want it understood that I am making the most conservative estimate, and underestimating rather than overestimating anything.

But upon the point of population it ought to be sufficient to say that favorable reports have been made upon the admission of Montana both in the House and Senate in this and the Forty-ninth Congress; both of which reports were based upon the fact that at those several times her population was equal to the present unit of representation in the House. There is no limitation on the power of Congress to admit new States into the Union as supposed by some. No given number of population is required. The smallest population of any State at the time of admission was Illinois, which was admitted in 1818, and which had 34,620 inhabitants. The largest was that of Wisconsin, which was admitted in 1848 with a population of 180,000.

ASSESSED VALUATION.

The assessed value of property was in—
1881	$34,040,866

This assessment does not embrace the great mining properties of the Territories, which are exempt from taxation, but represents only the solid and enduring wealth assessed at two-thirds of its cash value. It does not embrace 827 miles of railroad, which is exempt from taxation by act of Congress as long as we remain a Territory. It does not embrace the land grant of the Northern Pacific Railroad, amounting to 17,838,000 acres of land within our Territory, which will become taxable whenever the Government shall have surveyed the same. It is fair to conclude that the total valuation of assessable property in Montana at this time is considerably over $100,000,000, the items comprising which will be considered separately hereafter.

The Territory is composed of sixteen organized counties.

OUT OF DEBT.

Montana enjoys the enviable distinction of being out of debt, with $130,192.76 in her treasury and a low rate of taxation.

EXPORTS FOR 1888.

For the year 1888 our exports amounted to $57,000,000; they embraced the product of our mines, the sale of sheep, wool, cattle, hides, horses, and surplus agricultural products.

MINERAL RESOURCES.

Since the organization of Montana as a Territory it has been famous for the extent and richness of its mines. It is therefore not essential that I should dwell upon a matter of such general notoriety. Suffice it to say that there is not a county in the Territory that is not rich in the precious metals. We have steadily pressed forward in the amount of our mineral output of gold, silver, and copper, until we are far in advance of any State or Territory, and yet it is but fair to say that this great industry is only in its infancy. Aside from the great gold and silver interest, the largest copper plant in the world is at Anaconda, Mont. This concern in its various departments—including the mine and other auxiliaries—employs about twenty-six hundred men.

The aggregate output of gold, silver, and copper in Montana for the calendar year 1888, as ascertained from the most reliable sources, was $40,500,000. There have just been erected at Helena and Great Falls two additional smelters of large capacities, which will guaranty an output from our mines for 1889 of not less than $50,000,000. It is conceded by everybody familiar with the subject that we have the greatest number of dividend-paying mines of any district in the United States. Nine of the principal mines, the reports of which only I have been able to obtain, returned dividends for 1888 as follows:

Granite Mountain	1,800,000
Hope	50,000
Dunston	6,000
Jay Gould	196,000
Montana Limited	534,600
Parrot	148,000
Original	6,000
Hecla Consolidated	180,000
Total	3,318,600

Which is more than one-fourth of the total amount paid by mines in the United States and Mexico during the past year.

AGRICULTURAL RESOURCES.

The extent of our agricultural products in the Territories is almost the subject of mathematical calculation. In many parts of the Territory we have sufficient rain to raise crops. We are not, however, made to depend upon the uncertainties of rainfall; we resort almost uniformly to the method of artificial irrigation. This system is no more nor less than tapping the mountain streams by ditches or canals and conveying it thence onto the ranches or farms, over which it is then spread from lateral ditches so constructed as to cover the land by natural flow. It is a simple, easy, and inexpensive method when the ditches are once constructed. The water that is used is living water, coming from the mountains and plateaus freighted with the richest fertilizing materials derived from decaying vegetation and the soils of the upper regions, which are spread by the waters used in irrigation over the cultivated lands.

Observation and experience have demonstrated in the Western States and Territories that all lands upon which water can be supplied by artificial means are capable of being reduced to the highest state of cultivation, at least so far as the cereals are concerned; and as before suggested, they enjoy complete immunity from the vicissitudes of scant or excessive rainfall. The opinion is fast gaining ground that too much attention has heretofore been paid to the chemical composition of the soils and too little to those physical conditions by which moisture and air are supplied to the roots of vegetation. Let me submit the testimony of the governor of Montana as to our agricultural possibilities. In his last report to the Secretary of the Interior he says:

There has been a marvelous stride forward in agriculture, astounding to the people who were skeptical as to the value and capabilities of Montana soil for farming purposes. The results achieved by the sturdy ranchmen who have settled in the valleys and upon lands all over the Territory have manifested the capacity of these lands for successful culture and production of agricultural crops, remunerative in the highest degree. It can be stated in truth that the average yield per acre of wheat, oats, Irish potatoes, and cultivated grass in Montana, for the year 1887, was not equaled by that of any Territory or State. This great foundation interest of all others in this American country is here in Montana rapidly extending and growing in importance. These rich, cheap lands have attracted the attention of the student farmer seeking a home, and in their culture and trial they have demonstrated to the world that this is not only the country of grass and valuable minerals, but is the farmer's country as well.

At the first session of the present Congress I had the honor to submit some remarks upon the origin, extent, and advantage of irrigation, with the view of enlisting Government aid in the construction of a system of dams and reservoirs in what are commonly known as the arid regions of the United States. A brief reference to the same subject may not be uninteresting at this time. Aside from personal observation, I have drawn largely from the very excellent presentation of this question by Col. Charles A. Paston in a pamphlet written a few years ago calling public attention to the importance of reclaiming our arid lands by this method.

Irrigation existed in Egypt before the pyramids were erected. It has fed the millions of Asia since the creation of the world. It nurtured Rome into existence, and was practiced in America before Columbus discovered the New World, and yet the people of the United States east of the Mississippi River know but little about it.

The Moors introduced irrigation into Spain, and the Spaniards imported an imperfect system of irrigation into Mexico, Texas, California, etc. The valley of the Nile has yielded its fruitful abundance from irrigated lands for countless ages, and Cato wrote learnedly advocating its introduction into Italy; but the greatest achievement of modern times has been the improvement of the system of irrigation in the East Indies by the British Government of India. Irrigation in the East Indies antedates all history; the Great Mogul gave it a grand impetus during the magnificence of his reign.

When the British Government (after the Sepoy mutiny) took the control of more than two hundred and fifty millions of subjects in India, the first duty of statesmanship was to provide labor and food for the people, and this has been accomplished by the extension of a system of irrigating canals unequaled in the world. Famine in India is rendered impossible as long as the Himalayas give their melted snows to fructify the Indian valleys. The Ganges Canal, with its branches, is 3,500 miles long.

The greatest prerequisite to success in agriculture, fruit-raising, etc., in the Western States and Territories is water. A constant and abundant supply of water is the true key to Western progress and development. In nearly all of that country the rainfall is insufficient, and not to be relied upon; hence Western people have been forced to study the problem of irrigation. Having been forced to look into this question, we naturally try to trace up its origin and history.

The system found in California and in this country has been bequeathed to us by Mexico, and was inherited by them from Spain. Looking further back, we find that it was one among the many good gifts which the Moors gave to Spain when they overran that country in the eighth century. Whether the Moors obtained it direct from the Arabs or took it from the Egyptians we are unable to determine at this late day. But in inquiring after its still more ancient origin and source we must not stop this side of the valleys of the Euphrates and Tigris. If we start here in the dim and shadowy ages of antiquity, beyond which even tradition becomes unintelligible, we will find that, with few exceptions, the highest types of civilization and the brightest examples of progress and prosperity have been located, sustained, and nurtured by systems of irrigation.

ANCIENT IRRIGATION.

The glory, grandeur, and wealth of royal Babylon, of Nineveh, Thebes, Bagdad, Cairo, and Memphis, around which, as common centers, the civilization of the great periods of time hung and radiated, were all attributable to and dependent upon the agricultural perfection surrounding them, and made possible by irrigation. I might go further and say that it was the support and sustenance of the civilized world long after the cessation of Roman sway. For none will fail to recognize that the Nile country alone supported what was known as the Roman world, and that Egypt was also regarded as the granary of the empire. The Egyptian people were overthrown and vanished, but their system of irrigation survived and gave sustenance to civilization, and remained intact through all vicissitudes and changes.

If anything, irrigation was better in the days of Semiramis than in the days of Boabdil, although, like the other concomitants of the beautiful Alhambra, orchards, vineyards, meadows, as then seen along the banks of the Guadalquivir, speak of a splendid development, both material and intellectual. The Moors obtained from their Arab progenitors a taste for astronomy and some inclination towards practical mathematics, and to some extent we find applied mathematics in its crude state assisting in making large portions of their country bloom and blossom as the rose by the ingenious devices which the Moors had of supplying water to the gardens, orchards, vineyards, and beautiful meadows which dotted old Hispania during their occupancy.

It is a fact which can not be controverted that after the reconquest of Spain and the expulsion of the Moriscoes, Spain began to decline. The splendid schools of Granada and the numerous manufactories of Valencia and other places gradually faded away and left Spain without any support save that which she gathered by the sword, for she had neglected almost entirely her irrigation system; and the apology for one which we have, and which was found in California when that State was acquired, is the system handed down by the successors of those Spaniards who vanquished and expelled the Moriscoes from Spain.

PROGRESS REQUIRED.

I have touched but very briefly upon its antiquity for the reason that four-fifths, we might even say nine-tenths, of English speaking people are practically unacquainted with this system. Their civilization, comparatively speaking, is in its infancy; it is still jejune, and has grown up in a climate of moisture and regular rainfall and operating upon what might be termed virgin soil, and until recently the people of the United States had no necessity of irrigation. But times are changing, and the time will come when four-fifths of the population of America may be dependent upon irrigation in their agricultural pursuits. We will therefore do well to look into this question, and when the American idea once takes hold of it systems new and prolific will evolve wonderful results.

I make the broad statement that the results of irrigation in California, Colorado, Montana, Idaho, Arizona, and New Mexico show, in a large majority of instances, an increase of 100 per cent. over results dependent upon rainfall alone in the Eastern and Middle States. The history of the West proves this statement to be correct.

Before leaving this subject I ought to say that it now seems very probable that an extensive system of dams and reservoirs will be constructed in the Territories of Montana, Arizona, and New Mexico and the State of Colorado for the reclamation by irrigation of their arid lands. The act of October 2, 1888, provided for the survey of these lands with that view. The following is the text of that portion of the statute:

For the purpose of investigating the extent to which the arid region of the United States can be redeemed by irrigation and segregation of the irrigable lands in such arid region, and for the selection of sites for reservoirs and other hydraulic works necessary for the storage and utilization of water for irrigation and the prevention of floods and overflows, and to make the necessary maps, including the pay of employés in field and in office, the cost of all instruments, apparatus, and materials, and all other necessary expenses connected therewith, the work to be performed by the Geological Survey, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary. And the Director of the Geological Survey, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, shall make a report to Congress, on the first Monday in December of each year, showing in detail how the said money has been expended, the amount used for actual survey and engineer work in the field in locating sites for reservoirs, and an itemized account of the expenditures under this appropriation. And all the lands which may hereafter be designated or selected by such United States surveys for sites for reservoirs, ditches, or canals for irrigation purposes, and all the lands made susceptible of irrigation by such reservoirs, ditches, or canals, are from this time henceforth hereby reserved from sale as the property of the United States, and shall not be subject, after the passage of this act, to entry, settlement, or occupation until further provided by law: Provided, That the President may at any time, in his discretion, by proclamation, open any portion or all of the lands reserved by this provision to settlement under the homestead laws.

Pursuant to this statute steps were at once taken to secure an irrigation survey of the arid region of the United States.

WORK IN MONTANA.

Professor Powell of the Geological Survey, under whose direction this work is to proceed, in referring to the work done in Montana, in his report to Congress of January 2, 1889, says:

Work was commenced on the Continental Divide, at the headwaters of the Columbia and Missouri Rivers, early in October, one party surveying on the Columbia River side and another on the Missouri River side. The whole was under the immediate charge of Mr. E. M. Douglas. An area of 2,200 square miles has been surveyed. The topographic features of this country were delineated, the courses of the streams and sites of all considerable bodies of water were ascertained, and the altitude, position, and general character of irrigable lands were determined. This is a region of abundant perennial streams, and many sites favorable for the establishment of storage reservoirs have been discovered.

THE COMMISSIONER OF AGRICULTURE PAYS A HIGH TRIBUTE TO OUR AGRICULTURAL LANDS IN NORTHERN MONTANA.

Hon. Norman J. Colman, Commissioner of Agriculture, in company with a large number of representatives of the agricultural press, visited Montana last summer for the express purpose of examining into our agricultural possibilities. They were enthusiastic in their admiration of our climate and the capacity of our soil. They knew a good thing when they saw it. I will read an extract from a petition recently presented by them to Congress referring to a section of country just opened to settlement and embracing 17,600,000 acres of land:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The petition of the subscribers, citizens of the respective States named herein, showeth: That during the summer of 1888 your petitioners, proprietors or representatives of the New England Farmer, Boston, Mass.; the American Agriculturist, New York City, N. Y.; the Farm Journal, Philadelphia, Pa.; the Ohio Farmer, Cleveland, Ohio; the Indiana Farmer, Indianapolis, Ind.; the Rural World, St. Louis, Mo.; the Western Rural, Chicago, Ill.; Orange Judd Farmer, Chicago, Ill.; the Western Farmer, Madison, Wis.; Farm Stock and Home, Minneapolis, Minn., representing 2,500,000 readers, in a body explored the late Blackfoot Indian reserve lands in Northern Montana Territory, to which the United States acquired title by act of Congress approved February 8, 1887, with a view of examining the quality and desirability of the lands for settlement, in response to numerous inquiries from the patrons and readers of these papers throughout the United States.

On a pretty wide examination of this country, they found it exceedingly desirable for homesteads and actual settlement, to which by said act of Congress it has been dedicated. For the purpose of enabling many thousands of other citizens of the United States whom we represent to take homesteads and settle on these fertile lands, we join the settlers and those desiring homesteads on these lands in petitioning your honorable body to direct that a section of said lands, at some point to be selected on the line of the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway, between the national military reserve of Fort Assinniboine, on the west, and Fort Belknap on the east, to be sold at the minimum price of $1.25 per acre, and that the title to the same be invested in the trustee of the Agricultural Press Association, Norman J. Colman, which is composed of the proprietors and representatives of the said papers, and which have become a corporate body, organized for the purpose of aiding homestead settlement on the lands aforesaid, and in supplying a trade center in the Milk River Valley, on said section of land.

Your petitioners further respectfully represent that these lands are exceedingly fertile, and lying in a latitude greatly modified and made most salubrious by the influences of the warm Japanese current of the Pacific Ocean are attracting settlers, and that a trade center is essential for the convenience of the settlers of this great valley. And your petitioners will ever pray.

I believe that the section of country here referred to will in the near future prove second to none in the Northwest as a great wheat-producing region. Its capacity to do so, I think, has already been established, and it seems very probable that in this section irrigation will be unnecessary.

WHAT THE SOIL HAS PRODUCED.

I give a few well-authenticated instances, compiled by reliable authority, showing what Montana soil can do.

C. Milton raised 1,500 bushels of oats from 30 acres.

Percy St. Clair raised 1,900 bushels of grain from 36 acres.

Noah and James Gee had 60 acres of oats that yielded 3,640 bushels.

G. C. Monroe, of Spring Hill, thrashed 1,900 bushels of oats from 37 acres.

George H. Gee, of Spring Hill, thrashed 2,700 bushels of oats from 39 acres.

H. Crouse, of Spring Hill, thrashed 2,989 bushels of oats off of 50 acres of land.

A. Walton, of Spring Hill, had 49 acres of oats that yielded 2,150 bushels, and 23 acres of wheat that yielded 1,010 bushels.

Joseph Sparling, of East Gallatin, raised 4,500 bushels of grain from 150 acres.

Albert W. Walton thrashed 1,700 bushels of oats from 10 acres without irrigation.

R. M. Craven, of Hillsdale, thrashed over 7,000 bushels of grain from 150 acres.

J. B. Moore, of Hillsboro, had 35 acres of oats that averaged 70 bushels per acre.

T. L. Luce, of East Gallatin, thrashed 4,000 bushels of oats from 65 acres of land.

S. J. McGuire, of Mill Creek, thrashed 3,845 bushels from 80 acres, 200 of which was wheat.

John Ferguson, of Spring Hill, recently thrashed from 100 acres 3,090 bushels of Scotch Fife wheat.

Thomas Reese, of Reese Creek, had nearly 80 acres of oats, from which he thrashed 4,300 bushels.

Ben Ferguson thrashed 1,650 bushels of oats from 530 acres and 530 bushels of Scotch Fife wheat from 20 acres.

John E. Reese, of Reese Creek, had 88 acres of wheat that yielded 3,270 bushels, and 30 acres of oats that yielded 2,200 bushels.

George E. Davis, of Mill Creek, 3,700 bushels of oats on 50 acres; 15 acres of the above 50 yielded 1,320 bushels, and 2,122 bushels of wheat grew on 60 acres.

Theo. Norman raised 5,500 bushels of oats upon 74 acres, and had a volunteer crop of 1,500 bushels of Fife wheat upon 80 acres, upon which he raised 1,000 bushels last year.

A. Truman, of Spring Hill, thrashed 1,745 bushels of oats from 30 acres. Mr. Truman, as well as a number of other farmers in the vicinity of Spring Hill, has been troubled with grasshoppers, making the yield lighter than it would have been.

FRUIT.

Montana has already demonstrated her capacity to produce the finest-flavored small fruits. Strawberries, blackberries, currants, and this class of fruits abound as native growths, and when cultivated produce prolific crops. Apples of the hardy variety do well. So far the Missouri and Bitter Root valleys appear to be better adapted to their successful cultivation. I have visited the splendid orchards of Mr. John G. Pickening in the former, and Mr. William E. Bass in the latter valley, and the apples there grown, for size, flavor, and firmness, compare favorably with any I ever saw. Here is the evidence of a fruit-grower in the Bitter Root valley:

W. B. Harlan, of Como, Missoula County, an old-time fruit-grower of that section, writes as follows to the Helena Live-Stock Journal: "I had over 20,000 pounds of orchard fruits of thirty-five varieties. My oldest trees are six years in the ground, and some of that age yielded four and five boxes each, while the largest crabs yielded ten boxes. As to relative hardiness I can scarcely give an opinion, for I do not think I have lost any trees from winter-killing out of over sixty varieties, but nearly all of them are considered hardy kinds, and most of them Iron Clads. I have Ben Davis, Winesap, Dominie, Northern Spy, and the Tolman Sweet doing well here, while they can not be raised at all in Northern Iowa, Wisconsin, or in any part of Minnesota. Of pears, Flemish Beauty seems entirely hardy, and several other sorts half hardy. Of plums, the Green, Yellow, and Imperial Gage seem hardy; also Lombard, Pond's Seedling, De Soto, and others. I have fifty varieties of new Russian fruits, but they are not yet bearing. I expect great things from them."

RIVERS.

Perhaps none of the Territories are so well watered as Montana. I make no mention of the smaller streams, but notice only the larger. Among them may be mentioned the Missouri, which is navigable from its mouth to Fort Benton, in Northern Montana, and which has served as a check in the past upon the unreasonable exactions of other methods of transportation; the Yellowstone, which is navigable from its mouth to Miles City, in Eastern Montana; the Rosebud and Tongue Rivers, in the same section; the Madison, the Jefferson, and Gallatin, in Eastern and Central Montana, furnish an unlimited supply of water. Canal companies are now engaged in the construction of irrigating canals, tapping these rivers, which will reclaim millions of acres of land for agricultural purposes.

In Western Montana the Big Blackfoot, the Little Blackfoot, the Hellgate, the Bitter Root, and Flathead Lake were the great factors in producing the marvelous growth and prosperity of that section. In Southern Montana, the Beaverhead, the Bighole, and other streams serve a similar purpose. In Northern Montana, near Fort Benton, in the Sun River country and in the Blackfoot country are large lakes which never appear to vary in the quantity of their water supply. These also are being tapped by canals for irrigating purposes; I predict that within one year the present agricultural area of Montana will be doubled. To these must be added the Teton, the Sun River, and the Marias, in Northern Montana, and the Big and Little Boulder in Central Montana, thus furnishing a system of water ways unexcelled in any part of the Northwest.

CLIMATE.

Latitudes have been shown to be wholly unreliable upon the question of climate. I undertake to say that the climate of Montana, for health and vigor, is unsurpassed in the United States. Epidemic and pulmonary troubles are unknown to us. The fact that for a few days at a time the mercury drops to 15° or 20° below zero is no cause for alarm nor a just criterion by which to judge our climate. There is no moisture in the atmosphere in that country. It is a dry climate, and I am prepared to testify that the temperature in the city of Washington indicated by 10° above zero is more severe than 10° below zero in the dry climate of Montana; but the cold weather referred to is not continuous; it is softened and tempered by a genial wind from the west, called the Chinook, which removes the snow with great rapidity, and brings us balmy days in mid winter most unexpectedly. It always seems to reach us at the proper time. Laden with the least trace of the spices of the tropics from whence it comes, its gentle touch is like Italian softness, transforming silvern winter into golden Indian summer. It is the vade mecum of the Montanian. It has been so admirably described by Governor Semple, of Washington Territory, in his report to the Interior Department, that I must repeat it. He says:

This is a balmy wind, coming from the Kuro Siwo, or Great Japanese current, of the Pacific Ocean. In the summer it is a cool wind, and tempers the heat of summer so that nowhere within its range do people fall down with sunstrokes. In the winter it is a warm, moist wind, and is sometimes slightly odoriferous, as if spice-laden from the tropics. It is so gentle upon ordinary occasions that its presence could not be noted by its motion, and it is almost miraculous in its effects. Snow and ice disapper before it with rapidity, and it seems to be able to blow for long distances between walls of colder air without parting with its heat. Sometimes it constitutes an upper current, in which case the remarkable spectacle is witnessed of snow melting from the mountain tops while thermometers in the valleys register below freezing point. At other times it is the surface current, and follows the valleys and gorges as a flood might follow them. It seems to bear healing upon its wings, like Sandalphon, the Angel of Prayer, and it is not difficult to conceive that the Indians would wish to personify it in order to fix upon it their devotions.

This wind sometimes penetrates as far as the upper stretches of the Missouri, and even tempers the air on the plains of Dakota beyond the Rocky Mountains. Wherever it goes the chains of winter are unloosed and the ice-bound rivers are set free. The Chinook is the natural enemy of the odious east wind, and while, ordinarily, it wields its influence as gently as the zephyrs that waft the thistle downs in autumn, still there are times when the two winds engage in giant conflicts and fight for supremacy, now in the upper, then in the lower strata, on the mountains and in the valleys, alternately driving each other back and forth, swaying the trees, tossing the leaves, and swirling the rain-drops or the crystals of snow, as the one or the other advances. But the combat is never long, and the victory is always with the Chinook. The inhabitants east of the Cascade Mountains, when winter has seized them, and the east wind dashes snow in their faces, pray for the Chinook to come. They look by day for its moist front, and listen by night for the noise of its combat with the east wind, and when it reaches them they rejoice.

Such is the Chinook wind, the blessed wind, of the far Northwest.

CATTLE.

The observations heretofore made concerning free ranges are applicable also to cattle. This industry has made rapid strides within the last few years, demonstrating that our ranges are lasting and that they are the best maturing grounds for cattle to be found. Without providing shelter or feeding a pound of hay or anything except the native grasses as they grow and cure upon the range, we send our cattle rolling fat to the great beef markets of the country, commanding the highest prices paid for range cattle. The number of cattle now in Montana is about 1,500,000, representing the choicest and best breeds. Disease among cattle, sheep, and horses is comparatively unknown with us.

SHEEP.

The country embraced within the present Territories of the United States is destined to become the great sheep range of the future. These Territories are now producing large quantities of superior wool and the finest mutton. We have the benefit of an illimitable free range upon public land, which is fit only for grazing purposes, and free timber for sheds and other building purposes. We winter our sheep upon the native grasses, hence it is apparent that that industry can not long survive in the States east of the Mississippi, where flocks have to be fed upon the products of land which commands a hundred dollars an acre. There are over 2,500,000 sheep in the Territory of Montana, and the wool-clip for the last year brought over $1,500,000. It is claimed that mutton alone will pay the cost of raising sheep in Montana, and that the wool clipped and sold is all profit.

HORSES.

Montana is the natural home for the horse; our altitude is conducive to great development of lung power, our mountain streams are the purest and best water, and the gravelly ranges serve to make the hardest and best feet. Like sheep, our horses feed upon the open ranges the year round, and consequently return handsome revenue to those engaged in the business. There are considerably over 200,000 now on our ranges; we ship them in car-load lots to the East, just as we do cattle and sheep.

In order that I may fairly present this industry in all its magnitude and importance I call attention to the following from the Rocky Mountain Husbandman, the leading stock journal of the Territory:

To be assured that Montana is destined to become one of the greatest horse-producing sections in America, we only have to examine into the affairs that exist in regard to this industry. The introduction of the best blood of the continent with the establishment of our breeding farms from twelve to fifteen years ago, and every year since that date, has marked the incoming of the best of sires, and of later years our horsemen have been bringing both dams and sires. We not only have numerous representatives of the finest and most renowned families of the great American horse, the trotter, but we have thoroughbreds that stand at the top round of the ladder of running fame, and draught horses of every description from beyond the ocean. We have the choicest productions of France and England. Not one or two of each breed, but hundreds have been shipped in, to say nothing of what has been produced here.

As our country has progressed our horsemen have from year to year gone East and attended the stock exhibitions of Chicago, St. Louis, Louisville, and Lexington, and, in fact, have ransacked the Blue Grass State, and spared no expense in securing the best. The stock thus purchased has been brought to Montana and scattered through our valleys, until there is scarcely a herd that does not boast of its celebrities, and most of them number their choice animals by the score. And this year the influx of promising youngsters has been greater than any previous one, and next year will excel this. We have fully one hundred breeding farms in Montana that boast of from fifty to two hundred head of standard-bred trotters, thoroughbreds, or pure-blooded draught animals of some of the popular breeds, and this, together with the incoming of the best the older sections of the State can produce, will certainly make itself felt in the produce of our country.

But a few years ago the general character of our horses doing service was very ordinary. Now our farmers are beginning to sport spanking teams. Grade Normans, Percherons, Clydes, English draughts and Shire horses are beginning to be the rule rather than the exception, and every village and community has its steppers. Three-minute horses, but a few years since so rare, are now found upon many of our farms and about our small towns. Our people are beginning to pride themselves upon their horse-flesh. Nearly every town and community and most every breeding farm has a race-course, and we are growing—almost unconsciously though it be—to be a horse people. With the rate at which shipments are being made of the best, and the increase of those on hand, one can readily see that a most brilliant future is in store for this industry.

IRON.

The Territory is simply threaded with veins of iron. So far we have established no manufactories for its consumption, and the only way in which it is utilized is for fluxing purposes in the reduction of the precious metals. Large quantities, however, are used for this purpose. The Belt range of mountains in the vicinity of Great Falls is virtually a mountain of magnetic iron, an analysis of which shows it to be second to none in the country for the construction of Bessemer steel, and in the days to come, when the labor cost shall be reduced, iron-work and other manufactories of no mean proportions are sure to spring up at Great Falls, a thriving city of 3,000 people, situated on the Missouri River, and on the line of the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba and the Montana Central Railroads, convenient to which are the great Sandcoulee coal-fields and the unlimited power furnished by the Great Falls of the Missouri River.

COAL-FIELDS.

The fuel supply in Montana is no longer an open question. Our mines are being worked systematically, and from this time forward will show an immense output. These mines are near Cinnabar, Gardiner, Livingston, Sandcoulee, Timberline, Trail Creek, and Red Lodge, and at other points. The coal at Red Lodge is said to be very hard bituminous, requiring the use of powder for mining. The immensity of this field can be approximated when it is known that fifteen veins of discovered coal at Red Lodge are covered by 1½ miles of bluff front, and that these veins are from 4½ to 20 feet in thickness, aggregating 136 feet of clear coal. The Timberline, Red Lodge, Sandcoulee, and Livingston mines are reached by railroads. At the latter place the Livingston Coal and Coke Company erected, over a year ago, a large number of coke-ovens and commenced the manufacture of coke extensively. The product of this camp is said to be equal to the best Pennsylvania coke.

What I have said upon this subject is confirmed by Professor G. C. Swallow, for many years State geologist of Missouri, and for ten years last past a resident of Montana, and whose opinion is of great value. His observations are embodied in the following letter:

HELENA, MONT., January 4, 1889.

MY DEAR SIR: My engagements have been such that I could not answer your inquiries as to coal in Montana until to-day.

The whole country east of the main range of the Rocky Mountains, and between the Dearborn and the reservation north, and probably to the Dominion, and as far east as the mouth of Sun River, is underlaid with coal. It is opened in several places on the Dearborn, on the ridge north of the Dearborn, on Flat Creek, at Eagle Rock, in many places on Sun River, on the Missouri below Ulm, on the Teton above Choteau, on the Muddy in several places, on Birch Creek, and on the Marias. I saw the coal-beds in all these places and found it abundant and of good quality. In all the locations mentioned above, the coal is mined for local uses only.

At Sandcoulee the coal is good, the bed is thick, and is now worked extensively for the smelters at Great Falls, and for Helena, Great Falls, Benton, and other markets. The Montana Central uses this coal for its locomotives and stations. The same coal-bed, 12 feet thick, is opened in several places on Belt Creek, at Belt City, and also on Smith's or Deep River, and Hound Creek, west of Sandcoulee, and another bed is opened on Willow Creek and at Chestnut.

The workings at Sandcoulee have shown the presence there of at least 20,000,000 tons of marketable coal. There is as much more at the Belt mines, and half as much more in sight on Smith's River. Doubtless the quantity in each place is much larger. The above estimate is what is proved up.

There are three coal areas in the Judith basin, one extending from Utica to the northwest some 15 miles across Willow Creek. This bed is the same as that at Sandcoulee. The quality is good and the quantity is very great. There are two other coal basins on the western flank of the Judith Mountains, and another on the eastern flank. But little is known of these coal areas. Parties are now opening these mines.

There is another large and valuable coal area north of the Musselshell, and extending from Swimming Woman Creek to Careless Creek. There is also the Bull Mountain coal-field between the Musselshell and Yellowstone, at the head of Razor Creek. There are six or seven workable seams in this area, and the coal is good and the quantity immense. There is a coal basin south of the Yellowstone and west of Fort Keogh. Of this coal I know nothing save the locality.

The Rock Creek coal area, to which they are now constructing a railroad from Park City, is one of the most important in the Territory. There are seven beds and a total thickness of coal in all of the beds, 47 feet. The coal is very good and the quantity is said to be very great. These coals will soon be mined in large quantities and placed in the markets of the Territory.

The outcroppings of the Bozeman coal-beds have been traced for a distance of more than 30 miles, and the beds are extensively worked in several places. The Williams mine, 9 miles west of Livingston, now runs forty coke-ovens and make nearly 50 tons of coke a day. This coke is used at Wickes and Toston.

Several mines are worked in the Gardiner coal-field on the Yellowstone near the National Park. This coal is very good, and is largely used by the Northern Pacific Railroad. In December the Horr mine in this coal-field took out and shipped by rail 2,400 tons to the markets on that railroad. The outcroppings of this coal-bed have been traced from Mount Evarts, in the Park, to Mount Cinnabar, and thence west and south towards Electric Peak for many miles.

The Timberline coal-mines have been worked for several years with good results.

They are now opening up the coal-mines in the Gallatin valley, with good prospects of developing large quantities of good coal.

A coal-mine has also been opened between Radersburgh and Boulder City, which is mined for local uses only.

There is a large coal area on the west side of the range in Missoula County. It has been opened in several places for local uses; but I can not speak with any certainty about the quantity and quality of the coal.

There are vast quantities of coal on the Missouri River at the Coal Banks and below. But what I saw of it, and what we tested on the steam-boats many years ago, did not prove very good. Some of the beds have since been worked with good results. There are six or eight beds extending under large areas of the country, but I can not say how much of it will prove good.

Extensive coal-beds are found on Milk River, but I have never seen them, and have no data to give you any useful information about them.

It may be safely said that the coal deposits of Montana are practically inexhaustible, and they are in such varieties as to supply all the demands for domestic use, for generating steam, and for smelting ores. A large portion of them make excellent coke, as the Bozemau bed, and others will work in furnaces for smelting ores, as the Sandcoulee and Belt coals.

Yours, very truly,

G. C. SWALLOW.

Hon. J. K. TOOLE,
House of Representatives.

FIRE-CLAY.

Fire-clay of a superior quality has been discovered near Thompson Falls, Anaconda, Garrison, Dillon, and Helena. The use of the domestic article promises to become universal in Montana. Considering the large number of mills, furnaces, and smelters steadily running in Montana, it is apparent that this industry is destined to be a large one even if the demand should be confined to the Territory.

OTHER MINERAL.

The Territory abounds in granite, sandstone, limestone, and a superior quality of marble. No finer or more enduring building material is to be found anywhere. The marble quarries in the vicinity of Deer Lodge, Helena, and Gardiner are known to be of excellent quality, and we are only awaiting the hand of enterprise and capital to give direction and control to a great and profitable industry in that material.

TIMBER.

Our mountains are covered with a dense growth of pine, spruce, and fir. On the more precipitous mountains we have a growth called lodge-pole pine; it scarcely ever exceeds 8 or 10 inches in diameter and grows as straight as an arrow, reaching as high as 70 feet. This is the character of timber used for fencing and also for lagging in deep mining. It exists in great quantities, and wherever found is so thick that it reminds you of fields of growing corn. In no section of the country is there a great scarcity of timber, but by far the finest and best timber to be found is on the west side of the main range of the Rocky Mountains in Deer Lodge and Missoula Counties. Here the size and density of its growth is marvelous, resembling very much the famous timber lands of our sister Territory of Washington.

There is no law by which we can purchase these lands; but a law which has long prevailed of permitting the settler to cut and remove timber from mineral lands for agricultural, mining, and domestic purposes without cost still obtains. This privilege is regulated by rules made by the Interior Department under authority of law. Exportation of timber is prohibited. Our greatest difficulty about the preservation of timber arises from forest fires. Annually more timber is destroyed by these fires than our population would consume in five years. But we have an abundance for all time, which, with the great deposits of coal heretofore spoken of, settles permanently the fuel question for Montana.

RAILROADS.

We have about 2,000 miles of railroad constructed and in operation in Montana, giving us virtually three transcontinental lines. The Northern Pacific, the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba, and the Utah and Northern, connecting the two mentioned with the Union and Central Pacific at Ogden in Utah. Every county seat but three has railroad connections with these through lines of travel, and both of these have projected lines which will be built in another year.

SCHOOLS.

We have a first-class public-school system. Governor Leslie, who has derived his information from official sources, reports as follows to the Secretary of the Interior:

The subject of education is a favorite theme in every household in Montana. The people are united and have one common spirit of the largest liberality and eager willingness in sustaining and advancing their public schools. Every child of school age in the Territory is on the school-roll and is at school nine months of the year. In this Territory there is in each of the cities and large towns the very best and highest class of graded schools, and in all the schools of the Territory the very best class of teachers, superintendents, etc.

Montana has no public school fund amounting up to millions, as have the people of the States. The school fund for public schools in this Territory is in the hearts of the people and the taxation of their property. The entire fund, supplemented by a small amount derived from fines, is raised from year to year by direct taxation. No one complains of it; and yet there is more money paid out per capita for public schools by Montana's people than is paid by the people (including their assistance from their great school funds) of any of the States. Besides these public schools for the children that can see, hear, and talk; the Territory has provided by law (and it is being done) for the education of all the blind children and deaf-mutes between eight and eighteen years of age in the Territory, at the very best institutions for that afflicted class in the United States, and pay for their education and transportation, under care of a paid escort from their homes.

St. Vincent's Academy, one of the oldest and best institutions of learning in the Territory, is situated at Helena. A classical school is also maintained there, and a denominational school under the auspices of the Methodist Episcopal Church is being established at the same place. A college, where a purely business course in book-keeping is taught, is also one of the permanent institutions of the capital. At Deer Lodge a college of superior merit, and perhaps the best equipped corps of teachers in the Territory is maintained. Under a recent act of Congress an agricultural college is to be founded. The Legislature now in session will doubtless do whatever is necessary to give us the benefit of the substantial aid provided in the act of Congress referred to, and when we shall have received the benefits to be derived from our school lands so long withheld from us by the General Government, we will have a permanent fund of sufficient amount to give us the best possible educational institutions. We think that we can see the dawn of that glad day breaking through the clouds of doubt and delay which have so long enveloped us.

NATIONAL BANKS.

The volume of business transacted by our national and private banks entitles us to a fair and equitable treatment as a business factor of the nation. We have seventeen national banks with an aggregate capital of $1,975,000; aggregate surplus and profits, $1,957,000; aggregate deposits, $9,758,000. We have fourteen private banks, having an aggregate capital and surplus of $1,650,000. Deposits with private banks, $2,500,000.

Mr. E. W. Knight, cashier of the First National Bank of Helena, Mont., to whom I am indebted for the foregoing information, in speaking of the business of the First National Bank, says:

I can not closely estimate the cash transactions for the year, but on the estimate in proportion to capital, we have one-seventh of the capital exclusive of surplus, and our cash footings on one side of cash-book for past year is $72,000,000, and seven times that equals $504,000,000, and I should think that an underestimate.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The several counties of the Territory (being sixteen) are well provided with good and substantial public buildings, consisting of court-houses, jails, school-houses, and hospitals, constructed after the modern styles of architecture. They will afford ample accommodations for many years. From official information furnished the Territorial auditor, I am advised that the cost of said buildings is $1,658,550.

LAND OFFICES.

Land offices are located at Helena, Bozeman, and Miles City, each of which is a maximum office; that is to say, their business is of sufficient volume to entitle the officers thereof to the largest compensation allowed by law. At the next session of Congress at least two new land offices will be established in Northern Montana to meet the convenience of settlers upon the vast country recently opened to settlement in that section and before referred to.

CITIES AND TOWNS.

There are three hundred and six cities and towns in Montana at which United States mails are delivered; of this number nineteen are what are denominated Presidential offices and forty-one are money-order offices. As an evidence of our rapid growth and prosperity, it is proper to remark that seven of these offices have become Presidential since January 1, 1888, and two have in operation the free-delivery system. Street and motor railroad lines are successfully operated in Butte City and Helena. Gas, electric lights, and water works are maintained in the principal cities, furnishing an adequate supply and excellent quality of each at moderate cost to the consumer. Hotels and churches of splendid proportions and magnificent designs attest the liberality and progressive spirit of our people.

MONTANA AGRICULTURAL, MINERAL, AND MECHANICAL ASSOCIATION.

This association has held nineteen annual fairs at Helena, the capital of the Territory, where our ranchmen (farmers), stockmen, and others enter into a generous rivalry in the exhibition of the products of the ranch and the range. It has grown from a small affair into one of Territorial importance, in which every citizen feels an honest pride, and attests better than empty words the permanency, prosperity, and pride of our population.

MONTANA MILITIA.

Our local Legislature in connection with the General Government has made it possible to establish and maintain a first-class military organization. The present regularly enlisted, organized, and uniformed active militia of Montana consists of seven general staff officers, and the officers and men of one regiment of eight companies of infantry, two companies of cavalry, and one battery of artillery. At the present session of Congress $33,860.76 was appropriated to properly equip the officers and men of our militia; this will be ample, in connection with the annual apportionment made by Congress, amounting to about $2,500, to put them on the very best basis. The men composing this regiment are as fine specimens of physical manhood as were ever seen, and may be expected to do the best service whenever the contingent from Montona shall be called upon.

THE YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK

is the "Wonderland" of the world. The Mammoth Hot Springs, second to no place in the United States as a health resort, and many other special objects of interest in the Park, are within the Territory of Montana. The grandeur and beauty of what is there seen, all in a state of nature, is past description. In the other wing of this Capitol hangs a painting by Moran representing the Grand Cañon of the Yellowstone. While it is of superior merit, and reaches perhaps the perfection of art, it gives but a faint conception of its hoary depths and the magnificence and opulence of its coloring. There, too, are geysers shooting immense columns of water hundreds of feet into the air; boiling springs, and beautiful lakes set like emeralds in a wilderness of colors. Thither are attracted annually thousands of visitors in increasing numbers from abroad as well as from the States of this Union. Their line of travel necessarily takes them through Montana, where our resources at once attract attention. Financial investments are left behind them. Then follow settlement and residence, the legitimate results of so inviting a field for permanent success and prosperity.

THE BAD LANDS.

Candor and fairness compel me to mention briefly this strange country. These lands are mostly in Dakota, but a very small section lies west of the eastern boundary of Montana. This is the only spot in a fair domain of 92,000,000 acres which may be said to be wholly uninviting. Happily, however, the amount covered is insignificant. Strange as it may seem, these Bad Lands, or Mauvaises Terres, as they are sometimes known, were quite appropriately named. The country has been the scene of great volcanic action at some time and presents the most unsightly appearance. It possesses no interest except to the scientific and curious. Petrifactions and fossils of great antiquity have been discovered in the Bad Lands. At present there is but slight evidence of vegetable life there.

These vagrant lines, so perfect in description, have fallen in my way. I do not know who wrote them nor of what he wrote, but every person who has passed the Bad Lands will readily recognize the picture as a counterpart of that country:

Far away a scene discloses—strangely solemn—wildly strange,
Lay aside all brilliant colors, painter, now the palette change;
Bring me umber, bring me sepias, vandyke and all tints of brown—
Whatsoe'er will best paint Nature where she wears her gloomiest frown.
Like a ruined world it seemeth, burnt, upturned and scarred by fire;
Vestige of Almighty vengeance, record of Almighty ire!
Mountains in amorphous masses—sea beds of some earlier sea:
Land whereon no flower bloometh—never grows umbrageous tree;
Dreary hills and drearier valleys—howling waste of sage-clad sand,
Chaos of God's first creation—picture, too, of silver land!

And now, Mr. Speaker, having furnished the House a knowledge of our resources in detail, I ask your indulgence for a moment until I present a comparative view somewhat in the language of the last official report made to the Secretary of the Interior.

The annual output of our mines ten years ago was estimated at $7,000,000; now it is over $40,500,000.

The total value of taxable property then was $12,000,000; now it is $70,000,000 (not estimating the value of mines nor the 17,838,000 acres of Northern Pacific Railroad land grant).

The number of cattle in the Territory then was 220,000; now it is over 1,500,000.

The number of sheep then was 120,000, now it is over 2,500,000.

The number of horses then was 40,000, now it is over 200,000.

The number of acres of land then under cultivation was 265,000, now there are over 3,000,000 acres appropriated and settled upon for agricultural purposes.

Then the commerce of the whole Territory was $20,000,000, now it is $50,000,000.

Then there were no railroads, now there are about 2,000 miles constructed and operated.

Then the population was about 20,000, now it is over 175,000.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no doubt from investigations I have made that the present population of Montana is over 200,000.

Mr. TOOLE. Then the Territory was in debt $112,000, now it is out of debt and has plenty of money in the treasury.

Then taxes were high, now they are low; then we lived in cabins, now piles of brick and mortar make our homes; then twenty or thirty school-houses were to be found, now hundreds of them fit our children for the battle of life; then only a few scattering churches decked the land, now hundreds of temples point their spires to heaven; then every man was in pursuit of fortune, now every man is in pursuit of political liberty. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I want to go on record as a warm advocate of the section of this bill which provides for the admission of other Territories whenever they shall have reached a population sufficient to entitle them to a Representative in Congress according to the present ratio of representation. New States add to the glory and dignity of the Republic; their admission ought to be provided for here and now; nothing ought longer to be left to implication; no condition of things ought to be permitted whereby this inestimable right shall be made to yield to policy or expediency in the future; the rights involved are too sacred to be made subservient to the will and pleasure of the petulant and prurient partisan. I have no fear of the character of their citizenship; they are faithful and prompt in the discharge of every public duty. No jurisdiction covering the same extent of country and embracing the same number of people can boast of less crime and vice among the citizens. I speak with some means of information and with some feeling upon this question. More than half of my life has been spent among the kind of men who people these Territories. I know their stern integrity and rugged honesty, their capacity for local self-government, and their deep devotion to the principles of our institutions.

In this connection there come crowding into my memory these oft-repeated and much-appreciated lines:

What constitutes a State?
Not high-raised battlements or labored mound,
Thick wall or moated gate,
Not cities proud, with spires and turrets crowned,
Not bays and broad-armed ports,
Where laughing at the storm rich navies ride;
Not starred and spangled courts,
Where low-browed baseness wafts perfume to pride;
No! Men, high-minded men,
With powers as far above dull brutes endued,
In forest, brake or glen,
As beasts excel cold rocks and brambles rude;
Men who their duties know,
But know their rights; and knowing dare maintain,
* * * * * * *
These constitute a State.

Upon this important question I beg of you to make no mistake. Do not dam up the river of progress. Do not obstruct the march of American manhood towards the destiny contemplated by the Constitution. Popular development and popular government have made us powerful and great among the nations of the earth, but we have not yet reached the zenith of our power and greatness. Let us remember that delays are dangerous; that now is the time and here the place to provide the way by which eight new stars may be added to the flag, and two million of our countrymen in the Territories shall be enfranchised; and then rest assured that the wisdom and patriotism of our course will be vindicated by the deliberate judgment of mankind. [Long-continued applause.]

Mr. JOSEPH obtained the floor.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. As this is a question of very considerable importance, and as the House is now very thin, I think we had better adjourn and let the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. JOSEPH] speak to a full House to-morrow. It is a question in which of course he feels a very great interest.

Mr. JOSEPH. I will yield for a motion to adjourn, retaining, of course, my right to the floor.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I move, then, that the House adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. Before that motion is put I desire to state that this subject will be called up immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow, and that we hope to bring it to a final vote early in the day.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was received, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had on the 14th instant approved and signed the bill (H. LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

Mr. BUTTERWORTH, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for four days, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Connecticut, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw, without leaving copies, papers presented in connection with House bill 7256, there having been no adverse report.

The motion of Mr. BAKER, of New York, was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 16, 1889.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CONDITION OF AFFAIRS IN SAMOAN ISLANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress:

On the 2d day of April, 1888, I transmitted to the House of Representatives, in response to a resolution passed by that body, a report from the Secretary of State relating to the condition of affairs in the Samoan Islands, together with numerous letters, dispatches, and documents connected with the subject, which gave a history of all disorders in that locality up to that date.

On the 21st day of December, 1888, this information was supplemented by the transmission to the Congress of such further correspondence and documents as extended this history to that time.

I now submit a report from the Secretary of State, with later correspondence and dispatches, exhibiting the progress of the disturbances in Samoa up to the present date.

The information thus laid before the Congress is of much importance, since it has relation to the preservation of American interests and the protection of American citizens and their property in a distant locality and under an unstable and unsatisfactory government.

In the midst of the disturbances which have arisen at Samoa, such powers have been exercised as seemed to be within executive control under our Constitution and laws, and which appear to accord with our national policy and traditions, to restore tranquillity and secure the safety of our citizens.

Through negotiation and agreement with Great Britain and Germany, which, with our own Government, constitute the treaty powers interested in Samoan peace and quiet, the attempt has been made to define more clearly the part which these powers should assume in the government of that country, while at the same time its autonomy has been insisted upon.

These negotiations were at one time interrupted by such action on the part of the German Government as appeared to be inconsistent with their further continuance.

Germany, however, still asserts, as from the first she has done, that she has no desire or intention to overturn the native Samoan Government or to ignore our treaty rights, and she still invites our Government to join her in restoring peace and quiet. But thus far her propositions on this subject seem to lead to such a preponderance of German power in Samoa as was never contemplated by us, and is inconsistent with every prior agreement or understanding, while her recent conduct as between native warring factions gives rise to the suspicion that she is not content with a neutral position.

Acting within the restraints which our Constitution and laws have placed upon executive power, I have insisted that the autonomy and independence of Samoa should be scrupulously preserved according to the treaties made with Samoa by the powers named and their agreements and understanding with each other. I have protested against every act apparently tending in an opposite direction, and during the existence of internal disturbance one or more vessels of war have been kept in Samoan waters to protect American citizens and property.

These things will abundantly appear from the correspondence and papers which have been submitted to the Congress.

A recent collision between the forces from a German man-of-war stationed in Samoan waters and a body of natives rendered the situation so delicate and critical that the war-ship Trenton, under the immediate command of Admiral Kimberly, was ordered to join the Nipsic already at Samoa, for the better protection of the persons and property of our citizens and in furtherance of efforts to restore order and safety.

The attention of the Congress is especially called to the instructions given to Admiral Kimberly, dated on the 11th instant, and the letter of the Secretary of State to the German minister, dated the 12th instant, which will be found among the papers herewith submitted.

By means of the papers and documents heretofore submitted and those which accompany this communication, the precise situation of affairs in Samoa is laid before the Congress, and such executive action as has been taken is fully exhibited.

The views of the Executive in respect of the just policy to be pursued with regard to this group of islands which lie in the direct highway of a growing and important commerce between Australia and the United States, have found expression in the correspondence and documents which have thus been fully communicated to the Congress; and the subject in its present stage is submitted to the wider discretion conferred by the Constitution upon the legislative branch of the Government.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 15, 1889.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith, in response to the resolution of the Senate of the 4th instant, a report of the Secretary of State, with accompanying copies of correspondence touching recent occurrences in the island of Hayti, both as relates to the state of the government there and to the seizure and delivery up of the American vessel Haytien Republic.

Stevens and others, a committee of the statehood convention held at Jamestown, in North Dakota, on the 5th of December last, praying for a division of the Territory of Dakota and the passage of an act which shall permit the admission of North Dakota as a State as speedily as possible. As the petition contains very valuable statistics bearing upon the question of the propriety of admitting that portion of the Territory of Dakota as a State, I ask that it be printed as a public document. It will be valuable for reference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. I present a similar petition, which is said to contain 497 individual signatures and representative indorsements of churches and other bodies in the State of Connecticut. On an examination of the names I find that some mistake has been made, and that they are the names of citizens of South Carolina; but I trust the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] will have no objection to my presenting the petition.

Mr. BUTLER. None in the world, Mr. President. I am very glad to see it come from that source.

They represent that they presented themselves at that voting precinct on the last election day in order to vote for Presidential electors and member of Congress, and that they were denied the right to vote. They therefore pray Congress to investigate the facts which they state and the practical working of the registration and election laws of South Carolina, and to devise some means to secure to them the free exercise of the rights guarantied to them by the constitution of South Carolina and the laws and Constitution of the United States. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I take it for granted it is the same as the other Senators here have presented because of the red covering; and I present it recognizing the right of petition; but in presenting it I want to state, what other Senators have not done, my unqualified opposition to any such legislation. I should like for the ladies who send these petitions here to understand that the first thing they would have to do in the way of legislation would be to change market day. For instance, if we sell our cattle in Washington, in order to give them beef on Tuesday we must transport it on Sunday. I should like to know how the Senators from the West would represent their constituents if they were to stop the cattle trains over Sunday at Cumberland, at Wheeling, or somewhere else en route. I ask that the petition may be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present a similar petition of 355 citizens of Oregon. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR presented a petition of citizens of Boston, Mass., praying for the passage of what is known as the Sunday-rest bill; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BLAIR. I present petitions of several bodies, praying for the passage of a Sunday-rest law. Of the petitions the following analysis is submitted by those who desire their presentation:

Petitions from national bodies.

CONTENTS.

1. Individual signatures	407
2. Representative signatures by indorsements of bodies and meetings	14,174,337

Analysis of the latter:

First indorsement is that of the American Sabbath Union, which was officially constituted by official action of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the Home Missionary Society of the Baptist Church, the General Assemblies of the Presbyterian Church (North and South), and the Synod of the Reformed Church, five denominations whose membership together is 5,977,693. Of the membership of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the indorsement of whose international convention stands second, at least 20,000 citizens of the United States. Of the Knights of Labor, the indorsement of whose international convention stands third, at least 219,000 citizens of the United States. The Presbyterian General Assembly, North, whose action stands next, had at the time of the indorsement 722,071 members. The convention of Christian Workers, whose indorsement is next, had 450 present when the unanimous vote of indorsement was taken. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union, which comes next, had 185,521 at the time of the vote. The Roman Catholics, for whom Cardinal Gibbons speaks, number 7,200,000.

Deducting for those who are twice or thrice represented, these petitions represent thirteen and a half million petitioners.

At a low estimate there are on the other petitions presented, besides a multitude who are twice or thrice represented, at least enough to make the total on the 13th of December, 1888, a full fourteen millions.

What I present is the petition of the National Sabbath Union of the United States by Elliott F. Shepard, president, and J. H. Knowles, secretary. Their prayer is very brief:

The undersigned, adult residents of the United States, twenty-one years of age or more, hereby earnestly petition your honorable body to pass a bill forbidding, in the nation's mail and military service, and in interstate commerce, and in the District of Columbia and the Territories, all Sunday traffic and work, except works of religion and works of real necessity and mercy, and such private work by those who observe another day as will neither interfere with the general rest nor with public worship.

The next is the petition in like words of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, and so throughout, in accordance with the analysis which I first read. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

I present a like petition of 43 citizens of Washington Territory, collected by the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and also the petition of 190 citizens or residents of the District of Columbia, collected by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, for both of which I ask a like reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petitions will be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

OVERLAND-MAIL GUARD.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back the letter of the Secretary of War transmitting certain information in regard to the raising of volunteer troops to guard the overland mails from 1861 to 1866, with a recommendation that the Senate order the usual number of the document to be printed. I ask that such action be now taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is so ordered, if there be no objection.

REPORT OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back favorably a concurrent resolution with certain amendments that I will call the attention of the clerks to. I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. CULLOM January 10, 1889, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring herein), That there be printed 5,000 additional copies of the second annual report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, with the appendices thereto: 2,000 of said copies to be for the use of the Senate and 3,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MANDERSON. I move to amend the resolution in line 4 by striking out "5,000" and inserting "6,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. I move to amend in the last line but one by striking out "3,000," before the words "for the use of the House of Representatives," and inserting "4,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

STATE NATIONAL BANK OF LOUISIANA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business?

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 9051.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, that order is closed, and the Calendar under Rule VIII being in order, the Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to correct an error of my own which was made yesterday? In calling up the bill to relieve the State National Bank of Louisiana by referring the claim to the Court of Claims the wrong bill was passed. It was a Senate bill reported from the Committee on Claims; but since their report the House of Representatives has passed exactly the same bill. I want to move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate bill was passed yesterday in order to move the House bill as a substitute, so that when the Senate passes that bill it will be through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator state whether the House bill is on the Calendar?

Mr. VOORHEES. It is not on the Calendar. It is the same bill, however. I have conferred with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], the member of the Committee on Claims who reported the Senate bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the parliamentary stage of the bill?

Mr. VOORHEES. It is just a House bill sent over here and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the proper motion would be to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. It is House bill 3715.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 3715.

Mr. SPOONER. Do I understand the Senator from Indiana to say that the bill is still in the hands of the Committee on Claims?

Mr. HOAR. The bill has been favorably reported by the committee, if the Senator will pardon me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A Senate bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. And this is exactly the same bill passed by the House since the committee reported the Senate bill. It is the same bill exactly.

Mr. HOAR. The bill came over here. I do not know where it is on the files, but I have seen the printed bill with the evidence that it was passed by the House and sent here to the Senate. It came over here within the last three or four days of the last session. We had reported from the Committee on Claims a bill. The House bill is identical with one exception; and that is, the Senate bill provides that the Court of Claims shall consider all the evidence which either the claimant or the United States used at the former hearing. The House bill does not insert the words "United States," which of course should be inserted, but I understand, on inquiry of the gentleman who reported the bill in the House, and he has investigated it, that there was no evidence used by the United States at the hearing before except certain public documents, which the Court of Claims always admits. Therefore it does not seem necessary, although strictly that should be done, to send the bill back to the House with an amendment. That is the history of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proper motion would be to discharge the Committee on Claims from the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. I make that motion. I move that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3715) for the relief of the State National Bank of New Orleans, formerly the Louisiana State Bank, which is exactly the bill that has been reported, I assure the Senator from Wisconsin. My object is to get it through at this session, and I do not believe I can do so unless I can have this done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Committee on Claims is discharged from the further consideration of the bill. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, if there be no objection, and will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. There is one feature of that bill which seems to me to be objectionable. It is mandatory upon the court that it shall receive in evidence all letters and papers that may have been filed in the Department, no matter whether at law the evidence would be competent or not.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that the language is just the same on that point as in the bill reported from the Committee on Claims. I assure the Senator from Wisconsin there is no harm in this measure. The only object is to get it through so as to have it become a law at this session.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to inquire if he knows the amount of money that is involved in this investigation.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not know how much. It is a bill which has passed the Senate three times. It was reported by Senator Howell Jackson and by others, the most careful men here. It has been three times reported in this body. It has been three times passed. The trouble was always to get action in the other House. Now the House has given us a bill which is the same bill exactly that has been here all the time, and my object in getting it up is, when I get it through, that that will be the end of it; and I implore the Senator from Wisconsin to join me in this laudable enterprise.

Mr. CULLOM. It seems to me we might as well allow the claim here if we require the court simply to take the testimony on file.

Mr. VOORHEES. Oh, no; the case is to be determined by the Court of Claims. It has been one of the most thoroughly prepared bills that have been here.

Mr. CULLOM. I will inquire further if there is any printed report showing the facts in connection with it?

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana a question—whether the legal effect of the bill is only to remove the bar of the statute of limitations?

Mr. VOORHEES. That is all, and then to try the case on the proofs that are in the Treasury Department, and such others as the Court of Claims may have taken.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask, if the Senator will allow me, whether the Committee on Claims of this body has approved the removal of that statutory bar?

Mr. VOORHEES. Here is the bill they reported, which was passed yesterday by mistake. It was unanimously reported from the Committee on Claims, and it contains the same provisions exactly.

Mr. CHANDLER. It does remove the bar of the statute of limitations?

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly. That has been done over and over again.

Mr. PLATT. My trouble about the bill is that it seems to me that the clause which provides that the papers on file in the Treasury Department shall be received by the court as evidence is a little too sweeping. I wish to read that clause. It is as follows:

That the testimony and original papers filed by said bank before the Treasury Department of the United States in connection with said claim be, and the same shall be, received by said court as evidence as if taken or filed under the rules of said court.

I suppose that many of those papers must have been ex parte affidavits. I do not know how that may be, but it does not seem to me that in a bill of this sort we ought to provide that the Court of Claims shall receive as evidence ex parte affidavits the same as if they had been taken in court.

Mr. ALLISON. I appeal to the Senator from Indiana——

Mr. PLATT. I should like to look at the report in this case. I do not want to delay the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I was about to appeal to the Senator from Indiana to give Senators an opportunity to look into this.

Mr. HOAR. Before that is done I would like to say one word.

Mr. President, I have not the facts of this case in my memory at present. I reported it some months ago. It was originally examined with great care by the late Senator Jackson, of Tennessee, one of the most careful and thorough lawyers we ever had in the Senate. It was carefully examined by the Committee on Claims, and it was their unanimous report. It has been reported two or three times from that committee. It is not the removal of the bar of the statute of limitations from a claim against the Government. It is one of those cases of claims of owners of cotton seized and sold by the Government the proceeds of which were in the possession of the Government as a special fund out of which payment has been allowed, where there were some circumstances which made the removal of the bar of the statute seem proper. There is not any real statute of limitations, because I do not understand that the remedy was by appeal to the Court of Claims. Some considerable time has elapsed. They were before Congress, I believe, at a very early day for the prosecution of their claim. The facts will appear in the original report if Senators will look at it, and without being able to state what the case is now, my recollection is it is a very clear and plain case.

Mr. SPOONER. I appeal to the Senator from Indiana not to press the bill to-day, but let it go over until to-morrow, and in the mean time it can be examined into by Senators. I desire to examine it further myself. I think I concurred in the report on the merits of the claim, and do not see any objection to it now, but I do not exactly like the form of this bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. I yield to the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill be again committed to the committee or remain on the Calendar?

Mr. VOORHEES. Let it remain on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inquire whether a message shall be sent to the House of Representatives to recall the bill (S. 205) for the relief of the State National Bank of Louisiana, that was passed yesterday on the motion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], that it may be in the custody of the Senate?

Mr. COCKRELL. That ought to be done as a matter of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered if there be no objection.

THE REVENUE LAWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order will be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. VEST, in line 2206, paragraph 670 of the free-list, to strike out "Ottar of roses" and insert "Salt;" so as to read:

670. Salt.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope we shall have a vote on that important amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FARWELL (when his name was called). I desire to announce that I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO].

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). My pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is transferred to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES]. I vote "nay."

Mr. HOAR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM].

Mr. MORRILL (when his name was called). My pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] having been transferred to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN], I vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. If he were in his seat, I should vote "yea."

Mr. ALLISON. I will allow my vote to stand, and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] agreeing, I will transfer the pair of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], and allow the Senator from Kentucky to vote.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I vote, Mr. President. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland. I inquire whether the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). He has not voted.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland. I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON], and therefore refrain from voting.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. We shall be compelled to be in the Committee on Appropriations the greater part of the day and are paired with each other. I should vote "yea," and he would vote "nay," if present.

Mr. MANDERSON. On this question I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GEORGE (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire is not recorded.

Mr. GEORGE. I am paired with him. I withdraw my vote. I would vote "yea" of course.

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—23.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLISON. I move, on page 116, to strike out paragraph 173 and insert in lieu of it what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 116, it is proposed to strike out paragraph 173, as follows:

173. Penknives or pocket-knives of all kinds, knife-blades, razors, and razor-blades, 50 cents per dozen blades and 25 per cent. ad valorem.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

173. Penknives or pocket-knives of all kinds, or parts thereof, wholly or partly manufactured, valued at not more than 50 cents per dozen, 12 cents per dozen; valued at more than 50 cents per dozen and not exceeding $2 per dozen, 36 cents per dozen; valued at more than $2 per dozen, 60 cents per dozen, and in addition thereto on all the above 50 per cent. ad valorem.

Razors and razor-blades, finished or unfinished, valued at not more than $4 per dozen, $1 per dozen; valued at more than $4 per dozen, $1.25 per dozen, and in addition thereto on all the above razors and razor-blades 30 per cent. ad valorem.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. VEST. Does the Senator want to take that vote now?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. VEST. That is a very material change in that schedule, and I would like to examine it. We have had no notice of it, and it is brought in here now without any chance for us to examine it at all. I will ask that it lie over and be printed so that we can look into it by morning.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator want to take it up later in the day?

Mr. VEST. I want a chance to examine it. We have a day fixed for the vote, and it makes no difference.

Mr. ALLISON. I will allow it to pass over to give the Senator an opportunity. I may want to call it up later in the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri ask that the amendment be printed?

Mr. VEST. I should rather the Senator would say that we are to take it up in the morning. It makes no difference about the final result, because we have agreed on the day to take the vote, and it is simply a question of courtesy and convenience to us. It is impossible for us to examine it during the day whilst we are engaged in a running debate on the items.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I should like the Senator from Iowa to yield to me to offer an amendment to the free-list, to remain pending until the matter shall be reached in the body of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests that the matter now pending before the Senate be disposed of first.

Mr. ALLISON. I will allow this amendment to be passed over until to-morrow morning with the understanding that it is to be considered then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri desire that the amendment be printed?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to offer one amendment, if the Senator from Arkansas will allow me. On page 115, line 730, I move to strike out "20" and insert "15."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 115, paragraph 172, line 730, it is proposed to strike out "20" and insert "15;" so as to read:

172. Table knives, forks, steels, and all carving, butchers', cooks', hunting, kitchen, bread, butter, vegetable, fruit, cheese, plumbers', painters', palette, and artists' knives of all sizes, finished or unfinished, valued at not more than $1 per dozen pieces, 15 cents per dozen.

Mr. VEST. What line is that?

Mr. ALLISON. Line 730.

Mr. VANCE. I think that ought to go over with the other. It relates to the same thing, cutlery.

Mr. ALLISON. That is a reduction.

Mr. VANCE. Yes, I know it is a reduction of the text of the bill, but it lacks a great deal of being a reduction upon the article itself.

Mr. ALLISON. Perhaps it does.

Mr. VANCE. I think the whole of the amendments pertaining to cutlery in this schedule should go over and be considered at the same time.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I will allow it to be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is it the desire that the amendment shall be printed?

Mr. ALLISON. That is easily understood. I do not think it is necessary to print it.

On page 112, paragraph 155, line 643, I move to strike out "six" and insert "eight," and in line 644 to strike out "eight" and insert "ten," and in line 645 to strike out "thirteen" and insert "fifteen."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that those amendments are already pending.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well, then I want to have them acted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be reported separately from the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 643, page 112, paragraph 155, before the word "cents," it is proposed to strike out "six" and insert "eight;" so as to read:

Cross-cut saws, 8 cents per linear foot.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the same paragraph, line 644, after the word "wide," it is proposed to strike out "eight" and insert "ten;" so as to read:

Mill, pit, and drag saws, not over 9 inches wide, 10 cents per linear foot.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the same paragraph, line 645, after the word "wide," it is proposed to strike out "thirteen" and insert "fifteen;" so as to read:

Over 9 inches wide, 15 cents per linear foot.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration now of paragraphs 144 and 145, which we passed over, and act on the amendments I offered yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks for the consideration of a paragraph which has been passed over—paragraph 144, on page 106. The amendment proposed by him to that paragraph will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out paragraph 144, as follows:

144. Sheets, of iron or steel, common or black, including all iron or steel commercially known as common or black taggers' iron or steel, and skelp iron or steel; valued at 3 cents per pound or less: Thinner than No. 10 and not thinner than No. 20 wire gauge, 1.1 cents per pound; thinner than No. 20 wire gauge and not thinner than No. 25 wire gauge, 1.2 cents per pound; thinner than No. 25 wire gauge and not thinner than No. 29 wire gauge, 1.4 cents per pound; thinner than No. 29 wire gauge, 1.5 cents per pound: Provided, That all common or black sheet-iron or sheet-steel not thinner than No. 10 wire gauge shall pay a duty as plate-iron or plate-steel.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

144. Sheets of iron or steel, common or black, including all iron or steel commercially known as common or black taggers' iron or steel, and skelp iron or steel; valued at 3 cents per pound or less: Thinner than No. 10 and not thinner than No. 20 wire gauge, 1 cent per pound; thinner than No. 20 wire gauge and not thinner than No. 25 wire gauge, 1.1 cents per pound; thinner than No. 25 wire gauge and not thinner than No. 29 wire gauge, 1.3 cents per pound; thinner than No. 29 wire gauge, 1.4 cents per pound; corrugated or crimped, 1.4 cents per pound: Provided, That all common or black sheet-iron or sheet-steel not thinner than No. 10 wire gauge shall pay a duty as plate-iron or plate-steel.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to modify the amendment by striking out, in lines 8, 9, and 10, "and not thinner than No. 29 wire gauge, 1.3 cents per pound," and also by striking out "and also thinner than No. 29 wire gauge," the object being a modification to make the amendment read:

Thinner than No. 25 wire gauge, 1.4 cents per pound.

Dispensing with one classification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Iowa in charge of the bill, but I do not wish to prevent the Senator from Arkansas from making the inquiry that he desires.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I had almost abandoned the idea of getting an opportunity to say anything.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Arkansas will pardon me.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I asked the permission of the Senate to offer an amendment to a paragraph in the free-list which would come up in connection with the matter he has already called up. I wanted to move in order to have pending an amendment to paragraph 772 of the free-list by adding at the end of that paragraph the words "tin-plates, terne-plates, and taggers' tin," the purpose being to put those articles on the free-list.

Mr. ALLISON. That may be regarded as pending. I do not object to that being offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa withdraw his amendment for the purpose of allowing action on the amendment the Senator from Arkansas proposes?

Mr. ALLISON. No, I do not withdraw my amendment. The Senator from Arkansas gives notice, as I understand, that he will offer that amendment, and it is directly in connection with this question, so that both amendments may be considered pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa——

Mr. ALLISON. I will state to the Senator that the amendment now proposed does not affect directly the question of tin-plates. That is in the next paragraph.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. The amendment as submitted by the Senator from Iowa has not been printed, has it?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir, it has been printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been modified since it was printed.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. The proposition is to have a vote on the first paragraph the Senator proposes to amend.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir. I think there will be no objection to these amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I offer the next amendment which I have sent up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out paragraph 145, as follows:

145. Sheets, of iron or steel, corrugated or crimped, 1.4 cents per pound: Provided, That on all iron or steel sheets or plates and on all hoop, band, or scroll iron or steel, excepting on what are known commercially as tin-plates, terne-plates, and taggers' tin, and hereafter provided for, when galvanized or coated with zinc or spelter, or other metals, or any alloy of those metals, three-fourths of 1 cent per pound additional duty shall be paid.

And insert in lieu thereof:

145. All iron and steel sheets or plates and all hoop, band, or scroll iron or steel, excepting what are known commercially as tin-plates, terne-plates and taggers' tin, and hereafter provided for, when galvanized or coated with zinc or spelter, or other metals, or any alloy of those metals, shall pay three-fourths of 1 cent per pound more duty than the corresponding gauges of common or black sheet or taggers' iron or steel; and on and after January 1, 1890, all such iron or steel sheets when coated with tin, or lead, or with a mixture of which these metals, or either of them, is a component part, by the dipping or any other process, and commercially known as tin-plates, terne-plates, and taggers' tin, shall pay three-fourths of 1 cent per pound more duty than the corresponding gauges of black sheet or taggers' iron or steel.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on this amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa what, under the modification which he offers this morning of the amendment offered a day or two ago, the tariff on the steel and iron sheets which are used in tin-plates will be? The modification he makes this morning I did not understand. He has made some changes in the proposed amendment, and I do not understand what they are.

Mr. ALLISON. It depends somewhat on the gauge. If they are thinner than No. 25 wire gauge, which I think most plates are, the duty would be 1.4 cents per pound and three-fourths of a cent added.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Three-fourths of a cent would be added on account of the tinning?

Mr. ALLISON. On account of the pickling, cleaning, etc. The process of converting black taggers' iron into tin-plates would have three-fourths of a cent addition.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I understand under the proposed amendment now the duty on iron and steel plates will be 1.4 cents a pound.

Mr. ALLISON. On common black taggers' iron or steel it would be 1.4 cents. Then on the processes—not the tinning alone, but the cleaning, pickling by acid, cold rolling, etc.—all those processes that are necessary before tin-plate can be made, we allow three-fourths of a cent a pound.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. So that the tax on tin-plates will amount to 2.15 cents.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir; on that class, thinner than No. 25 wire gauge.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I offered, a few minutes ago, an amendment to be pending to the free-list by which I propose to put this article on the free-list. I suppose if the amendment now under consideration should be adopted, the one I proposed would be rejected, and I have no doubt that will be the fate of the two amendments as offered to the Senate.

The report of the Treasury Department which we find on our desks shows that there were imported into this country in the last fiscal year, 1887, 570,643,389 pounds of tin-plates, terne-plates, and taggers' tin. Upon those a tariff of 1 cent a pound was levied, and there was collected into the Treasury upon this article $5,706,433.89. This large amount of money is collected into the Treasury of the United States where it is not needed and not wanted, and collected from the consumers of the country, who are really ill able to bear unnecessary burdens. It would seem to any reasonable man proposing to devise a way to avoid the collection of a tax not needed by the Government levying it and which can not easily or justly be paid by the people from whom it is collected, would be the simple, plain, direct way of remitting the tax, and thus get rid of it by simply not collecting it.

Unnecessary taxation is unjust taxation, and here we have the fact indisputable that the Government does not need this amount of money, and that the people ought not to pay it; and yet when I propose to the Senate that this article shall go on the free-list, that the Government shall not collect what it does not need, we have it replied to by the Committee on Finance proposing to raise this tax more than 100 per cent. That is directly in line with the suggestion made by Mr. Swank some time since, and which I presented to the Senate, that the proper way to reduce revenue is to increase taxation.

The purpose of this proposed change of the Finance Committee is to prevent the collection of this $5,000,000 into the Treasury, but it is not intended to prevent the paying of the tax by the people. Instead of levying a tax for revenue, instead of levying a tax which is to be paid by the people to the Government, the intention of the amendment of the committee is to change this tax so that it shall be a tax levied by the Government in the name of revenue for the purposes of private tribute.

I am not surprised by the action of the committee. I was surprised that the committee should bring this bill in without any proposed change in the rate on tin-plates in the first instance.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me to say just one word on that point?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. The committee stated, or at least I stated for the committee, that at a later period we should propose an amendment relative to the duty on tin-plates. When the bill was originally reported we had not sufficient information, and it is so stated in the report, upon which to base what we considered a wise provision as respects tin-plates so as not to increase the revenue and at the same time encourage the manufacture of the article in this country. That information we have been able to gather since, which enables us to bring in this proposition.

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question. He says he has additional information now upon this subject. Has he information that any tin or terne plate manufactories are in existence in this country now, or that there is any immediate prospect of any coming into existence?

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator in response to that inquiry—and it is a very pertinent and very proper one in this connection—that there are quite a number of establishments which could immediately enter upon the production of these tin-plates, or at least within a very brief period, probably within thirty days, and that we have assurances, and believe from examination and investigation that within the time fixed for the taking effect of this new bill, there will be in this country a sufficient plant to manufacture all the tin-plate that we use. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I should like, if the Senator from Missouri is through——

Mr. VEST. I am through.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if he has furnished the Senate the additional information which the committee have had since the first report was made to the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. The information is simply this: There are now imported into the United States 283,000 tons of tin-plate. That is a very large amount of tin-plate. The basis of that, of course, is sheet-iron, common black sheet-iron. It was manifest to the committee that if we increased this duty to take effect immediately, the effect would be to largely increase the revenue. Therefore the committee first contemplated a provision whereby certain gauges of tin-plate should be provided for to be manufactured in this country and certain other gauges to be imported, and I sent to the collector of the port of New York, under the direction of the committee, for information as to the various gauges of tin-plate in order that we might draw a line, if possible, at the different gauges.

The collector of the port of New York informed me that it required a considerable time to prepare that information. It was very important information to the committee. That was not received at the date of the reporting of this bill, and therefore the committee had not accurate information upon which to base an amendment covering the production of tin-plate in this country. That information came afterwards. It disclosed that a large portion of the tin-plate imported into this country is thinner than No. 29 wire gauge, that being the line we had intended to mark out.

So the committee found that it would be impossible to draw a line of demarkation between the gauges of tin-plate. Therefore, after looking into the matter further, we decided to allow the present rate of duty to stand upon tin-plate until the 1st of January, 1890, which will allow a sufficient plant to be erected in this country to produce all the tin-plate needed, but in the mean time a considerable amount of tin-plate will be produced in this country in view of the increased protection to American manufacturers.

That is the information, I will state to the Senator, and that is the reason. If we had received the information which we sought from the collector of the port of New York, who I think has been very diligent in furnishing all information, we should have produced when the bill was reported some provision on this subject.

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa how it was that the committee happened to fix the rates that are found in the pending bill and now come in with an amendment that decreases them. As I understand the amendments proposed by the committee now—I have not had time to examine them this morning—they decrease the rates in the reported bill.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. No, they do not.

Mr. VEST. They do not?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. They more than double the duty. The rates are increased over 100 per cent.

Mr. VEST. I understand they are decreased in the existing bill.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. A nominal decrease, but a real increase.

Mr. VEST. I mean the bill reported from the committee.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. They have increased. They make the rate on tin-plates three-fourths of a cent in addition to the amount levied on the iron plates.

Mr. VANCE. It is a very decided increase.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. More than 100 per cent.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Missouri has one thing in mind—I do not want to disturb the Senator from Arkansas—which, I think, I understand, and that is, he wants to know why we have reduced the duty upon common black taggers' iron and steel from the original report.

Mr. VEST. That is it.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator in response to that, that we have reduced two gauges, two grades.

Mr. VANCE. One-tenth of a cent.

Mr. ALLISON. One-tenth of a cent, and we have practically increased one gauge, and the reason of that is that the committee, on further examination, believe that the rates we have fixed now will be sufficient to protect this industry in this country.

I will say to the Senator that in making this change in paragraph 144 we had already reduced it upon iron of this class, but we had increased the duty upon steel, and it was in the readjustment of this matter that we made the changes proposed. There is nothing remarkable, I trust, in that.

Mr. VEST. I am not complaining.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly the Senator will not complain of the reduction.

Mr. VEST. In the printed testimony of the committee the witnesses who gave their testimony in regard to tin-plates said that a certain amount of duty, which I think was above even that placed in the reported bill, was absolutely necessary to bring this industry into existence in the United States, and I wanted to know what additional testimony had come in that caused these changes. I have never seen it.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator that the amendment reported by me is the proposition of the producers of these articles in this country, stating that with the duty which we now propose they will embark in and can manufacture tin-plate in this country in competition with Great Britain.

Mr. VANCE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question, and that question is this: Was not this advance upon tin-plate made at the request of manufacturers of the black sheet-iron with which the tin-plate comes directly in conflict?

Mr. ALLISON. The amendments in paragraph 144?

Mr. VANCE. Increasing the duty on tin-plates to three-fourths of a cent more per pound than the duty on black iron, which is the basis of it.

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir; I do not think it was.

Mr. VANCE. Not made at the request of the sheet-iron men, who, I understand, were in the city yesterday, and perhaps are here now?

Mr. ALLISON. I have no doubt they are here now. There is no harm in their being here, I hope.

Mr. VANCE. None in the world. I suppose it is necessary for them to be here in order to protect their interests.

Mr. ALDRICH. They made no request to the committee, to my knowledge, in regard to that.

Mr. ALLISON. I have heard of no such request. I know they rather protested against our modifications here, but we have made them, or propose to make them, if the Senate will agree.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. VANCE. I simply wanted to call attention while on my feet to the fact of the enormous increase of the duty on tin-plates by this modification of the committee. The black iron, of which the tin-plate is made, bears a duty under this bill of 1.4 cents a pound, and the tin-plate now bears a duty of 1 cent per pound. Now, the duty on tin-plate is made three-fourths of a cent per pound more than the duty which is imposed upon the black sheet-iron out of which it is made, which makes it about 2¼ cents, as I hastily cipher it.

Mr. ALLISON. Two and fifteen one-hundredths.

Mr. VANCE. Two and fifteen one-hundredths cents a pound on the tin-plates, which not only forces the sale but increases the price to those people who use the black iron and the sheet-iron, and increases very largely the cost of all the tin-ware of this country, tin roofs, and every use to which tin-plates are put. It is a most outrageous price. Considering it in this hurried way, which we have protested against again and again, it is impossible for us to arrive at the actual figures; but I venture to say this will be fully 100 per cent. duty upon tin-plates.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator from Iowa, then, seems to come to this conclusion, that his committee are unwilling to increase the tariff on tin-plates from 1 cent to 2.15 cents per pound immediately for the reason that this increase would add largely to the revenues of the Government; they regard the excess of revenue as a very great evil, but the taxation from which the revenue results does not seem to be such a terrible calamity in the opinion of the Committee on Finance, and as soon as an arrangement can be made by which the revenue resulting from this excessive taxation shall go into private pockets and shall not go into the coffers of the Government, they are perfectly satisfied to put this increased tax into operation, the evil to be avoided being not the burden of taxation, but the Government gets it while the tin-plate association wants it.

As I said a few minutes ago, to resume the course of my argument, I was surprised to have the Committee on Finance report this bill back with a proposition that tin-plates should remain at the old rate of taxation that had been imposed upon them for years. It was situated exactly in the same condition as a manufactured product in this country that cotton-ties were which we had under discussion here some time ago. There was none of either article produced in this country; the tax upon each was an absolute revenue tax, and every dollar of tax levied upon either article went into the Treasury, no private citizen being richer by the imposition of either tax.

When the committee reported the bill they proposed an increase of the tax on cotton-ties of more than 200 per cent., under the pretense, I will say the earnest pretense, of building up the manufacture of cotton-ties in this country, that they intended to give the manufacturers the benefit of producing the article in the United States, and I was surprised that while making fish of one they should make flesh of the other, and I was astonished that there was not a proposition to compel the masses of the American people to stand the increased price of tin-plates to allow the tin-plate manufacturers to sell their product at a high price so as to build up their manufacture also.

I am not surprised to find the committee now coming in with a proposed change. I was prepared for this by reading some time since from the Tariff League Bulletin as follows—I presume this is good authority even with the Committee on Finance:

THE TIN-PLATE OUTLOOK.

John Jarrett, secretary of the American Tin-Plate Association, was interviewed recently in Pittsburgh on the outlook for tin-plate through legislation at the hands of the next Congress, and his responses to questions were substantially as follows: "We want a tariff of about 2½ cents per pound. I expect nothing to be done toward the revival of the industry this winter, but as soon as there is any assurance that it will be protected, it will again be started up. The cost of the labor alone in this country would be more than the total cost of production in England.

"Last year the importation of tin-plate to this country was 318,000 tons. That is about 74 per cent. of the whole production of the world. Allowing each man the average wages, the manufacture of this amount of tin-plate would give employment to at least 70,000 men. A tariff of 2½ cents would enable us to manufacture all our own tin-plate. The industry in this country was strangled in its birth. About 1873 there were four tin-plate mills started in this country—Demmler's and Cronnemyer's at Demmler Station, Beale & Rodgers's at Leechburgh, and a co-operative firm at Wellsville. Between that date and 1878 the price of tin-plate fell from $12.50 to $5.18 per box, and the American firms were forced out of the market. I have no doubt that the tariff will be increased on the commodity. The Amalgamated Association is with us in this request. During last year our total production of iron and steel plates was 120,000 tons. In the same time we imported iron and steel plates in the form of tin-plate to the amount of 318,000 tons. An adequate tariff on tin-plate means an increased demand for iron and steel works and a larger employment to American labor."

Now, Mr. President, after the declaration on the part of this gentleman who is connected, I believe, with the American Tin-Plate Association, an association which has been organized, I think, for a long while with the expectation that at some time or other they would be given authority by Congress to levy such taxes upon the American people as would enable them to build up and establish a profitable manufacture, I was not surprised to find this committee recommending a modification of this bill which would increase the tax on this article of domestic necessity more than 100 per cent.

In truth, one of the gentlemen examined by this committee some time since, speaking of the fact that by a ruling of Mr. Fessenden in 1864, I believe, tin-plates were admitted at the old rate of taxation, and were not classified as under the sheet-iron schedule so as to have the tax increased to 2½ cents a pound, said it was "the most inexcusable and costly decision on record."

How was that decision of Mr. Fessenden costly? This man in the course of his statement says that since that time the Government has collected $78,000,000 tax on tin-plates. If the tax had been increased from 1 cent at that time to 2½ cents, the amount of tax paid upon the tin-plate which has been consumed by the American public from then to now would have amounted to $175,000,000. There has been collected into the Treasury $78,000,000, and there would have been collected, not into the Treasury but into the pockets of the favored individuals who would have had the right to levy this tax, $175,000,000 instead of $78,000,000 collected. The failure of Congress, the failure of the Secretary of the Treasury to so rule as to allow this tax to be levied by these men upon the people of the United States he considers "the most inexcusable and costly decision on record." It has cost them nearly $100,000,000 that they did not get, that they might have gotten on a different ruling on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury. And this has been constantly paraded by these people as an outrage upon them.

Mr. President, if the entire country is given over to a desire to have everybody taxed for the purpose of building up a few individuals, then this perhaps was a more correct construction of this ruling; but in my judgment the great bulk of the American people do not believe that there is any right to levy taxes upon the consumers at large for the purpose of building up private fortunes.

There were imported into this country last year, according to the reports, over 280,000,000 tons of tin-plates. The present proposed tax of $2.15 a hundred pounds would amount to nearly $50 a ton—some $47 or $48 a ton tariff. The testimony given by Mr. John Jarrett and by Mr. Williams, who appeared as experts before the committee, I believe—if not, they have been here time and again before committees of Congress, and the testimony is here and was before this committee, that the cost of the production of tin-plates in the United States would be about $40 a ton. These witnesses testify that the cost of production in England would be about $16 a ton.

Mr. ALLISON. Of what?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Tin-plates.

Mr. ALLISON. I should be glad to have the Senator turn to that testimony.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I think I shall have very little difficulty in pointing it out, and I will do so before I get through with this argument. The Senator will remind me again if I should forget it. Perhaps it will be best to present it at once, as I have found it. I read from the testimony of Mr. E. P. Williams, taken before a committee of Congress three or four years ago upon this question of tin-plates, and who, I believe, appeared before the Finance Committee at this session of Congress, if I am not mistaken. He stated, on page 108 of the hearings taken by the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives in 1884, what I shall read. His language is:

The cost of producing tin-plates would amount to a little over $40 per ton.

Mr. Jarrett at the same hearing gave the cost of producing a box of tin, the American cost at $2.14⅜, and the English cost at 80¾ cents a box, which would amount to about $40 a ton for the production of American tin-plates and about $16 for the English, and this includes not only labor, but includes all the other items of cost of production, as I understand.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator now is talking of the cost of producing tin-plate from sheet-iron or sheet-steel. His statement a moment ago was that tin-plate here could be made for $40 a ton and in England for $16. Inasmuch as the ordinary steel rails cost $19 a ton in England, I was curious to know how tin-plate could be produced so cheaply.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I was cautioned some time since by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] not to accept as absolutely correct the statements submitted by these witnesses in your hearings. I have not accepted as being absolutely true the statements made by manufacturers as to the cost in Europe, but I took their statements for what they were worth, and proposed to deduct what they stated was the English cost of producing a ton of tin-plates from the American cost, which would leave about $24 a ton difference, while you propose by your tariff to give a tax which amounts to nearly $50 a ton to compensate for the difference in cost.

Mr. ALLISON. We may as well have an understanding respecting these points, because the Senator from Arkansas has one thing in mind and those men who testified had another. They had in mind what it costs to produce a ton of tin-plate from a ton of iron or steel, and not what a ton of tin-plate would cost entirely. That is what the testimony indicates. But the Senator from Arkansas, if I understand him correctly—and if I misunderstand him I hope to be corrected—intimates that a ton of tin-plate can be produced in this country for $40, not from the sheet-iron, but from the pig-iron.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I do not remember, I will say frankly, that there was anything said as to what particular point of production the witness was proposing to assume as the starting point. He did not state, that I know of, the cost of the iron ore, nor the cost of the production of the pig-iron. He said "the cost of producing tin-plate would amount to a little over $40 per ton."

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will allow me just one word more. The statement made by the Senator was that it cost $16 a ton to make tin-plate in England.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. No, sir; I said John Jarrett stated that was the cost.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. Now, it costs $19 a ton there to make a ton of railway bars of steel. Therefore it is manifest, at least to me, that what Mr. Jarrett was talking about was the cost of putting the tin upon these thin plates of steel, and that he did not include the original cost of the thin plates of steel. So we ought to understand exactly the point before the Senator draws his conclusion.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. The witness, if I remember correctly, did not make any such statement. I have no doubt if he thought it was necessary for the interest of the Tin-Plate Association for him to have made such a statement, he would have made it if it were true. But there was no such statement so far as I know or so far as I have heard. I simply accept the words of the gentlemen that this is the cost. It may be true, as the Senator from Iowa suggests, that it was the coating with tin of these iron plates that he referred to; but I did not so understand it. In that I may be mistaken. I do not pretend to say what the truth is, but I do say what the testimony of the witnesses was, and they were interested parties, and I presume they did not intend to state the case against themselves in any event.

Mr. ALLISON. This is an important point and the Senator will allow me a word. Does the Senator believe for a moment that a ton of sheet-tin, which would be less certainly than No. 25 wire gauge, which is the finest kind of sheet iron or steel, can be made in England for $16 a ton and in this country for $40? That is the basis of his entire argument. It is perfectly clear that these gentlemen were talking about one thing and the Senator is talking about another.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. As I have no means of settling that question, I will leave it exactly where it stands. I assume that the Senator from Iowa is correct in his assumption on that question.

Mr. ALDRICH. I want to ask, if the Senator will permit me, what volume of testimony he is reading from and what page, in order that we may understand exactly what Mr. Jarrett was speaking about.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I gave the volume and page a moment ago. It was in the hearings by the Ways and Means Committee in the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress in 1884, and on page 108 of the report I read from the testimony of Mr. Williams that the cost of producing a box of tin-plates would amount to a little over $40 a ton, and on page 112 I read the statement by Mr. Jarrett. Whatever the cost may be, we have this fact staring us in the face, that this committee proposes to double the tax upon an article of prime necessity, intending by doubling that tax to divert the whole revenue from the public Treasury into private pockets.

One other feature in connection with this tin-plate taxation strikes me as being manifest, and that is the law we have on the statute-book for refunding nine-tenths of the tax levied upon foreign articles brought in, manufactured, and shipped abroad. While we are making pretenses in this Chamber and everywhere else through the country of a desire to protect our own laboring people against pauper labor abroad, we are discriminating constantly in favor of the foreign poor and against our own.

In 1884 there were refunded drawbacks upon the item of tin-plates amounting to $876,736.11; in 1885 there was refunded $1,144,134.12; in 1886, $1,228,850.96; in 1887, $1,103,832.98; making a total of $4,358,557.17 which has been refunded by the Government of the United States to the manufacturers of tin-plate in this country, because the product of tin-plate shipped from here was to be sold on foreign account and sold abroad. In other words, if the identical tin-ware which was shipped to the foreign laborers, which was sent abroad for sale, had been sold to the American public there would have been a tax paid into the Treasury of the United States of $4,358,557.17 that was remitted upon the articles sent abroad to be sold to the pauper laborers of Europe. Here is a discrimination amounting to millions of dollars against our own people and in favor of the people abroad.

Mr. President, if it is a matter of importance to remit to those who are engaged in the foreign trade nine-tenths of the tax levied upon tin-plate, I ask why it is not reasonable and fair that ten-tenths of it may be remitted to our own laborers, so that they may have one-tenth advantage over the foreign pauper labor? We certainly ought to give them a little bit of advantage over the people abroad. We are professing all the time a desire to take care of them at the expense of the people who live outside of this country. Now the proposition is made to put this article on the free-list simply to give our people the absolute remission of all that there is collected on the part of these imports that go to them, and they certainly ought to be treated as well as the people who live abroad.

I only intended, Mr. President, to call attention to these points in connection with this article. There are many other things in connection with it that would be of interest if there was time to consider them. In 1883, when this matter was under consideration by the Senate, Senator Logan, who was always strongly in sympathy with the people—the "plain people"—when the proposition was made to increase this tariff, taking strong ground in favor of no increase and of allowing the American public to have this article at a low rate of taxation, used this language:

> The manufacturers of tin cans all over the country, in every city in the United States, for putting up meat, fruit, etc., have said to the committee here—I presume they have to the committee, and probably to nearly every Senator—that they were better satisfied with the rate of duty which was imposed before, and are satisfied with the rate proposed by the committee, but they are universally opposed to increasing the duty. I have had telegrams to this effect from different parts of the country, and especially from Chicago, where they manufacture more tin cans than in any other part of the country. The idea of increasing the rate of duty for the purpose of encouraging anybody to commence a manufacture when he has not commenced it, I think, is a new idea. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], who has been recognized as the father of the tariff, also placed himself upon the record as being opposed to any increase in the duty on this article, and made a speech against it in the Senate. Under all these circumstances, with a distinct declaration on the part of the American Congress for years and years that they did not desire any increase, it seems to me that we ought not now, upon a bill in which we pretend that we are attempting to reduce taxation, to impose upon an article of prime necessity, one that finds its way into every cabin all over this country, an increased taxation of over 100 per cent.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] made a point against this bill and this feature of the bill which it occurs to me is entirely unanswerable when he showed that more than $4,000,000 of duties have been remitted upon tin-plates because of the exportation of tin-ware to foreign countries, and when he insisted also that our people should not be treated by the Congress of the United States less liberally than it is willing to treat the foreign purchasers of tin-ware. This article is of universal consumption in the United States. There is not a family in the country, I suppose, that is not more or less a consumer of tin-ware. To make a discrimination in our laws, first in favor of the manufacturer by imposing what will be a prohibitory duty upon the introduction of tin-plates after we are prepared to manufacture it, and then to remit 90 per cent. of the taxes paid upon the tin which was brought in here to make this article when it is exported to foreign countries, it seems to me is a gratuitous wrong to the people of this country.

This tax brings up in review almost every objectionable feature in this tariff measure. First of all, there were imported, according to the statement read by the Senator from Arkansas, 570,643,389 pounds of tin-plate, upon which a duty was collected of $5,706,433.89, and this bill, as I understand it, proposes to raise that duty 100 per cent.

It will not be denied, I suppose, by the gentlemen who are promoting this bill that the object of it is to create a prohibitory duty upon the importation of tin by the time we get prepared by our manufacturers to make it. The Senator from Iowa says that is not the object. I will ask the Senator from Iowa if he expects any revenue to come in upon the tin-ware after 1890, if by that time we are prepared to manufacture all that the people of the United States consume?

Mr. ALLISON. That will depend very largely upon the profits that the English manufacturers exact. They now, it is said, have a profit of about a dollar or a dollar and a half a box. If they will be content to take a small percentage upon the cost of production there, I have no doubt they will continue to compete, but they can now make very large profits, having absolute control of the tin production of the world.

Mr. MORGAN. Who has the absolute control?

Mr. ALLISON. These producers in Wales.

Mr. MORGAN. In what way?

Mr. ALLISON. In other words, they manufacture nearly all the tin produced. Germany is beginning to manufacture, and if we begin the result will be to reduce the price of tin, and of course the English manufacturer will be compelled, if he sells in this country, to sell at a less profit than he does now.

Mr. MORGAN. We have none in this country likely to be developed.

Mr. TELLER. There is no question about there being tin in this country, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. There has been a question about it for two hundred years, and that question has not been answered yet.

Mr. TELLER. I would like to say to the Senator that the only difficulty in the tin industry is that we have a peculiar class of tin, that is, it is in rock where it is difficult to save, and the Cornwall method has not saved it. Vast quantities of tin are found in this country in the Deadwood region.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose the Senator from Alabama will not claim that the American manufacturers will be at any disadvantage so far as block-tin is concerned. They will not be at a disadvantage. We could obtain the block-tin from the same source that the Wales manufacturer obtains it, and as cheaply, so that there would be no question to American producers on account of want of supply of tin.

Mr. MORGAN. There might not be any disadvantage on that account, but my proposition is this——

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I wish to make one suggestion in connection with the suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa just one moment ago, if the Senator from Alabama will allow me. The Senator from Iowa states that the English manufacturers make a profit of one dollar or one dollar and a half on tin-plates. One dollar and a half would be $30 a ton. There were imported in 1887, according to the statement of W. Swank, 283,836 tons of tin from Great Britain at a cost of $18,699,145, which is less than $65 a ton. Now, I want to ask the Senator if he believes that all these sheet-iron plates can be manufactured and tinned here when all that is done by the English at a cost of $30 a ton or a fraction over?

Mr. ALLISON. The testimony before the committee, as I remember it, was that it cost about $3.37 to manufacture a box of tin in England, and that the same thing will cost here seventy-six one-hundredths of a cent more; but the price of tin is $5.25 per box, paying $1, in round numbers, in duty. That is the statement as to profits. It costs $3.37 there; it costs three-fourths of a cent more here, and the difference is profit, and it is a very large profit to the manufacturer or the importer; and the facts are well known to everybody who has examined the question.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. What I wanted to call the attention of the Senator to was his statement just now, his apparent astonishment that I should think that tin-plates could not be manufactured in this country for something over $40 a ton, when he states that the English make a profit of $30 a ton when they sell the article here at the cost added to the duty with $30 a ton profit, out of a price of $65 a ton or less.

Mr. ALLISON. The cost of making tin in Wales is $3.37 a box. So I was not wrong when I said the Senator was entirely mistaken as to the cost of tin. It costs three-quarters of a cent a pound more in this country from the sheet. So when they sell and box the tin at $5.25 a box that cost $3.37 there is a profit when it comes into this country. It pays a cent a pound duty, which must be deducted from the profit, but that still leaves a large profit to the manufacturer or importer.

Mr. MORGAN. I am very glad to have brought out these facts and have them placed in the RECORD for the observation and instruction of the people on this question. The point I make on this item of the bill now proposed is that it raises the tax upon imported tin-ware 100 per cent., not for the purpose of increasing the revenue, but rather for the purpose, as I understand, of decreasing the revenue.

Mr. ALLISON. This proposed amendment stands on all fours with the entire bill in the contemplation or understanding of the committee, namely, that we are to receive revenue, but at the same time we are to give our own laborers and producers an opportunity of competing at least with laborers and producers in other countries. We want by this bill to place the people who work in this country at least on a par with the people who work in other countries, and that is all that is contemplated in this tin-plate amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I am very glad to hear the Senator from Iowa say that this item of the bill characterizes the whole measure, contains the principle of the whole measure, and that principle is not to increase the revenues of the Government of the United States, but to increase the profits of manufacturers.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator understood me to make that statement, I want to disabuse him of it. I stated nothing about the manufacturers. I stated that the object and purpose of the bill is to enable laborers in this country who produce things, to produce them upon an equality with laborers in other countries who produce the same things; neither to enhance the profits of manufacturers here nor in other countries.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator undertakes to separate between the laborers and manufacturers and bestows his affectionate regard upon the laborers without any concern at all for the manufacturers, at the same time knowing that any measure of this kind must produce $90 of profit to the manufacturers where it increases $10 the price of wages of labor in this country. But the purpose of this bill, as has been avowed this morning, is precisely what I conceived it to be. It is a bill for the purpose, as it is termed, of protecting American industry so as to build up and make more profitable what we call the home market, whether the profits inure to the manufacturer or laborer or to the consumer or to the agriculturist. That is the object of it, as I understand, to build up what is termed the home market and in that home market to get better prices for the contributory industries that go to support the operatives in these different lines of employment, so that we have now a pretty decided issue formed. We have now brought to the front the principles upon which this bill is founded, and it is those principles that I desire to discuss.

Next in its effect upon the people to the power over human life by condemning men to death, or forcing them into warring armies, is the power of taxation.

It must of necessity be a discretionary power as to the persons or property to be taxed, and as to the rate of taxation and the amount to be raised, unless some restraint is imposed upon the taxing power. If there is no such restraint in our Constitution, we are exposed to a dangerous power.

No people can be in a more unhappy condition than those who are exposed to arbitrary taxation at the will of their government. The first and simplest test of the real liberties of any people is found in the restraints which their power imposes upon those who levy taxes upon them. If that power is unlimited, or unrestrained, the people can not be placed in an attitude that is more helpless or more dependent on the will of their rulers, even under the most autocratic or despotic form of government.

The unlimited power to tax is the power to confiscate, and the confiscation by that means is not for the crimes of the people, but because they have acquired the means to pay taxes by their industry and frugality. It is not for their sins, but for their virtues, that they are condemned to this species of confiscation. Those who enforce such confiscations, or insist upon their right to do so, are self-seekers who employ the power to tax for their personal aggrandizement. They are arbitrary, despotic, and unrelenting, admitting no limits to their power but their autocratic will.

In every country except the United States, and with every political party except that which framed this bill and sustains it in the Senate as a party measure by a solid and unvarying vote, the basis of taxation and its only purpose is to raise revenue for the support of government.

There are very few, if any, of the civilized nations in which a tax levied for any other purpose would be tolerated by the people, even though a third of them were organized into armies to support the demands of the government.

However broad or extravagant the demands of their governments may be, and however they may cruelly burden the people, it is still accorded to them, even by the most despotic rulers, that the people shall not be taxed except for proper governmental purposes.

This era of civilization would put a government pretending to be civilized in coventry, under the ban of universal censure, whose rulers taxed the people except for the support of the ruling power, or that taxed one class of its people for the avowed purpose of enriching another class. Our plan of government, above all others, was formed with a view to prevent and prohibit taxation for such purposes. The fathers of our system had before them the experience of many generations for their guidance, and they took especial care to keep the taxing power under the immediate control of the people—the tax-payers—and their representatives, chosen directly by them.

It was for this reason that they ordained that a tax bill should only originate in the House of Representatives, and that no tax bill should originate in the Senate.

The language is as follows:

> All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendment as on other bills.

The grant of power made to Congress on the subject of taxation is in these words:

> Congress shall have power to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Then follows a distinct power "to borrow money on the credit of the United States." Taxes are not required to be uniform throughout the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises are required to be uniform.

The uniformity thus required as to duties, imposts, and excises indicates that they shall not be unjust or discriminative as between the people of the United States.

Sections, localities, Territories, and States are also included in this rule of uniformity, which equally forbids such discriminations in practice, as it does in theory. The true meaning of the Constitution in this case, as in all other cases, is to secure to the people equality in bearing the burdens of taxation, when those taxes are upon their business pursuits, the privileges accorded to them by law, and the satisfying of their tastes and necessities in the use and consumption of whatever is suited to those purposes.

Taxes assessed upon the property of the people are naturally regulated by the value of the property, but, by express injunction of the Constitution, capitation and direct taxes must be apportioned according to the census.

Uniformity of taxation means more than the appearance of uniformity on the face of the law. It means uniformity in the sense of distributing and equalizing in a spirit of justice and equity the burdens of taxation, for that is the sacred duty of the law-makers as well as the sacred right of the people.

A tax of $1 per ton on the rock phosphates found in South Carolina would raise the price to the farmers whose land require such fertilizers $1 per ton, and would not increase the profits of the owners of the quarries because the tax would go into the Treasury. A duty of $1 per ton on imported phosphates for fertilizers would increase the profits of the owners of the South Carolina beds by that sum, because it would shut out importation and give them the monopoly of the market.

The burden on the farmer would be the same whether he paid the tax of $1 per ton to the Government for revenue or to the South Carolina owner of the quarries for profit. In respect of the sum of money it would cost him there would be uniformity, but it would not be uniformity of taxation.

It is the duty of the people to submit to taxation for revenue, but they are protected by the Constitution against all forms of taxation on imports that prohibit revenue and are designed and intended to make money for any class of business pursuits. The protection against taxation for any other purpose than to provide revenues for the support of the Government of the United States is clear from the language in which the power is given to Congress to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. It is equally clear that the power granted to Congress in the phrase "Congress shall have power," is not a power inherent in Congress, arising from its power to enact laws, but it is a delegated power, and therefore a limited power.

But the limitation upon the power of taxation—that it is for the purpose of raising revenue, and for no other purpose—is made perfectly clear when the distribution of the powers of raising revenue between the House of Representatives and the Senate is brought into view.

The exclusive power of originating laws for taxing the people, either by direct taxation, or taxation in any form, or by duties, imposts, or excises, is given to the House of Representatives. No such power is given to the Senate. This is the segregation of one of the powers of Congress from all the others, and its bestowal upon one of the Houses of Congress.

The power thus given to the House of Representatives to originate tax bills is expressly limited to "raising revenue."

If the object of a bill is to "raise revenue," it is a tax bill, and can not be valid as a law if it originates in the Senate, and the only tax bill that is required to originate in the House of Representatives is a bill "for raising revenue."

It is impossible, in view of these provisions in the Constitution, that Congress can use the taxing power except "for the raising of revenue." No tax bill can be originated except "for the raising of revenue," since no bill to tax the people can originate in the Senate, and in the House of Representatives no tax bill can orginate except "for the raising of revenue."

Our fathers thought that they had effectually prevented the possibility that a crop of evil weeds should spring from the power granted to Congress to tax the people when they provided that the only tax bills that could be originated should be "bills for the raising of revenue," and that these bills should be framed and pruned and perfected under the eyes and through the careful watching of the immediate representatives of the people before the Senate could have the privilege to propose or concur in amendments to tax bills.

Our fathers expected that these injunctions would be obeyed by us when they provided that we should be sworn to obedience, and that we would do, as they required of us, all that we could with the greatest care to winnow out every evil seed of injustice, partiality, discrimination, cupidity, monopoly, and partisan bribery from all bills to tax the people, so that these evils should not originate in the House of Representatives nor be proposed nor concurred in by the Senate, but that such bills in both Houses should be confined in their purpose, "to the raising of revenue."

This is what I understand to be the Democratic reading of the Constitution on the subject of the power and duty of Congress and of the House of Representatives, respectively, in the taxation of the people.

The apothegm "a tariff for revenue only" is a less distinct and expressive way of stating that the power of Congress is limited to originating, amending, and enacting laws of taxation "for raising revenue."

The Democratic doctrine is stated correctly in the language of the Constitution, which, after all, is the only definite and express limitation of the power of taxation, the purpose and the method of taxation. "Taxes, duties, imposts, and excises" limit the methods of taxation, just as "raising revenue" limits and confines the power of Congress to the purpose and object of taxation.

The raising of revenue could not be done by a lottery system, as was once practiced in Mexico, nor by forced loans, nor by military assessment collected at the point of a bayonet under our Constitution, nor could revenue be raised by taxes, duties, excises, or imposts for the support of the churches.

No law could be enacted for "frying the fat out of the manufacturers" (to use the phrase so common in political parlance) for the purpose of supplying revenue to a political party any more than a law can be enacted by Congress, under the pretext of raising revenue for the support of the Government, by "frying the fat" out of the people for the purpose of building up or enriching the manufacturers.

The Constitution prescribes the purpose of taxation, and limits it expressly to raising revenue, and the method of taxation is confined to the levy and collection of taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. When these limits are transcended the Constitution is violated.

The power of taxation is so essential to government that it is not placed under the judgment and control of the judicial department, as are the preservation of the lives and liberties and rights of property of the people. It is, in the legal and governmental sense, more nearly supreme, in respect of its discretionary exercise within prescribed limits, than any other power of Congress.

The people could only save themselves against the abuse of the discretionary features of this vast power by choosing their representatives for the short period of a single Congress—not more than two years—and thus keeping them under their watchful espionage; then by swearing them to support the Constitution; then by giving them the exclusive power, and with it the undivided responsibility of "originating bills for raising revenue;" then by shutting off the Senate from the exercise of this power to determine whether present taxation or new taxation, additional taxation or reduced taxation shall be employed for raising revenue; and then by the express restriction on the powers of Congress that all taxation shall be confined to the purpose and limited to the duty of "raising revenue" for the support of the Government.

This was all that a self-governing people could do to restrain their agents from tyrannical abuse of a power that, of necessity, must include a wide discretion. The fact that the people could not in their Constitution fix absolutely the amount, subjects, and items of taxation, but were compelled to intrust so much of their vital interests to the discretion of their representatives, causes me to respect the plain limitations upon the power of Congress in levying and collecting taxes with the most cautious scrutiny. It is a duty of morality, honor, and sacred obligation that Congress should deny to itself a doubtful power, and should exercise its clear powers in that spirit of justice, equity, and equality of rights which pervades the entire Constitution, and especially the taxing power, which, like the air, should be equal in supply, equal in pressure, and equal in benefits to every interest and every human being in our country. An abuse of the taxing power, either as to the method or purpose of taxation, is a tyranny that is all the more dangerous and disgraceful because it eludes an honorable trust reposed in Congress by the people, and because it appeals for its support to the personal and pecuniary interests of powerful men and dense populations, while it loads with burdens of injustice the poor and the thin populations scattered over wide areas of our country.

I consider it an abuse of the taxing power to levy a tax, duty, impost, or excise for any other purpose than for "raising revenue."

A tax levied for the purpose of prohibiting revenue is so gross a perversion of the constitutional power of Congress that its advocates have no right to expect that it will be treated otherwise than with contemptuous indignation by the people.

If there are articles that we believe should not be permitted to enter into commerce, such as immoral books and prints, poisons and explosives, and articles that are infected with and may become the vehicles of disease, it is only necessary to resort to the municipal power that belongs to every nation to prohibit their introduction into our country. The taxing power has no relation to the prohibition of imports for any cause; it has relation only to "raising revenue." A law that prohibits importation can not be a law for raising revenue, and a duty that prohibits importation and revenue can not be sustained as a proper exercise of the power of taxation. The judiciary can not ascertain the purpose of a tax law where it is not avowed in the terms of the act.

Its purposes may be to prohibit revenue instead of raising revenue, or to give to a certain industry the revenue that ought to go into the Treasury, or to destroy one industry in order to free another from competition; to load the elementary industries, such as the fisheries, the mines, the farms, and the forests, with heavy burdens of tribute to the industries that work men and machines in their speculative ventures; but if these purposes are concealed they find shelter behind a veil of discretionary power and the legal presumption of good intentions, and the arm of the judiciary can not reach them. If either of the purposes that I have named were stated in the many items of this bill where they exist, and especially in these clauses in respect of the taxation of imported tin, and are avowed to exist in this debate in many forms, they would vitiate the law as to such items, and the judges would be bound so to declare the fact. The concealment of this purpose, if that were possible, can not alter the situation of the case. That they are concealed in the bill and yet avowed in debate is only an evasion that proves that there is no sound constitutional ground upon which those features of this measure can be based.

The country is naturally and justly alarmed at the bold and defiant assault that is being made upon the spirit of the Constitution as to the purposes of tariff taxation by this bill and by the party that supports it under the command of a caucus decree.

The raising of revenue is openly avowed to be a subordinate feature of this measure, while the protection of American industry by taxation and without reference to revenue is the purpose that is kept constantly in view.

We have been a long time in reaching a state of public opinion in which this defiant disregard of the Constitution is boasted of by those intrusted with power to tax the people.

This stage of dereliction could only be openly confessed as a principle of government in opposition to that of taxing the people to raise revenue and in favor of taxing them to raise money for the benefit of certain industries, when its promoters feel that the combination of interested persons and corporations has gained enough of power to control the country at the ballot-box.

It is a fearful condition of the country that puts the Government under the power of such combinations and turns over to their control the power to tax the people at will and pleasure, not to raise revenue but to prohibit it, not to equalize the burdens of Government but to put some classes of our people under the wine-press and to fill other classes with their fatness. The ancient plan of farming out the revenues to private proprietors with liberty to tax the people at the will of the donee or lessee of the power is only repeated under a thin disguise in this bill. The manufacturers dictate every feature of the bill to suit their own purposes, while farmers, miners, lumbermen, and all the consumers of manufactured goods stand by to thank them for any poor concessions they may make to them.

They paid for this lease of power with political influence, political "fat," political "soap," as political corruption is called by a slick and vulgar euphonism in our political slang.

They use this power just as the ancient Briton did, and as the modern Turk does, to tax money out of the people, of which a lesser part goes to the Government and a larger part into their own pockets.

It is in the Senate that this bill to raise revenues for manufacturers originates. It is a substitute for the House bill which reduced the revenues of the manufacturers, and, with lower taxation, enabled all the people to save money; and, with that and a liberal free-list, cut down a redundant and devouring taxation of the people.

The Representatives of the people in three hundred and twenty-five Congressional districts framed a bill that met the support of 100,000 majority of the voters of the United States and sent it to the Senate. The theory of that bill, the constitutional foundation on which it rests, does not suit the Senate, and their committee bring it back with every line but the enacting clause stricken out. The substitute is a new bill which can not be justly styled a bill for raising revenue—new in form, substance, principle, method, arrangement, schedules, free-list, and purposes. Grant that the Senate may do all this and that the House, by adoption, can originate this new bill, just as if it had sprung from its own loins, and thereby make it a constitutional exercise of the taxing power, still it is worth while, if this is a Government of the people, for the people, and by the people, to inquire as to the direct supervision by them over the taxing power as it is exerted in this new bill. What has become of that supervision and why has it been lost to them, and what causes will drive their Representatives to reverse the whole theory of the bill they originated and sent to us and to accept a Senate bill which is framed in utter hostility to their bill and their votes?

This supervision of the people over the exercise of the taxing power has been put into eclipse by the coming of the Senate between them and their constitutional rights. The three hundred and twenty-five Representatives of the people are distributed over the whole country in proportion to population, and their demand for the House bill is the demand of the majority of the whole people, while ten of the Senators who vote to destroy this bill of the people, by the people, and for the people represent fewer people and a smaller area of country than are contained in a single State of the Union. The simple reason why the people are not allowed to have the bill that does justice, even in stinted measure, to them is that the manufacturing industries of the United States are most largely under the care of those ten Senators, and they prefer a bill that is distinctively and carefully framed for the purpose of supporting those manufactories by the taxation of the people.

The causes that may drive the House of Representatives to submit to the reversal of their solemn votes by this alleged bill for raising revenue, that originated in the Senate, are the impending calamities created by the votes of Senators from this same part of the country in the tariff legislation that the House is seeking to correct.

In their plans for giving bounties to the manufacturers they have fastened upon the country a drain of wealth which flows continually in their own direction. It also loads the Treasury with $130,000,000 annually of excessive tax money. The impending calamity is, that this depletion of vital force in the minor industries of the country will paralyze them, and, in turn, they will be swept out like the foundations of a house built on the sand, and that house will fall, and great will be the fall thereof.

The House of Representatives may be forced to accept anything that will reduce this surplus and thereby save the country from bankruptcy.

That is the only excuse for the passage of this bill. It is much like that which lit the torch with which Alexandria was burned, when that remedy was the only one that could stop the progress of the plague.

The debates and votes upon every proposition to amend this bill, and they have been recorded on the Journals, in many instances have disclosed the fixed and avowed purpose of giving more of protection, as it is called, to the manufacturers.

The purpose of raising revenue has been ignored, and the purpose of protection dominates every schedule and almost every line in the bill. I need not cite the proofs of these facts. The record of this debate is full of them, and the purpose, as I have stated it, has been avowed frequently with boastful audacity.

By way of excuse and apology for this flagrant perversion of the power of taxation from public to private ends and profit, several maxims and deductions have been invented and pressed upon public credulity with an earnestness that savors more of desperation than of enlightened zeal for the truth.

The most prominent of these inventions is that a tariff tax creates a home market which absorbs the goods of the manufacturer at lower prices than foreign goods of like kind could be sold for. This is answered fully by the fact that no sane man ever yet sought the cheapest market he could find for the sale of his goods.

They want a home market that will draw the people away from agriculture, settle them in cities, towns, and villages, put them in comfortable houses on good wages and with neat surroundings. They call this the diversifying of labor, and recommend it as a panacea for poverty, hard labor, and the unrefined and unpleasant things of rural life.

If bread and meat, and wool, cotton, flax, silk, and sugar could be produced by machinery, under the roof and within the walls of a factory, these economists would not have need to invite the husbandmen into those sheltered retreats to perform the labor by which they feed and clothe all mankind. They would gladly exchange places with those who labor in the shade and who are fed largely upon what the farmer has to pay to them under tax laws; but those places are always full, and if all the farmers, or half of them, were to leave the fields and go into the factories they would be overcrowded. Labor would then be so diversified that all would starve to death, and go out of the world as they came into it—naked.

The drift of this argument is one of those absurdities that the people never adopt or follow, and its conclusion reverses every law of nature and every impulse of mankind, to produce from the soil food and raiment, from the seas salt and fishes, from the forests and the mines fuel and metals, and shelter from the forests and quarries.

It is the home market for American capital that these ardent patriots also desire.

Our railroads and canals, mines, forests, and vast areas of land afford good opportunities for the investment of American capital and an exclusive home market for so much of their yield and productions as the American people can consume.

In railroads, canals, and mines foreign capital crowds in and gets all the advantage, in proportion to quantity, that is enjoyed by our own capitalists.

Corporations are created for them everywhere to protect them against responsibility for the debts that may be created in the conduct of their business. This form of protection is the same abuse of justice that is perpetrated in that other form of protection that taxes the people to increase the profits of the manufacturers, and enables them to save themselves from loss by increasing the price in the market of all they have to sell, while production is suspended by strikes and lockouts.

We add to the invitation our tariff laws extend to the foreign capitalist the additional inducement of a tax that prohibits competition with him in our markets and thus surrender to him the use and control of the home market to the extent of his capital employed in this country. Of course he comes readily to enjoy these peculiar privileges of growing rich upon the trade of our people. The result is that a very large part of the capital of persons and corporations that are thus subsidized under the theory of the supporters of this bill comes from abroad, but the owner of the capital does not come with it. He remains at home under a foreign allegiance and leaves to Americans the duty of supporting the Government and of fighting its battles when wars occur.

It is arrant folly to say that our capitalists can exclude the competition of foreign capital in our so-called home market. The protectionists say that they want a home market that will give higher wages to American labor than any foreign market can afford to its own people.

If this is a sincere declaration, the means by which they attempt to provide such a home market destroy the purpose they have in view. Cheap, underpaid, and half-starved laborers will resort to this country in myriads to get our better food and shelter and higher prices for their work, and we can not keep them out unless we put them under a ban like that we have just imposed upon Chinese laborers, and prohibit their coming.

What protectionist, what Republican, has ever attempted to protect the American laborer as they protect American capitalists and manufacturers, by a tax upon the foreign laborer, as well as upon the products of his labor?

The Republican party, in order to increase the supply of labor in the United States, provided for the encouragement of immigration from foreign countries, and this very bill contains some remarkable advantages which are given on the free-list in favor of such immigration.

A home market for foreign laborers is what this bill invites, and to give it full encouragement it exempts them from taxation, with all their wearing apparel, teams, vehicles, tackle, harness, and household effects. When they get here, whether they remain a year or as permanent residents, they enjoy equally with our people all the advantages of the home market we provide for them by taxing our people.

Strikes and lockouts are the great leading features of the manufacturers' home market, next to the barrier that is erected by the tariff to keep out foreign competition.

If the high prices of manufactured goods induce too much capital to be invested in any leading manufacture, and thereby create too much competition and threaten a reduction of prices and the loss of profits, the manufacturers suspend their operations until prices are restored.

While their machines are idle their operatives go unemployed and unpaid. The tariff is behind them to uphold prices against foreign competition, and the shortened supply to the increasing demand of the consumers for their goods makes these periods of suspension the most profitable periods for their business. Under the same shelter they form combinations, called trusts, which take control of an entire manufacturing industry and decree that only a certain quantity of the protected article shall be produced, and that it shall be sold at not less than a certain price. But every subsidized manufacturer, without entering into a trust or combination, has ample power, by a lockout, to stop production until the prices in the home market are satisfactory to him.

Labor is thus placed at his mercy, and the consumer must pay artificial prices for what he consumes because there is no foreign competition, and the supply in the home market is shortened in order to raise the price.

Strikes are voluntary when an increase of wages is demanded by labor. They are involuntary when the insolence or oppression of the employer compels the laborers in this way to redress their grievances. They are more frequently forced upon the laborers as the alternative of injustice than they are resorted to by them for an increase of wages. In either case they are a fearful protest against laws that force labor and capital into an association that is so artificial, and that so exposes labor to the arbitrary demands of capital that strikes become a necessary means of relief to labor from the unjust and insulting demands of capital.

In the unprotected industries strikes do not occur. This important fact leads us up directly to the conclusion that protection is the foster-mother of these labor combinations.

Strikes, whether voluntary or by compulsion, would seldom occur if they did not increase the profits of the capitalist while they last, and if the invitation to foreign labor was not adequate to the ready supply of the factories with imported laborers. With this door open a great strike can not fail to bring into the country a large increase of laborers.

Men thus brought in are cheap and refuse laborers of inferior class and inferior intelligence, often criminal and debased. When they come they take the places from which a better class have been driven out. The result is sad, but it is natural, and the indignant strikers resent defiantly this double wrong to them and their families.

I can not believe that such a great number of men engaged by the great corporations and capitalists in railroads, mines, and factories would incur the losses and hardships that are endured by laboring men of all degrees of skill in conducting these strikes from motives of selfishness, jealousy, or malice. In nearly all of them the men engaged in them are the constant witnesses of the hardest fate that can be visited upon humanity, from the freezing and starving infant and the broken-hearted mother to the father who is the victim of massacre.

Untold and indescribable miseries are the constant results of these strikes, and they are foreseen by the men who engage in them. The strikers are always heavy sufferers, while the employers at most are only losers of a part of their income. Men do not incur such risks and expose their families to such sufferings unless they believe that their wrongs demand the sacrifice. It is the tyranny of capital and its greed for profit, sheltered on the one side by the immunity given to it in acts of incorporation and on the other side by the unjust partiality of tariff laws, that drive the men it employs into these excesses of resistance and retaliation. When they vote bounties to incorporated capital, to be created by tax laws, they expect that the power they thus confer will not be used to increase their poverty and to destroy their manhood. They rebel at results like these and press their revolt with indignant fury, until starvation again forces them into sullen submission. Who can ever imagine the hardships, endured by innocent and dependent people, that have followed the strikes that I now proceed to enumerate?

That is a terrible tribute to the plan of taxation that creates a home market for labor and capital. A few such triumphant successes would convert this whole country into a bedlam. If we are pointed to the tariff as the cause of our national prosperity, what shall we say of the maladies it brings to our laboring people—3,902 strikes in 22,403 establishments, including those affected by the strikes, involving 1,323,203 employés, in less than seven years?

The lockouts and the places where they occurred show the key to the home market for labor, as well as to the factories, is placed in the hands of the protected manufacturers.

The President-elect said with triumphant emphasis that the doors of immigration open inward, and not outward. The doors of the factories open outward, and not inward when capital is dissatisfied with the profits labor pays to it.

Of the establishments in which lockouts occurred, 1,981 were in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Ohio, and Illinois—89.48 per cent. of all.

Of the establishments in which strikes occurred, 16,692—74.84 per cent. of all—were in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Ohio, and Illinois.

The causes of strikes are still more discreditable to that pretension, so bold and so false, that a protected home market for American labor is the mainspring of the movement for giving high bounties to capital. These self-sacrificing gentlemen pretend that they want more tribute from the tax-payers, only for the purpose of paying their employés better wages. Let the strikers answer this false plea in the statement of the causes that have led to these desperate movements:

The total number of employés involved in the whole number of strikes for the whole period was 1,323,203. The number of employés originating the strikes was 1,020,156. The number of employés in all the establishments before the strikes occurred was 1,660,835, while the whole number employed in the establishments involved after the strikes occurred was 1,635,047—a loss of 25,788. There were 103,038 new employés engaged after the strikes, and 37,483 were brought from other places than those in which the strikes occurred.

In the 2,214 establishments in which lockouts were ordered during the period named there were 175,270 employés before the lockouts occurred, and 170,747 after the lockouts, while the number actually locked out was 160,823. There were 13,976 new employés secured at the close of the lockouts, and 5,682 were brought from other places than those in which the lockouts occurred.

The loss to employés in the strikes of this period is estimated at $51,814,723, and the loss to employés through lockouts at $8,157,717—a total loss to employés of $59,972,440.

The employers' losses through the strikes for six years amounted to $30,701,553, and through lockouts to $3,462,261—a total of $34,163,814.

Nearly a hundred millions of money lost by strikes and lockouts to the employers and to the employés during these seven years under this blessed system that has been invented here that has been called the home market for labor!

The only protected agricultural interest in the United States in which a strike has occurred was an inconsiderable affair on the sugar plantations in Louisiana. Contrast with this the strikes in the protected manufacturing industries from 1881 to 1886, and we find how much more contented is the labor employed in unprotected agriculture than it is when employed by the bounty-fed owners and workers of machines. Here is the statement of the strikes and lockouts in the protected industries——

Mr. HAWLEY. If it will not disturb the Senator, I should like to ask a question just there, especially as I heard the remark that labor is so much more peaceable where it is not protected. Will the Senator tell me whether they have no strikes at all in free-trade countries, and if they have none, what there is in their situation that bars strikes? My point is this: Strikes are not necessarily a result of either a protective tariff or a free-trade tariff, so called, but they are a part of that general movement, that swinging to and fro, that pressure, alternative capital and alternative labor, that is to be found anywhere and everywhere inevitably.

Mr. MORGAN. I am not discussing this question except in the American view of it.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then I understand the Senator——

Mr. MORGAN. I am not discussing it upon the mere question of theory, but I am taking the facts as they have occurred.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to emphasize this——

Mr. MORGAN. I want to know whether these facts count a benefit and advantage to agriculture in the system of protection, or whether they show that that system has led to uproar and outrage and wrong and injustice. Manufactures were going on in this country when I was a young man, and I never heard of a strike until I got to be a middle-aged man under a tariff for protection.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator will pardon the remark, but I only desired to know whether he charged that strikes were due to the doctrine of protection.

Mr. MORGAN. I am not arguing this question, nor will I argue any question upon the idea of post hoc ergo propter hoc. That is not a fair method of argumentation. But I will proceed further with the argument which I have before me to account, as I think rationally and correctly, for the fact that these strikes are the necessary outcome of the protection doctrines in this country, the protection laws that have been in force. We have got the post hoc and the propter hoc here, but we have got more than that. We have got the direct connection between the strikers and the manufacturers who are protected, and we find that in the unprotected industries of the United States there are no strikes.

Whether it is a mean principle of humanity on the part of the laborer that makes him demand of his employer a part of the bounty that the Government of the United States is paying to him under these tax laws is not for me to answer, but I think I shall take occasion to repeat that my observation has been among the laboring classes, the employés of factories, the mechanics, and the artisans of this country, that they are just as patriotic, and just as virtuous, and just as honest as any other class of men in the world; and when we find them breaking loose in these vast masses, and when they carry the torch of the incendiary in their hands and dynamite bombs concealed beneath their clothes for the purpose of redressing grievances, we must understand that there is a movement in the very depths of the American heart which has been provoked by some very serious cause, and that cause is the state of the law in the United States upon the question of taxation.

The Senator from Connecticut asks me if strikes do not occur in free-trade countries. Yes, they do occur there; but in those countries they have got other monopolistic institutions. They have got other means of grinding down the poor that force them even in free-trade countries to strike. There is a nobility to be supported, on the top a royalty to be supported, and in the midst of all of them enormous monopolies to be supported, which are paid out of the treasury, if you please, of Great Britain. They have got there a more enlarged form than we have got here, the power of aristocratic rule. But in this country the power of aristocratic rule is given to the barons who reap the harvest of taxation that is kept out of the Treasury of the United States by the tariff laws and carried into their pockets.

Continually, day by day and hour by hour, and by every speech that is made on that side of this Chamber, and almost every vote that is given upon a tariff law, we are building up for the American people a bounty-fed aristocracy who grind the people through their factories and their corporations and their tariff laws until they force them to strike, just as the commonalty of England are forced to strike by that other system of arbitrary aristocracy which loads them with burdens of government that they are incapable of meeting without the loss of manhood and almost at the expense of starvation.

Here is a statement of strikes and lockouts in the protected industries. I have already stated that there are none in the unprotected industries. You can not point to an unprotected industry that ever had a strike in it. This is for the same period, from 1881 to 1886:

Making lockouts of 120,942 people in 1,480 establishments from 1881 to 1886. I should like to know under this protection that they have been enjoying all this time, under the bounties with which they have been upheld, why it was necessary to close the doors of their factories in 1,480 establishments against 120,942 employés from 1881 to 1886. Were not the profits sufficient under the tariff to enable them to proceed regularly with business and to furnish their employés with daily employment throughout the year, Sundays excepted? Have we not paid out of our taxes bounties enough to justify these manufacturers who hold the key, as I have observed, of the home market, and also the door of the factory, in giving a regular supply of employment to their laborers?

There is where the proof comes as undeniably as that two and two make four that the power given to these men by the protective tariff to hold foreign goods in abeyance, to keep them from being imported for sale into the United States, enables them in all of these importations when their factories are behind, by the lockout of the employés to raise the price of their commodities and to make money by the operation.

The American market can take only so much goods of any description. Sixty-five million people can not consume all that these factories can produce. The money of speculative capitalists has gone into all of the different manufacturing establishments to such a large amount as that the disproportion is seriously great between the amount of capital employed in manufactures and the capacity of the American people to consume what they produce in their mills. What is the result?

Whenever prices begin to decrease in consequence of competition, the door is turned upon the factory and the employés are locked out of it, and they are not permitted to come back until prices catch up. A speculation is made, and it can always be made, and it will always be made under a protective tariff by the capitalist in thus stopping the operations of his factory until prices increase in consequence of the increased demand and the short supply.

I have gone as far with this part of the subject as is necessary to show how the capitalists and the laborers fare under this artificially stimulated home market.

If it were not blasphemous ingratitude I would say that it is to be regretted that our farmers produce so much more of grain, provisions, and textiles than are needed to supply our home market.

The outside nations who enjoy this overflow have the signal advantage of fixing the price not merely of the surplus that we can not consume, but the measure of price or value of these commodities, gauged and graded to their poverty, is brought back to our home market and this standard has emblazoned upon it, "These are pauper prices, fixed by the lazzaroni of Europe upon the food and clothing produced in America; accept them in your home market, and be grateful to God and the trans-Atlantic starvelings."

No protected baron scoffs at that declaration. Not one of them would lower his prices a farthing to compensate the farmer for what he must sacrifice in thus having a price fixed in Liverpool for grain and provisions sold in Rhode Island.

They greedily accept the prices fixed upon grain, provisions, and cotton in the foreign market, while they pretend, but only pretend, that they are unwilling that the price of labor employed in their business shall be fixed in the same markets.

What are crops but the wages of the farmer, and what are his wages but the price fixed upon his crops?

The manufacturer rejoices when the prices of grain, provisions, and the textiles run low in the foreign markets, because that fixes the price in the home market and increases his gain by lowering his expenses. He weeps and wails when the prices of labor run low in foreign countries, but soon recovers his spirits when it pours in upon him through the immigrant gates at "the Battery" in New York, which only open inward, bringing labor competition into the protected home market.

To the American laborer he says, "Help me to increase my income by taxing the people and I can do better by you at a convenient season." To the foreign laborer he says, "At a convenient season I will call for you."

That convenient season is when American labor is too high, or makes demands for increase of wages. Then the key of the lockout is turned in the factory door, or the reduction of wages, or some arbitrary wrong, causes the deceived and indignant toilers to walk out and confront starvation, or accept sympathy in the form of bread subscribed by their society to feed their children. They turn away from the cold glitter of the gold they have loaded into the coffers of the capitalists and seek comfort in the warmer bosoms of men whose blood still flows in a warm and charitable current through veins shriveled with poverty.

This is the home market they have been told about for agriculture and for skilled labor.

It raises in a few localities the price of beans, onions, cabbages, turnips, lettuce, fowls, butter, milk, and fruits, and this is the compensation offered to agriculture for compelling the farmers to take pauper prices for wheat, flour, corn, oats, pork, bacon, beef, and mutton, and all the great staples of husbandry. All people are consumers.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wonder if it would disturb the Senator too much to allow me to interject a word. He is just there now where I should like to have him say a little more. I am going to say something by and by upon that precise topic, and I will give him a point now and shall be glad if he will say something about it.

I have heard him speak of vegetables, etc., and of the injuries the farmers suffer here. I call his attention to the fact, which I will lay before him from the census, that the value of farming lands goes up precisely as the percentage of people employed in manufacturing increases in every State and in sections of States. There were no manufactures to speak of until 1880 in the Senator's State, and his land is worth $4.19 an acre, while in granite Connecticut ours is worth $49.

Mr. MORGAN. There are so many people in Connecticut in comparison with the area that the ground for burying a man ought to be pretty high. It is a very dense population.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then I will go where the population is by the square mile the same, and compare manufacturing States with agricultural States.

Mr. MORGAN. You may go through Connecticut, and through Massachusetts, too, and you will find to-day farms grown up, turned to timber, turned to fire-wood, that were formerly under cultivation.

Mr. HAWLEY. I give the Senator the prices against his own prices. That is enough.

Mr. MORGAN. I am talking about the payment of labor; I am not talking about the prices of land. Prices of course go up in lands where the population is dense. The price of real estate in Washington City has advanced not less than 50 per cent. since I came to this city as a Senator, and it is all owing to the fact of the density of the population, the inflow of population. Land is getting scarcer and the population is getting greater, and as a matter of course the price goes up.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator permit me to make just one statement, and I will not further trouble him? I am certain as to the source where it was taken. Wisconsin has a population of 24.2 to the square mile; Alabama, 24.5 to the square mile. The difference is hardly worth mentioning in density of population. Farm lands are valued in Wisconsin at $23.30 to the acre, though they have barely got over distributing public lands, and in Alabama $4.19. The density of population being the same, the material difference between them, aside from differences of climate, is the extent to which the manufacturing of Wisconsin furnishes a home market.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Connecticut has afforded me an opportunity, by a little diversion from the line of my argument, to make a statement and an answer to his question that I am very happy to do.

The population of Wisconsin originated very largely in immigration. It takes about a thousand dollars of somebody's money to raise a boy from the date of his birth until he is eighteen, nineteen, or twenty years of age, able to do a man's work. Somebody has to expend it. It is a tax upon the community. In considering the aggregate wealth and the aggregate expenditure of any community you are obliged to take into account not merely the cost of raising labor but also the value of labor after it is raised.

The people in Wisconsin and other States in the Northwest, through immigration laws and through their enterprise, for which I commend them very highly indeed, have managed to draw a very large amount of Scandinavian population and population of other kinds from foreign countries, usually employed in the cultivation of land. When those men came to Wisconsin and to those other States they came already raised. The thousand dollars which had been invested in the raising of each one of those men was expended by a community across the water, and it was no tax upon Wisconsin. When the man came here he was ready to take the plow in his hand and go to work, having cost that community nothing. The land upon which he is employed of course is very much more valuable than land would be in a country where it cost a thousand dollars to raise the laborer, and when you get him raised he is of no account at all.

Now, take the young negroes in the South, and they are the most unpromising, yes, the most God-forsaken set of people in respect of industry and of hopes and prospects of ever performing anything that requires labor, found anywhere outside of Algiers or Morocco or the great desert of Sahara. It costs us down there a full thousand dollars to raise a negro child, a boy, from his birth to eighteen years of age, not to include the stealing and the other depredations that that poor creature perpetrates, it seems from a natural drift; I am afraid it is that.

Our country is taxed enormously to raise its labor. It has had no immigration from white countries. It will never have any while the negroes are dominant in that region. There is not a gentleman on the floor of the Senate from a Northern State to-day who would send his son down into an agricultural district in Alabama, no matter how rich the land was, to become a farmer; and yet that same gentleman would jump at the opportunity of sending his son out to take a farm in Wisconsin.

Unfortunately, under the circumstances by which we are surrounded we can not have white immigration into our country. We have to raise our labor at a thousand dollars a head to the time when they are twenty years of age. You import your labor, raised with no tax upon your community. That puts the price of your lands up, and it puts the price of our lands down.

Sir, if I could by a decree of law or of Providence expel from the State of Alabama this day every negro in it and have a barrier erected so that he could never return, the lands in Alabama would run up to prices greater than they are in Wisconsin, and the people would rush into that country with more eagerness than they are trying now to get into Oklahoma.

Sir, that is a beautiful land. Its fertility is unexampled. Its forests beggar description in their magnificence. Streams abound everywhere, furnishing the greatest supply of the finest water. There is scarcely a hill in all that country that has not got its spring at the foundation pouring its limpid stream out for the refreshment of the people. Fruits of every character grow that are known to a temperate clime. You can raise as much wheat to the acre in Alabama, in the northern parts of that State, as you can raise in Wisconsin, the average being 11 bushels to the acre, according to the amount of the present crop. We have the great cotton crop to rely upon. We have such a superabundant supply of providential resources in that country that the difficulty with us is that we can make a living altogether too easily.

But there is this race of people. We did not bring them there. The slave-catchers brought them there, whoever they were, and we bought them from the slave-catchers and from the ships as they were imported into this country. They were flooded out over that Southern country because agriculture in the growing of cotton and other things was profitable. They were flooded upon that country. So we had no power to resist their coming in. The present generation of men in Alabama are no more responsible for the presence of the negro there than are the present generation of Massachusetts and Connecticut responsible for their importation into this country. We find them there. They are an incubus and a burden upon the country. While they furnish labor, they do not furnish that foundation of industry which must be built, if industry ever succeeds in any country, upon the frugality, the economy, the savings, the industry, and the honesty of what we might call the base of society, what in France is called the peasantry.

If you put beneath the foundations of agricultural industry or manufacturing industry or any other industry, I care not what it is, a people who are reckless and wasteful, who have no thrift and no economy, and while they may enrich by the current profits upon their labor the men who employ capital in manufactories or other establishments, when you come to consider their effect upon the prosperity of a great country you will find that it is like water poured upon the sand; it percolates, is lost, and no effect comes from it. We have a substratum of laboring population in the South upon which you can not build a real, substantial, prosperous industry, either in manufacturing or in agriculture. That is our misfortune. God knows I regret it. I can not help it. That accounts for the figures which the honorable Senator from Connecticut has just laid before the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to ask the Senator if we are to understand that he considers it would be for the interest of the Southern white people that the negroes should emigrate from the Southern States in a body?

Mr. MORGAN. Not in a body, Mr. President; I do not think it would, and not immediately.

Mr. BLAIR. I should be glad to have the Senator justify his statement upon that point.

Mr. MORGAN. But I was always in favor of that proposition brought in by the former Senator from Minnesota, Mr. Windom, which looked to the scattering of the negroes of the South out into the Northern States. I wish the Senator from New Hampshire had in his State a hundred thousand that I could furnish him from Alabama. I wish he had a hundred thousand of them. I should be very glad indeed to give them up.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will permit me upon that very point, I will state that I had the honor to serve upon the committee which investigated that subject, and I thought it was very manifest that the Southern people as represented in the Senate at that time were exceedingly incensed at the supposed object of that investigation, to encourage the exodus of the colored people from those States. For one I thought that they had a right to be, and that it was against the interest of both the white and the colored population that there should be any such dispersion of the colored people of the South throughout the country at large any further than a discontented surplus might do that perhaps to the relief of the congested mass at home.

Personally I always encouraged their remaining there, and many a time I have written letters to colored men to that effect who have asked me through their correspondence upon that subject. In letters I have written to them I have stated that I thought the thing for them to do was to remain in the Southern States, at home, that the Southern white man was really their best friend. If I have been laboring under a mistake, if the Southern white people feel that it is better that the colored population should gradually seek homes elsewhere, I should be glad to know it, and I will give such advice as I may be called upon to give in another direction.

Mr. MORGAN. I was asked by the Senator from New Hampshire whether I was of the opinion that it would be for the benefit of the people of the Southern country that the negro should disperse into other States. I answered it by stating that I was always in favor of the proposition advanced by Senator Windom for the dispersion of the negroes. I believe it would be a godsend to the people of the South if that could be done.

I do not know that the Senator from New Hampshire has made any great effort to draw negroes into his State. I wish he would start, among the many societies that he seems to be propagating, a society for the introduction of negroes from Alabama into New Hampshire, and I would do my best to promote his society, to get subscribers to it, and to get negroes to migrate. He can have all the benefit of them that he thinks he wants.

Mr. BLAIR. I will say to the Senator that I would think it quite as much for the interest of my State to organize such a society and to have it efficient to secure the immigration of the colored people of Alabama to our State as the white men.

Mr. MORGAN. As the white men of Alabama! I understand that. The Senator from New Hampshire may spare himself all of his invective against the people of Alabama, for very fortunately for us it either goes below our feet or over our heads. It makes no impression upon us. The Senator can wear himself out with such allusions, if he chooses to do it, without producing even a ruffle upon our skirts or any sort of excitement to the people of Alabama.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. MORGAN. I decline to yield further.

Mr. BLAIR. I should be very glad to limit my general reflection upon the people of Alabama and confine it simply to the Senator with whom I am engaged in a colloquy.

Mr. MORGAN. If any providential thing should keep the Senator and I apart forever, God be thanked. I do not know any reason that I have for going with him. He adds nothing to my happiness that I know of, and I think a more intimate association with him would neither improve me in temper, in information, or in any other respect. So the gentleman can take his leave of me forever, if he chooses to do so, and I should be glad to have him do so.

Mr. BLAIR. I imagine I shall if I ascend hereafter.

Mr. MORGAN. Perhaps you may, but the question of your ascending hereafter is one of the problems that I can not decide, fortunately. As the tree falls so will it lie. I can say this for the people of Alabama and their representatives, that they have none of that intermeddling spirit or peculiar malice which seems to infest the minds of some here, who are always trying to find somebody against whom they can make a point, of whom they can make a complaint. We stand, sir, in the consciousness of the integrity of our own motives and the justice of our purposes, and it is a matter of no sort of concern to us whether our views shall suit those who do not like us or whether they shall not. When our record is read, especially that part of it which relates to the support of our oaths, the maintenance of the Constitution of the United States, I expect that the representatives from Alabama and the people of Alabama will be found to stand as true and loyal for the Constitution of this land as any other set of men who are in it now or who were ever in it; and that is enough. When we stand by our obligations to maintain the Constitution of the country, then of course opinion is free, and in those limits legislation is free, as it ought to be. I censure no man for differing with me upon any question or under any circumstances, unless I am convinced that his policy leads him contrary to the Constitution of his country.

I will now proceed to resume the line of argument which I dropped a few moments ago to reply to a question, and from which I have been diverted unfortunately and very disagreeably and very unnecessarily.

It is to the human family in the United States that the argument is addressed that high taxes make low prices. As the manufacturers do not want low prices for their productions, it is a curious conundrum why they should want high taxes.

They want low prices for all the staple articles of commerce that the farmers, miners, lumbermen, and fishermen produce because they are consumers of their productions.

High prices on imported commodities of manufacture secure to the home manufacturer high prices on what he produces, and prevents the American farmer from getting fair wages for what he produces. When he exchanges his wheat in England for clothing he can not bring it home without paying a tax on it, and, as he can get no higher price for his wheat in New York than in Liverpool, the difference in the cost of clothing between these marts represents the loss in the price of his toil, which is his wages.

It is the tariff that depresses the price of his labor, represented in his wheat, just as much in the home market as it does abroad, by preventing him from purchasing with his wheat, on an average, 46 per cent. more of the same goods in England than he could get for the same amount of wheat in New York.

A theory is presented to fill the gap in the farmers' accounts current, which claims that the home market for articles of a perishable nature that will not bear exportation will compensate them for the vast losses they thus sustain upon all their great staple crops raised in excess of the home market demand.

There can be no need to disprove by an array of facts a theory that is so absurdly false. If our cotton production was reduced to the wants of the home market we would have to reduce our annual crop by 4,500,000 bales. We would have to make this enormous retrograde before we could have even a voice in pricing our products up to a sum corresponding with the prices of manufactured goods in the market. If the annual consumption of cotton were limited to 4 pounds per capita, or 12 yards of fair cloth, we should need a population of 450,000,000 of people to consume our present limited production.

If we wait for that number of people before we are to have a home market that will consume our cotton crop, and before we are to enjoy the supposed blessings of that mythical condition, we shall have to work hard for the home market and the "millions in it" in raising the turnips we are to sell to luxuriating philosophers who plan so wisely to make us all rich by excessive taxation.

What other sentiment than blind and heartless cupidity would have devised this scheme of wanton interference with the personal rights of the tax-payers by converting the power to raise revenue into the power to make and unmake the fortunes of men, and to divert them from the free pursuit of their business vocations, and to trample under the foot of the oppressor one industry that another might have better room to grow and find a richer soil in its decay?

The raising of revenue is the only duty Congress has to perform in taxation of any kind, and when that is done the power is executed. When any different purpose is included in a tax bill the Constitution is abused, the people are wronged, tyranny is excused, lawless disregard of the rights of the people is encouraged; representatives are confronted with temptation, the unceasing foe of honest government; public morals are depraved to a standard that recognizes no right that is not paid for in some mercenary equivalent; favors are sandwiched with oppression in every tax bill, and Congress becomes a mart of trade.

These are the principles upon which I oppose the tax proposed by this committee upon the importation of tin, which, as I observed in the outset of my remarks, as was demonstrated by the Senator from Arkansas, is a tax that covers every false principle to be found in this bill. That tax is the image of this bill drawn in a single article; but it is just as true of a very large number of articles embraced in the bill that the tax is imposed not for the purpose of raising revenue, not for any legitimate purpose mentioned or thought of in the Constitution of the United States, but it is imposed solely and expressly for the purpose of giving money taxed out of the people into the hands of the manufacturers that they may make trade profits thereby.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the subcommittee, who has been reporting amendments which the committee propose to this bill, whether the committee intend to recommend an amendment raising the duty on skates, a manufacture in New Hampshire certain facts in relation to which I had the honor to submit to the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. In response to the inquiry of the Senator from New Hampshire, I will say that the subcommittee, the committee, in fact, have considered somewhat the question presented by him to the committee as respects skates, but the difficulty in making an amendment applying to them is that it lumbers up the bill with too many special things. I think the committee generally were of the opinion that the particular matter which he referred to the committee ought to be remedied in some way, but we have not thus far been able to devise a remedy that would be effective.

Mr. CHANDLER. I submitted to the committee evidence showing very clearly, as it seemed to me, that this manufacture could not be longer continued in New Hampshire without an increase of duty. As I understand, the present duty is, under the basket clause 198, concerning manufactures of iron and steel not specially enumerated or provided for in the act, 45 per cent. ad valorem. The evidence proved that skates could be manufactured in Germany at a very low rate, and that if their importation continued as it would under the present rate of duty the home manufacture would be destroyed. I should like to ask the Senator whether he does not believe that the German manufactures will shortly or eventually prevent the manufacture of skates in this country if the present rate of duty continues.

Mr. ALLISON. I am quite well aware of the purpose of the Senator in making this special inquiry. The manufacture to which the Senator refers is the manufacture of a particular skate or kind of steel skates, which the Senator now produces in the Chamber. Those interested ask us to include them specifically in our schedule. We had not sufficient information to enable us to deal with the question of skates so as to provide a specific duty for the articles indicated by the Senator, and also for other articles of a similar character.

In the absence of more detailed information, we have been unable to suggest a specific remedy for the particular thing he now speaks of. I will say that there are a great many articles which now come in under what is known as the basket clause of manufactures of iron and steel at 45 per cent. ad valorem, which probably will not very long be manufactured at that rate in this country in competition with the Germans, who are invading our manufactures at every point, and producing articles cheaper than they can be produced here with the protection of 45 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I desire to present the facts in reference to this industry to the attention of the Senate. These skates are distinctly a Northern manufacture and for Northern use. Of course they do not interest the Senators from the South. But it is no inconsiderable industry in the city of Concord, where I reside. Concord is not a manufacturing city to any great extent. We make the Concord carriages, the Concord harness, and there is a small amount of woolen manufacture.

But there has grown up in Concord quite an industry in the manufacture of these skates, which are, as the Senate will see [exhibiting], entirely of steel. They are manufactured partly by machinery but largely by hand. There is a very large proportion of the work done upon them which is hand work. They have been profitably made until a recent period, but now, under the influence of German importations, the manufacture is becoming unprofitable, and although it is going on at this moment in Concord and also to some extent in the city of Keene, N. H., where ex-Governor Samuel W. Hale and his son have a skate factory, yet it is apparent that the manufacture will shortly have to be given up and the industry, such as it is, small or great, will have to be abandoned.

I wish to read to the Senate the communication sent to me by the manufacturers, which I presented to the Committee on Finance. It is as follows:

[Haley Manufacturing Company, factory and office, 181 North Main street, Concord, N. H. Boston office, 29 Pearl street (removed to 103 Chauncey street). John Kimball, president; J. J. Haley, treasurer.]

BOSTON, December 8, 1888.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request I write you giving you a brief statement concerning the manufacture of skates in the United States. From the best information that I can get there are about 1,500,000 pairs of skates sold per year in the United States, and at the present time about 500,000 pairs are imported from Germany, which will be greatly increased at the prices at which the importers are now selling them. I send you by express a pair of skates such as are made in Germany, and which were sold two years ago by the importers at from 50 to 60 cents per pair in lots of 500 pairs or more. The price of these skates this year, as sold by the importers, is 38 cents per pair in lots of 100 pairs or more, which is much less than they can be manufactured for in this country.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator has before him the American skate?

Mr. CHANDLER. This is the American skate. The German skate is slightly inferior to the American skate. The letter proceeds:

It takes about 4¼ pounds of steel to make one pair of these skates, which at the present price is about 4 cents per pound. The labor upon these skates will average about 25 cents per pair. Add to that cost rent, power, insurance, interest, etc., you add at least 5 cents per pair to the cost, which you will readily see is so much above the cost of the German skate that the manufacturers are obliged to give up the manufacture of them in this country.

The steel in these skates manufactured here, as far as I know, is all American steel, and besides stopping the industry of the manufacture of skates, it also stops the manufacture of a large quantity of steel. When my company commenced the manufacture of skates, the lowest price at which they were sold was 58 cents per pair in large quantities. In the last two years we have made between 60,000 and 70,000 pairs. If the duties remain the same as they are now we shall be obliged to discontinue the business, and we know of several other parties who are larger manufacturers than we are who contemplate giving up the business altogether. The pattern of skates that I send you was formerly made in Halifax and patented in the Dominion of Canada.

These skates are called the Halifax or Acme skates.

When the patent expired the Germans for one season flooded the market and the manufacturers at Halifax had to suspend their business. They went to Ottawa and got an additional specific duty put on these skates, enough so that they could manufacture their skates at a profit in competition with the Germans. I would suggest that instead of an ad valorem duty of 45 per cent. on skates, as at the present time, a specific duty, such as would fairly protect American manufacture, should be imposed. I think this should be done, or a small specific duty should be enacted in addition to the present ad valorem. Then I think that from eight to ten hundred more hands could be employed in the manufacture of skates and the steel of which they are made than there will be if the duty remains the same as at present.

J. J. HALEY,
Treasurer Haley Manufacturing Company.

Hon. WILLIAM E. CHANDLER,
Washington, D. C.

December 18, 1888, Mr. Haley also wrote me, as follows:

DECEMBER 18, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed I send you a letter from Germany to Messrs. Dame, Stoddard & Kendall, to whom I have been selling skates. I send you this letter so that, if you choose, you can use it to sustain my statement in regard to the price at which skates are sold for imported from Germany. You have in my letter my calculations what the skates would cost to make them here. You have in this letter an offer from Germany to supply skates, and can see the difference in the cost of importing skates and getting them made here. I do not wish to weary you on this subject, but as the manufacture of skates is quite an important industry in this country, when you include the steel from which they are manufactured, I desire to give you all the facts that I can, that your committee on tariff may fully understand it.

Respectfully yours,

J. J. HALEY.

Hon. WILLIAM E. CHANDLER,
Washington, D. C.

I now call the attention of Senators who are listening to me to a letter from a German manufacturer, which is as follows:

REMSCHEID, June 29, 1888.

GENTLEMEN: Knowing your firm as a buyer of skates from a friend, I take the liberty in offering you Halifax or Acme skates in quantities not less than 5,000 pairs at 1.08 marks free, Hamburg packages free, with 2½ per cent. discount against cash monthly.

A mark is about 23 cents. The price at Hamburg, free on board, for which this German manufacturer says this skate can be made, is 1.08 marks, or about 23 cents.

After my calculation you would pay at this price, if you had the skates at New York, per 100 pairs 108 marks, less 2½ per cent., 105.30 marks net at Hamburg; freight from Hamburg to New York, 2.35 marks; assurance, .50 mark; duty from 93.50 marks (108 marks, less freight, casks, and packing paper). 42; total, 150.15 marks per 100 pairs, or per pair 35½ cents (the dollar at 15 marks.)

During the latter years I manufactured nearly all the skates which are exported from here to the United States and Canada, and most likely you know my skates. But as prices become lower and lower the importer has no profit and the manufacturer is forced to offer his goods direct, and this is the reason for the present letter, assuring you at the same time that nobody else can give you such an advantageous offer.

I manufacture, of course, better kinds of skates than only Acmes, and would thank if you ask for prices.

By a kind reply, if you are willing to buy, you would oblige,

Yours, very truly,

JOH. PET. BECKER, Jr.
E. BARTY.

Messrs. DAME, STODDARD & KENDALL,
Boston, Mass.

You must pay duty only from the net sum.

	Marks.	Marks.
Therefore		108.00
Less freight and casks	8.00
2½ per cent. discount	2.50
Packing paper	4.00

At 45 per cent., 42 marks duty.

In other words, these German skates can be purchased ready for shipment at less than 25 cents; the duty on them at 45 per cent. is about 11 cents, and therefore such imported skates can be laid down by the wholesale in New York City for 35 or 36 cents per pair.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PUGH in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. VANCE. I wish to understand the object of the Senator from New Hampshire. Does he desire to increase the duty upon German skates? I wait for his reply.

Mr. CHANDLER. I did not think of asking for an increase of duty on American skates. So I think the conclusion is pretty evident that the increase of duty I asked the committee to impose was upon foreign skates.

Mr. VANCE. Do I understand the Senator to say that the German skate undersells the skate made in his State, so that the maker of the home-made article can not afford to manufacture them at that price?

Mr. CHANDLER. He is afraid he can not. Now, I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question.

Mr. VANCE. The Senator will excuse me——

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator whether he did not know what the manufacturer desired the committee and Congress to do?

Mr. VANCE. I suspected; I did not know. I suspected that he desired to have the duty put upon the foreign skate, in order that he might get an enhanced price for his skates. If that is so, I wanted to ask the Senator from New Hampshire——

Mr. CHANDLER. That is the question I wanted to have answered.

Mr. VANCE. I was desirous to learn from the Senator from New Hampshire how that could be done, because we are told that the duty upon the foreign skate cheapens the home-made skate. Therefore, I could not see how the manufacturer of the home-made skate was to be benefited.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is the old conundrum which has been heard from the Senator ad nauseam.

Mr. VANCE. But that is the conundrum that is propounded by the Senator's party, and that is the one that has never been guessed. I thought I was right upon the point of it, if I could get the Senator to answer the question candidly.

Mr. CHANDLER. If I can understand the Senator's point, I will endeavor to answer it.

Mr. VANCE. I understood the Senator to argue and to read from a paper that a Governor Somebody in his State was making skates, and that the German skate undersold him even with the present duty, and he wanted the duty raised for the purpose of cheapening his own skates. He could not afford to compete with the German so long as the duty was on at the present rate, but if the duty was increased sufficiently high, that would enable him to manufacture his skates at a rate that would undersell the German and knock his nose out of joint.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not think the Senator from North Carolina understood me to say—if he did he is mistaken—that this manufacturer wanted a duty put on the foreign skate in order to cheapen the manufacture of his own skate.

Mr. VANCE. I know, but that is what the doctrine results in.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator had an opportunity to answer that doctrine all last summer and pretty much all this winter, and he might have refrained from stating our argument in a form in which I did not make it in order to give him an opportunity to answer it once more. I suppose the manufacturer wants this duty increased because the German manufacturer under present conditions undersells him and he wants a protective duty on the skate. I suppose the Senator from North Carolina understood that this debate was on the merits of protective duties. Apparently it has been so; and there is no dispute about the situation with reference to this one article of manufacture. As I understand it, it can not be manufactured much longer at the present cost of making it to the New Hampshire manufacturer unless a higher rate of duty can be imposed upon the German skate; and then the German manufacturer will either keep his skates at home or he will have to pay the duty to the Government if he puts them in competition with the American skate.

I wrote again to Mr. Haley and received from him another letter, as follows:

CONCORD, N. H., December 31, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 26th instant duly received, with inclosures. It is beyond question that we can not manufacture skates in this country to compete with Germany with the present rate of duty. We are working up our stock, and shall discontinue the manufacture until some change is made from the present rate of duty.

Mr. President, here is an industry, a small one to be sure, but it is an illustrative case; that of a manufacture that will disappear in Concord, in New Hampshire, in this country, on the existing rate of duty, because the German manufacturers find that they can make skates more and more cheaply every year, and they are making them and flooding this country with them to the destruction of the American industry.

I certainly had hopes that the Finance Committee would find themselves able to report here a small specific duty upon this manufacture, in order that the making of these skates might continue in this country. It did not seem to me that the Senator from North Carolina or any other Southern Senator, because not interested either in the manufacture or in the use of skates, would object to a slight increase in this duty, particularly when we now have a duty on sugar of 84 per cent., and a duty on rice of from 71 to 134 per cent. I hoped that this industry might be adequately protected at this time. If it can not be, then I trust it may be at some other time before the manufacture is entirely extinct in my city and in my State.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, the picture that the Senator from New Hampshire presented to us was an appalling one. The idea that this great industry should absolutely disappear from this country and our boys be left to amuse themselves upon skates made in Germany by the pauper labor of Europe is a picture that startles me from my sense of propriety and makes me hesitate whether or not I shall consider the constitutional question involved in the case.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to interrupt the Senator, if he will allow me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. VANCE. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator wish to ask a question, or to make another short speech?

Mr. VANCE. No, sir; I have the floor. I was recognized by the Chair, and I supposed the Senator from New Hampshire had concluded.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator is not to blame, then, for going on. I had not yielded the floor, but I will yield to a question.

Mr. VANCE. If the Senator claims the floor, as a matter of course I subside.

Mr. CHANDLER. Did the Chair understand me to yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thought the Senator from New Hampshire had concluded and yielded the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. I had not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire is now recognized.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish in this connection to call the attention of the Senate to some statistics of both manufactures and agriculture in New Hampshire, as indicating the importance of a protective tariff to the welfare of our people. In our State manufactures and agriculture go hand in hand. There probably is no community in this country, certainly not outside of New England or New York, which illustrates so well the benefits of protective duties to all classes of people as does the State of New Hampshire, with her diversified manufacturing and agricultural industries; and there is no community to which it would be so fatal to apply the Democratic doctrine of free trade or a tariff for revenue only as to the people of New Hampshire.

Reliable statistics of manufacturing products must of course be taken from the census of 1880. Another decade has nearly elapsed, and we shall soon be possessed of the statistics of the last ten years, but until the new census is taken we can refer safely only to the census of 1880. I have here, and will insert in the RECORD, with the permission of the Senate, without reading in full, the statistics of the agricultural and manufacturing industries of New Hampshire in the year 1879.

I present, also, a comparative statement of manufacturing in New Hampshire in 1860 and 1880, which shows the increase in the number of our establishments during the twenty-year period, the increase in capital employed, in total amount of wages paid, and in the value of the material and of the products.

Manufacturing in New Hampshire.

Another table gives the same comparison between the years 1850, 1860, 1870, and 1880:

New Hampshire—Statistics of manufactures for years as noted.

[Census 1880, volume 2, page xii.]

Year.	Establishments.	Capital invested.	Hands employed.	Wages paid.	Value of all materials used.	Value of products.

Here is a further statement showing the number of persons engaged in manufactures and in mechanical and mining industries, with ages, sex, and nativity, according to the census of 1880:

It is a fair estimate, I believe, that at the present time there are seventy thousand of the men, women, and children of New Hampshire engaged in her manufacturing and mechanical industries, which would make one-fifth of all our citizens, estimating our population at 350,000. With this one-fifth getting their living in manufacturing, manifestly the people of New Hampshire are sensitive about any attacks upon those industries.

I have here some statistics concerning the city of Manchester, our greatest manufacturing center, which fifty years ago did not exist, but which, at the Falls of the Amoskeag, solely by reason of its manufacturing industries, has grown up from a mere sand-bank to be the largest, the wealthiest, and the most prosperous city in the State.

City of Manchester, New Hampshire.

[Census 1880, volume 2, page xxiii.]

Aggregate population	32,630
Number of establishments	121
Capital	$15,149,153

Number of hands employed	10,838
Total amount of wages	$3,370,404
Value of materials	$7,901,066
Value of products	$14,136,305

[Census 1880 volume 2, page 410.]

Number of establishments*	121
Capital	$15,149,153
Average number hands employed:
Males above sixteen years	4,632
Females above fifteen years	5,748
Children and youths	458
Total amount paid in wages during the year	$3,370,404

*All industries.

Manchester, in its order of rank among the manufacturing cities of the country, appears, from the following table which I will insert, to be the thirty-first city in the United States in the number of hands employed, the thirty-third city in wages paid, the thirty-fourth city in the value of the net product, and the thirty-sixth city in the value of the gross product.

Order of rank in cities, of Manchester.

[Census 1880, volume 2, page xxiv.]

Order of rank.	Name of city.	Gross product.	Net product.	Hands employed.	Wages paid.
Thirty-first	Manchester			10,838
Thirty-third	Manchester				$3,370,404
Thirty-fourth	Manchester		$6,235,239
Thirty-sixth	Manchester	$14,136,305

But Manchester, although its position varies from the thirty-first to the thirty-sixth in the statistics above given, occupies a much higher grade in the manufacture of cotton and of woolen goods.

Order of rank of Manchester among the seven leading cities in the United States in the production of the industries specified.

[Census 1880, volume 2, page xxvi.]

Rank.	Industry.
Fourth	Cotton goods.
Sixth	Woolen manufactures (all classes).

In addition to the city of Manchester there are many other prosperous cities and towns in New Hampshire which are engaged in the profitable manufacture of cotton and woolen goods, which I will not undertake to name, but which equally with Manchester will cry out earnestly against any assault upon their industries.

So that our State is a busy hive of industry, and it has grown somewhat in population and largely in wealth by reason of this front rank which it has taken as a manufacturing community.

Manifestly, Mr. President, the Mills bill, if it becomes a law, will injure the State of New Hampshire. I present to the Senate a statement of our leading industries which will be affected by the passage of the House bill, and I will insert in the RECORD these statistics, taken from the census reports of 1860 and 1880, concerning four branches of industry:

Leading industries in New Hampshire.

Plushes, velvets, and velveteens, etc	40 per cent	40	10 cents per square yard and 20 per cent.

From the above table it appears that as to nearly all the manufactures in the cotton schedule the House bill proposes to substitute ad valorem rates for specific duties. I believe that I am right in saying that in every case the House bill substitutes ad valorem rates for specific duties, and that result of itself would be almost destructive of the cotton industries of the country. If no other changes were made than to substitute the equivalent ad valorem rate for specific duties, destruction to cotton manufactures would follow from fraudulent undervaluations in importations. But the House in their bill have not confined themselves to changing their specific duties to ad valorem rates; they have also reduced, as I understand it, the whole line of duties upon cotton goods, while the Senate substitute proposes to retain substantially in most cases the duties imposed by the present law, and in some cases, I believe, to increase the existing rates. It is of vital importance to the cotton manufacture of this country that the attempt made by the House bill to destroy the industry by reducing the rates shall not succeed.

A similar table is presented showing the New Hampshire product of woolen and worsted goods. Incorporated in the table is also a statement of the proposed treatment of wool by the House bill and by the Senate substitute.

The table is as follows:

Woolen, worsted, and felt goods; gloves and mittens; mixed textiles.

The attempt to induce the woolen manufacturers of New England to consent to the reduction of duties upon manufactured woolens by holding out to them the bait of free wool has not succeeded to any great extent. It is my belief that the woolen manufacturers of my section are substantially unanimous in opposing the reduction of the duty upon wool, and in opposing the placing of wool upon the free-list, because they realize that protection should proceed upon a principle, and that every natural and legitimate home industry should receive the benefits of protective duties; and there certainly is no reason, in their opinion, why the farmer who raises sheep and sells wool should not be protected against the cheap wools of foreign countries. Therefore I have placed in this table the duties imposed by existing law upon wool and the proposed duties on the main schedules of woolen goods, from which it appears, as it did with reference to the cotton schedule, that a reduction of duty upon woolen manufactures is to be effected by the House bill if it passes, and the lower rate of duties is to be an ad valorem rate instead of a specific duty.

Mr. President, the attack made by the House bill upon these two industries is one and the same; and if there was any probability that it would succeed and that the cotton and woolen manufactures of this country would be subjected to the destruction which would result from the passage of the bill, the consequences to the State of New Hampshire would be in the highest degree pernicious.

Next, I submit to the Senate a statement of the number of persons employed and the capital engaged in New Hampshire in the manufacture of paper and wood pulp:

Paper, books, paper boxes, and wood-pulp.

Cost of materials	$1,502,189.00
Expended for labor	514,600.00

Printing paper, unsized	15	12 per cent...	15 per cent.

Envelopes, paper	25	20 per cent...	25 cents per 1,000.
Pulp for paper-making	10	(*)	10 per cent.

*Free by original Mills bill, changed in House.

Here we have a reduction of duty by the House bill all along the line. We have the Senate bill maintaining the existing rate of duty, with wood-pulp for paper-making, which has a 10 per cent. duty upon it under the existing law. Wood pulp was made free by the original Mills bill, but it was changed in the House, and the duty there retained as it is retained in the Senate bill; and these industries of wood-pulp, and all manufactures of paper, which are large in New Hampshire and in New England, need all the protection which the Senate bill will give them.

Another table which I will insert in my remarks is as follows:

Marble and stone.

Unmanufactured or undressed.	$1 per ton.....	Free.....	14 cents per cubic foot.

The industry of working granite has grown largely in New Hampshire, and is becoming a very considerable part of the occupations of our people, especially in the city of Concord. It appears that by the House bill unmanufactured or undressed granite is made free of duty. The duty under the existing law is $1 a ton. The duty reported by the Senate committee is 14 cents per cubic foot, and this duty is necessary to the profitable manufacture of granite in New Hampshire.

There appears, in considering this schedule, a curious history of the duty on marble. Under the existing law marble in block, rough, or squared, of all kinds, is dutiable at 65 cents per cubic foot. It was made free by the original House bill. But after the bill was reported to the House of Representatives it was discovered that there was a large marble industry growing up in the State of Georgia, as there had been for a long time profitable marble quarrying in the State of Tennessee, and at the instigation of the Southern State of Georgia, the House, instead of making marble free, adopted a duty of 40 cents per cubic foot. The Senate committee, however, recommend that marble, which is a Southern product as well as a Northern product, shall be protected by a duty of 65 cents per cubic foot.

Another table which I present covers the industries dependent upon wood and lumber.

From the above statistics it appears that lumber, which under existing law, is protected in all its varieties, was made free as to nearly all those varieties by the House bill. The Senate substitute proposes to retain the present duties.

Cabinet ware and house furniture is no inconsiderable industry in our State. Furniture is now dutiable at 35 per cent. The House bill proposes 30 per cent., while the Senate bill retains the present rate.

Mr. President, I have thus called the attention of the Senate to the manufacturing industries of New Hampshire and to the impending danger to those interests arising from the pendency in Congress of the House bill. The State of New Hampshire under the existing tariff system has been growing wealthy, and its wealth has been that of the common people of the State. If there are large fortunes in the State of New Hampshire I do not know of them. The only man of immense wealth in the State has made his money by the manufacture of beer. But the citizens of New Hampshire, like those of the other New England States, have largely invested their earnings in savings-banks, and I give here a statement of the deposits in the New Hampshire savings-banks from 1850 down to 1888.

Statement of New Hampshire savings-banks.

Year.	Banks.	Depositors	Deposits.	Average each depositor.	Average each person in State.	Population.
1850.....	12	13,031	$1,641,543.71	$125.97	$5.16	318,000
1870.....	45	70,918	18,759,461.05	264.52	59.00	318,000
1879.....	66	87,279	26,282,136.09	301.13	80.87	325,000
1880.....	67	89,934	28,204,791.70	313.61	86.78	325,000

In 1888 there were 69 savings-banks. There were 139,967 depositors, nearly half the number of the people of the State. The amount of deposits was $53,939,079.29. The average for each depositor was $385.36. The average for each person in the State was $151.94, there being a population of 355,000, and these investments in our savings institutions show as well as anything can the prosperous condition of of our people.

Mr. President, New Hampshire does not depend for her prosperity upon manufacturing alone, but upon agriculture as well. The agriculturists of New Hampshire are not in so forlorn a condition as some Senators seem to think. Agriculture to-day is profitable in our State, and the statistics show that our agricultural wealth is well worth preserving even in comparison with the greater agricultural products of other American States. I ask the attention of Senators to facts taken from the census of 1880, concerning the farms and the agricultural products of New Hampshire.

We had, it appears from the above figures, 32,181 farms in New Hampshire, according to the census of 1880. They were valued at over $75,000,000. We had, it appears from the figures, in Indian corn (which is certainly under ordinary circumstances not a profitable crop to raise in New Hampshire on account of the cheap transportation of corn from the West) 36,612 acres, 29,485 acres in oats, and even 11,248 acres in wheat. There were 211,825 sheep, and our clip of wool each year is no inconsiderable product, while, as every one knows, the dairy products of New Hampshire are of great value.

I have here, furnished at my request by the Department of Agriculture, an additional statement of the acreage, the product and value of the principal crops of New Hampshire, which I will insert in the RECORD, which shows that on the whole the agricultural industries of New Hampshire are increasing in extent and value:

The chief products of our farms, in addition to animal products, are hay, corn, potatoes, wheat, buckwheat, oats, barley, rye, beans and peas, wool, milk, butter, cheese, hops, and maple sugar and maple molasses, and the direct effect of the House bill upon the farming industries of New Hampshire may be comprehended and some idea formed as to the injury which would be inflicted upon the farmers of New Hampshire if we consider the number and the importance of the agricultural products which the House bill proposes to put on the free-list or upon which it proposes to greatly reduce the duties. Potato, corn, and rice starches, for instance, would by the Mills bill be brought into greater and closer competition with our native-made starches by reducing 50 and 66 per cent. respectively the existing duties, from 2 and 2½ cents a pound to 1 cent a pound.

Of potatoes there were imported into the United States in the fiscal year 1887, 1,430,918 bushels, the value of which amounted to $214,637.81. A million and a half bushels of potatoes were imported at the rate of duty of 15 cents a bushel.

I suppose Senators will say that potatoes are not placed upon the free-list by the House bill. It is possible that under the bill as it passed the House potatoes were not placed upon the free-list, but referring to the expectations of Sir Charles Tupper, who succeeded in negotiating a fishery treaty with the Administration not long since, it is apparent that the great expectations of our Canadian neighbors were raised that potatoes were by the Mills bill placed on the free-list, and that at any rate, if they were not placed on the free-list by that bill, they soon would be made free of duty. I will recall to the attention of Senators the words of Sir Charles Tupper on this subject:

I say that under this bill which has been introduced, and which I believe will pass, for it does not require two-thirds of the Senate, where the Republican majority is only 1 in the whole house, to pass a bill, it requires a majority of 1 only, and I am very sanguine that this bill will pass during the present session. Modified it may be but I am inclined to think that the amendments will be still more in the interest of Canada than as the bill stands to-day. If this is the case I think we may congratulate ourselves upon securing the free admission of our lumber, upon which was paid during the last year no less than $1,315,450. On copper ore, made free by the Mills bill, we paid * * * $96,945. On salt, $21,992 duty was paid. This is rendered free by the Mills bill.

I am sorry to find, as I hoped would be the case from the first copy of the bill that came to me, that potatoes were not included amongst vegetables. I am sorry there is a doubt as to whether the term "vegetables not specially enumerated" will not exclude potatoes. In grappling with this policy of making the natural products of the two countries free, you do not expect any person who wants to carry a bill to put a heavier load upon his shoulders than he is able to carry, lest he may break down and do nothing. You expect him to take it in detail, and, as I believe, you will find the policy contained in this bill of making those natural products of Canada free carried out until you have perfect freedom of intercourse between the natural products of Canada and the United States of America. Of wool we sent last year 1,319,309 pounds of one kind, and a variety of other kinds, upon which a duty was paid to the extent of $183,852. Now, as I say, on articles of prime importance and interest to Canada the removal of duty by the Mills bill amounts to no less than $1,800,193.

It matters not, in the general aspect of this question, Mr. President, that the great expectations of Sir Charles Tupper as to the free admission of Canadian products all along the American border have not yet been realized. He stated what he expected. The policy of the advocates of the House bill is apparent from the whole spirit of this discussion, and the farmers of New Hampshire know perfectly well that if that policy should be carried out in its full length and breadth they would be subjected to overwhelming inroads along the border of all these Canadian farm products, and that result would take place at a time when Canada is imposing duties at a high rate upon the same products of American farms and of American farmers imported into Canada. So clear is this that the majority of the Senate committee in their report declare that the bill is "a bill to favor Canada." The committee say:

The discrimination is not less marked in favor of the people of Canada and against the farmers and lumbermen living along the northern border from Maine to Oregon. The following table contains a comparison of the rates which are imposed by the Canadian tariff upon certain articles placed upon the free-list by the House bill under consideration:

Comparative statement of Canadian and United States tariffs on certain articles affected by the House bill (H. R. 9051).

Articles.	Present law.	H. R. 9051.	Canadian.
Oils, animal and fish	45 per cent	Free	20 per cent.
Oil, coal	10 per cent	Free	7½ cents per gallon.
Meats	1 cent per pound	Free	1 cent per pound.
Shoulders and other meats	2 cents per pound	Free	2 cents per pound.
Vegetables	10 per cent	Free	10 per cent.
Peas	10 or 20 per cent	Free	10 cents per bushel.
Beans	10 or 20 per cent	Free	15 cents per bushel.
Brick	20 per cent	Free	20 per cent.
Shingles	35 cents per M	Free	20 per cent.
Hubs, spokes, etc	20 per cent.	Free	15 per cent.
Lumber and timber	20 per cent.	Free	20 per cent.

And the committee say:

Under our existing tariff the Canadians send to our markets annually many millions of dollars in value of their products, which, after paying duties not greater than those levied by the Canadian tariff, are sold in competition with our domestic producers. The advantages which would accrue to the people of Canada by this removal of duties are manifest.

Beans and peas, that crop which in the State of New Hampshire and in the New England States generally is one of the most important and valuable produced, are protected under existing law by a duty on foreign beans and peas of 10 per cent. ad valorem, and split peas by a duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem. Yet by the House bill beans, peas, and split peas were to be placed upon the free-list. In 1887 there were imported into the United States 478,205 bushels of beans and peas, the value of which was $492,752.39, and the duties collected amounted to $49,275.23. Of split peas 53,076 bushels were imported, valued at $40,608.40; duties collected, $8,121.73.

Vegetables (beets, cucumbers, cauliflowers, mushrooms, onions, peas, squashes, pumpkins, tomatoes, and the like) in their natural state or in salt or brine, which now pay duty at 10 per cent. ad valorem, would be admitted free of duty if the House bill were to become a law. The imports of these vegetables in 1887 amounted in value to $519,312.36, for which $51,931.25 in duties were collected.

Garden seeds, except seed of the sugar-beet, now pay duty at the rate of 20 per cent. ad valorem. The House bill places them on the free-list. Importations of garden seeds in 1887 amounted in value to $149,876.07; the duties collected amounted to $29,975.21.

Provisions, like meats, game, and poultry, now dutiable at 10 per cent. ad valorem, are on the House free-list. The imports in 1887 were valued at $109,834.08; duties collected, $10,983.44.

Tallow now pays the same duty; is put on the free-list by the House bill.

The existing tariff on bricks, which are no inconsiderable manufacture in New Hampshire, is 20 per cent., and it is so kept in the Senate bill, while bricks by the House bill are put on the free-list.

Bulbs and bulbous roots, not medicinal, now dutiable at the rate of 20 per cent. ad valorem, would be made free by the House bill. The value of imports of 1887 was $160,982 47; duties collected, $32,196.49.

Mr. President, the agricultural industries of New Hampshire are increasing in their value to the people of New Hampshire for the reason that new modes of agricultural work are beginning to be introduced. We have high authority for going to the encyclopedia for facts, and I have taken from the American Cyclopedia some information in reference to new and improved methods of agriculture, which I will not detain the Senate by reading, but will insert in my remarks.

Changes are gradually made everywhere, and the success which attends the introduction of new implements disarms prejudice. Within the last half century, chemistry, the indispensable handmaid of agriculture, has grown with great rapidity, and in each new discovery some new truth applicable to practical agriculture has come to light, while willing experimenters have labored in the field to prove the truth or falsity of the theories proposed, and thus the well-established facts from which the science of agriculture is derived and the sound theories deduced from these facts are constantly increasing in number. The substitution of animal for manual power, and still more the saving of animal power by the substitution of natural and mechanical forces are the surest indications of improvement.

From the changes which have grown up in these respects, and from the more constant use of chemistry to determine the qualities of soils and manures within the last fifty years, we may safely assert that the progress made during that period, or perhaps within the last twenty years, is wholly unparalleled.

As labor and time saving machines are now looked upon as wholly indispensable by all who raise grain and hay on a large scale, the reaper and the mower may be regarded as types of the present, as the sickle and the flail are types of the past.

Among the other labor-saving implements which are now generally introduced upon farms of any extent all over this country and Great Britain are the horse-rake, the improved horse-hoes, the seed and corn sowers, the broad-cast seed-sowers, the improved subsoil and trenching plows, the straw and root cutters, the cultivators, the thrashing and winnowing machines, and many others of equal importance.

It is safe to say that the improvement in the implements named, made within the last half century, has enabled the farmers of the United States to accomplish at least double the amount of labor with the same number of teams and men. * * * And thus many millions of dollars are annually saved by these improvements in agricultural mechanics.

This is a grand and practical advance over all former periods in its history, and promises a future development of the resources of agriculture almost beyond the power of language to describe.

[American Cyclopedia, volume 1, pages 235-236.]

The progress which has been made in the application of chemistry to agriculture is hardly less gratifying; for though from year to year there may seem to be little progress, yet when we compare any two periods of five or ten years, the increase of practical knowledge derived from the investigations of the agricultural chemist, as well as its importance, is very perceptible.

* * * Probably Professor Liebig has contributed more than any other man to this awakening—

The importance of applying the results of chemical investigations.

* * * He remarked in his "Organic Chemistry" that "to manure an acre of land with 40 pounds of bone dust is sufficient to supply three crops of wheat, clover, potatoes, turnips, etc., with phosphates, but the form in which they are restored to the soil does not appear to be a matter of indifference. For the more finely the bones are reduced to powder, and the more intimately they are mixed with the soil, the more easily are they assimilated. The most easy and practical mode of effecting their division is to pour over the bones in the state of fine powder, half of their weight of sulphuric acid, diluted with 3 or 4 pints of water."

The grand leading idea contained in this and similar propositions of Liebig's, opened the way for the whole system of artificial manuring which has extended so far in modern times. Before this time the farmer had confined himself to the use either of a compost of animal and vegetable materials, or of other simple substitutes, as ashes, soot, salt, or something of the kind, not in accordance with any fixed principle derived from reasoning or the results of observation, but simply because experience had shown them to be beneficial. His idea was that sulphuric acid—the vitriol of commerce—would make the neutral phosphate of lime soluble, and give it a powerful action in the soil. For the subsequent discovery and use of mineral phosphates, we are indebted to the same source, the development and application of the views first advanced by Liebig.

* * * So in every country where agriculture receives the attention it deserves the productive power of the soil has largely increased. Even the Atlantic States of the Union, where the system of cultivating the soil without maintaining its fertility by a proper treatment prevailed for many years, are not an exception, since the condition of agriculture is rapidly improving in the oldest of them, where this system was earliest begun, and the general average of crops, with the exception of the potato, is increasing from year to year as a more proper culture is introduced and persevered in, the farmer being led to improve his practice by the pressure of an increasing population and constantly rising prices. In New England, for instance, one of the oldest sections, the general average yield of Indian corn per acre has risen to about 35 bushels per acre, while crops of 50 and 60 bushels per acre are by no means uncommon, and 80 and 100 are sometimes obtained by careful tillage. The situation and soil of New England are not such as to make it what is called a wheat-growing region, and this fact, which farmers were long in understanding, has caused a great decrease in the extent of land devoted to this crop.

Indian corn, root crops, and all varieties of fruits suited to temperate latitudes are found to be more certain and remunerative, and attention is given mainly to them. In the mean time the system of farm management is gradually improving, new implements to facilitate labor are introduced, and much greater care and economy than formerly in regard to manures everywhere prevails, most farmers having good barn cellars arranged for its preservation, into which peat and loam are carried in large quantities, and composted from time to time during the winter as absorbents and divisors. The spirit of inquiry and enterprise in agriculture was never more general or encouraging than at the present moment. Societies have been established in all the States and in most of the counties. * * *

The cost of fertilizers purchased in a single year (1879) in New Hampshire was $165,793, as shown by the last census.

Mr. President, it is one of the most gratifying results of the chemical researches of the present day that our agricultural products by means of modern fertilizers are being largely increased; and not only this, they are also being increased throughout the United States by the introduction of new and improved modes of cultivation. In this condition of improved agriculture, against having the farmers of New Hampshire injured directly or indirectly in their industries by the passage of this House bill the people of New Hampshire, I am sure, will make very decided protest.

Our farmers are most fortunately situated because they find a near and quick market for their products. They have no expensive transportation to pay for. They take their produce to market easily; they find near their own doors busy manufacturing villages full of inhabitants ready to purchase and consume; and men, women, and children in all occupations are interested in preventing the present American tariff system from being stricken down as is proposed by its present assailants.

Mr. President, I have been at a loss to understand why these assaults have been made at this time upon the American protective system. I can not see why the Democratic party as a whole has arrayed itself against the protected industries of the United States. Certainly that party in its effort to break down our protected industries has received a signal rebuke as the result of the late Presidential election; although the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] undertook to declare the other day that it was not the tariff issue on which the Presidential election had been fought and won by the Republican party. I will read his statement of the reasons for the defeat of the Democratic party:

We were defeated—and I will dismiss the subject with that single remark, for I do not want any political discussion on an economic question—we were defeated by a sectional issue. We were defeated because our friends (and as a politician I do not blame them) went into the Northern States and reawakened the fires of war, stirred up the embers of sectional strife.

They said to the Northern people, "Here are these Confederate brigadiers whom we whipped face to face upon the battle-field, who now seek to strike us down by destroying our manufactures." "Look at the composition," they said, "of the Committee on Ways and Means, with MILLS, of Texas, at its head and the BRECKINRIDGES from Kentucky and Arkansas upon it. The war is again upon us. Union soldiers, to the front, and once more into the fray!"

There is where you won your victory, and not upon this tariff question.

I do not distinctly understand the position of the Senator from Missouri on this point. He begins by saying that it was a sectional issue and not a tariff issue, and yet he asserts that the argument was made to the people that the Confederate brigadiers were striking down the manufactures of the North, and therefore he leaves it to be inferred, notwithstanding his claim that the victory was won upon a sectional issue, that really the Democracy were defeated upon the tariff issue.

In the Senate, on the 14th of September, 1888, the Senator from Missouri certainly seemed to be making not a sectional issue but a tariff issue. I read from his statement on that occasion:

Well, Mr. President, my party, whatever its faults may be, shirks no issue. The record shows whether the Democratic party is willing to meet this issue fairly and squarely. The President of the United States, if he had chosen to skulk behind some other issue, could have been re-elected President with a unanimity unparalleled in the history of the Republic. Like a brave, honest, and true man, he sent his message to Congress, which struck with steely point the shield of this infamous protective system.

Here, then, according to the Senator from Missouri, on the 14th of September the issue was made by the President and by his party upon what the Senator calls the infamous protective system put in operation by the Republican party, but when after election he undertakes to account for the defeat, he says that it was the sectional issue and not the tariff issue.

The Senator is on record in another form, not as some Senators say they are, as seeking to distribute throughout the whole country both the burdens and the benefits which may be derived from a protective tariff system, but as endeavoring to destroy all the protected interests of the country. I read from the famous letter of the Senator which begins:

UNITED STATES SENATE, Washington, D. C., June 23, 1888.

MY DEAR CHARLEY:—

After some other remarks, the Senator says:

We are entering upon the most fearful Presidential contest and the most important since that of 1800. Mr. Cleveland by his message, for which I sincerely honor him, has challenged the protected industries of the country to a fight of extermination.

And later on he says:

It is useless for us to disguise the fact that the fight is to the death, and we would be idiots to ignore this fact.

Your friend,

G. G. VEST.

C. M. NAPTON, Esq.,
St. Louis, Mo.

I know the Senator from Missouri has had some fault to find with what he says was an improper juxtaposition of his statements. He said that the expression concerning the fight to the death in the original letter was further on from the declaration that the President had challenged the protected industries of the country to a fight of extermination than it was in the quotation that had been circulated over the country; and further, the Senator undertook to say that he was not seeking to destroy or to exterminate the American tariff system, but only the infamous features of that system.

Mr. President, it is unfortunate for the Senator, if that is what he meant, that he did not so say, because we have a right to hold him to his language. The people of the North, the men interested in protected industries, will hold the Senator to the words which he used. He did not say that President Cleveland had challenged to a fight of extermination the infamous features of the protective tariff, nor did he say that he had challenged the tariff to a fight of extermination, but that he had challenged to such a fight of extermination the protected industries themselves. These are the pregnant words of the Senator:

Mr. Cleveland by his message, for which I sincerely honor him, has challenged the protected industries of the country to a fight of extermination.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] also made a memorable utterance in the Senate on the 12th of September, 1888, which has been generally read by the people of the North. The Senator said, addressing the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]:

I will just say to the Senator that if there is any one thing in this world the average Texan would go any number of miles out of his way to kick and kill and destroy it is a protective tariff.

Mr. HOAR. Is that murder?

Mr. COKE. It may be. That is the kind of murder they will commit if you give them a chance.

There is no qualification of these utterances; there is nothing to indicate that these two Senators only meant to remove the excrescences of the tariff, that they only wished to destroy its anomalies, that they only sought to reform the tariff and make it just and reasonable, dispensing its burdens and benefits as equally as possible throughout the United States, but there is the declaration of the Senator from Texas that he wants to "destroy" the tariff, and there is the declaration of the Senator from Missouri that the President of the United States, whom he sustains and justifies, means to "exterminate" the protected industries of the country, and these words describe the issue which the American people, in November last, understood they were settling by their votes.

The Senator tries now to demonstrate it was a sectional issue alone, and that the people of the North were alarmed and aroused because the Confederate brigadiers had taken the field. Mr. President, the people of the North were alarmed because the Confederate brigadiers had taken the field, but their alarm was because the onslaught was upon the protected industries of the country; and that was the political issue. The Senator was not far from right in his statement made after the election. The people of the North were aroused because the Confederate brigadiers, back in the Union to stay, as they say, had determined to destroy those protected industries which had grown up under the beneficent operation of a tariff system.

The Senators have a good text from which to assail the tariff. From the constitution adopted by the Confederate States a principle undoubtedly is implanted in their minds which, as they did not realize it in the experiment of secession, they seek to realize now that they have come back into the Union.

Article I, section 8, of the Confederate constitution said:

Nor shall any duties or taxes on importations from foreign nations be laid to promote or foster any branch of industry.

That was the Confederate principle; a tariff for revenue only. That is the doctrine to which all these gentlemen are committed; that under no possible circumstances—because they put it in their fundamental law—shall duties be imposed upon importations of foreign merchandise that will protect any home industry whatever.

The idea of the founders of the Confederacy was a South purely agricultural. They desired to realize the dream of Southern statesmen; a government under which an agricultural community raising mainly cotton—in which cotton should be king—should purchase all their manufactured goods from England; and therefore they put into the Confederate constitution the declaration to the North and to foreign nations that there should never be, if the Confederacy succeeded, any protection of American industries by a tariff system, and that principle they are now trying in the Government of the Union to carry out—these Confederate brigadiers whom the Senator from Missouri and not I brought into this discussion. They now seek to realize in the administration of this Government the principle which they thus incorporated into their Confederate constitution.

The Senator from Connecticut who usually sits in front of me [Mr. PLATT] called attention, in a speech which he made in the Senate on the 11th of October, 1888, to a resolution introduced in the House of Representatives on the 1st day of December, 1877, by Mr. MILLS, of Texas, which is instructive as showing the purpose and object of the Confederate brigadiers as soon as they obtained political control in that House, and believed that the time had arrived for them to begin the destruction of Northern industries. The resolution proposed by Mr. MILLS was:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be instructed to so revise the tariff as to make it purely and solely a tariff for revenue and not for protecting one class of citizens by plundering another.

And the author of this resolution, to whom I suppose it is not improper that I should allude, has been true to the principle he laid down, and from 1877 to this hour he and those with whom he is associated have been endeavoring to eliminate from the American tariff every clause that could by any possibility operate to protect an American industry, and have been trying to make the tariff one for revenue only, which is free trade; and to-day the Senators on the other side of this Chamber stand up and continue that fight.

It is true that the other day one or two Senators, when an industry of Maryland, West Virginia, and Virginia was assailed by their Democratic associates, emerged from their subjection to the Confederate brigadiers and undertook to show their independence by voting to retain the duties on coal, but that was only a momentary spasm. They are gone. I see them no more. They fired their guns and fell back, and the next day the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from North Carolina again came to the front and resumed their war upon the protected industries of the country, continued their declarations that the tariff is robbery, and did their best to justify and vindicate the charges made by the Republican party during the recent canvass, upon which the victory was won, that these Southern gentlemen then, unfortunately, through the ascendency of a Democratic administration in power in this country, meant the destruction of all Northern industries which were protected by the American tariff system.

Mr. President, I had occasion shortly after the close of the war of the rebellion to meet Mr. Justice John A. Campbell, who had been, I believe, a member of the cabinet of Jefferson Davis, and he gave me an interesting account of a conference which took place during the year 1864 between himself, Mr. Alexander H. Stephens, the vice-president of the Confederacy, and some other prominent members of the Confederate government. He said that Mr. Stephens's advice at that time was not to prolong the war any further. He declared that he thought it was better for the South to go back into the Union and vote down the thirteenth amendment abolishing slavery.

Mr. President, the Confederate brigadiers did not get back into the Union in season to vote down the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery. They did, however, under the reconstructed governments of President Johnson, get back nominally into the Union in season to vote down the fourteenth amendment. Every one of those reconstructed States, too late to vote down the thirteenth amendment, voted against and they voted down the fourteenth amendment, and it was only by destroying those governments through the reconstructive legislation of Congress that the adoption of the fourteenth amendment was secured, and that it was further made possible to secure the adoption of the fifteenth amendment, providing impartial manhood suffrage within all the States of the Union.

Our Southern brethren, thus balked in certain of their schemes for resuming control of this Government, finding the thirteenth and the fourteenth and the fifteenth amendments a part of the organic law of the country, have nothing left that they can do to carry out the principles of the Confederacy but to kick, kill, and destroy the protective tariff. That is the business in which they, as well as the President of the United States, have been engaged for the last year; and notwithstanding the bad luck which they have had, they still continue to make grimaces and to kick.

Mr. President, I like the figure of the Senator from Missouri by which he described the President as bravely striking with steely point the shield of the infamous protective system. But the Senator has not told us whether this knight-errant was on foot or on horseback.

We may fairly assume that it was a horseback charge, and can easily picture the President mounted on a steed, handling his free-trade lance, attended by the Senator from Missouri on another charger as one of his squires, and as another the Senator from Texas mounted on a burro, and these three gallant gentlemen, knights of the modern Democracy, charging upon and undertaking to destroy the infamous protective system of the United States.

Mr. President, the charge was a futile one, and the principal knight rolled in the dust. He has picked himself up and gathered himself into some sort of shape, very much bruised and a little dirty. He will never mount and advance again on that charge with that lance at poise.

The American people, by the election of a Republican President, who on the 4th of March, now close at hand, will be inaugurated, have effectually provided for protecting the industries of this country from the assaults which the Senators from Missouri and Texas and the other Confederate brigadiers continue to make upon the protective principle set up by the Republican party of the nation.

Mr. PALMER. I desire to speak on a question of privilege.

This morning I was called away by an imperative call and was not here when the vote was taken on the amendment upon the question of free salt. I merely wish to state that if I had been here, I should have voted against the amendment proposing to put salt on the free-list.

I make this explanation because the people of my State are very much interested in that subject,

Mr. VANCE. I should like to say also that I have a general pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER], and if I had had notice of his absence, or had observed from the roll-call that he was not present, I should have withheld my vote. I am sorry he did not give me some notice of his intended absence from the Chamber, because I have a general pair with him.

Mr. PALMER. I lay no blame at the door of the Senator from North Carolina. We are accustomed to notify each other, but I neglected to do it this morning.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I simply wish to remark in regard to the pending item in this bill that there is not one single pound of tin-plate manufactured in the United States. It has been charged that this industry has not sprung up since it was injured several years ago by a construction in regard to the tariff duty made by the then Secretary of the Treasury. But whether this fact which I have stated comes from a construction of the Treasury Department or some other cause, it is absolutely true that not one pound of tin-plate is manufactured to-day in the United States of America.

We have then the spectacle presented to the country in this pending substitute of a duty upon an article not manufactured in this country at all, a duty created for an article in futuro, and if protection could go beyond this limit I am unable to imagine how it could be done.

We have protection in this country for every variety of manufactures and productions, but in this specific item the framers of this substitute propose to go into the future as to a thing which may or may not exist hereafter and put a duty in advance for the purpose of creating an industry in the United States which has not existed for years and does not exist at all to-day.

It has been said that tin has been discovered in the United States, and there was testimony taken before the Finance Committee of the Senate as to the pending substitute to the effect that tin mines had been discovered in the Black Hills of Dakota, but those mines have not materialized, and now I understand the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] to say that foreign tin can be imported for the purpose of using it upon the sheet-iron in order to create the tin-plates, and thereby constitute competition with the foreign imported article. We are to go abroad, buy tin-plate, impose this duty upon an article that does not exist in the United States, and is not produced here, for the purpose of creating it. It is protection run mad. If this principle is to be adopted, where, then, are we to stop? All sorts of bounties, for it is nothing else, can be created by law in order to induce hereafter persons to engage in a particular business and make the venture.

We were told to-day by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] that he had reasonable hope, if this duty was adopted, that in the course of twelve months a plant would be erected in the United States for the purpose of manufacturing tin-plate. Sir, I know no instance in the history of tariff legislation equal to this. I know nowhere in all the history of tariffs in the United States, from the first one that was levied, where the Congress of the United States was asked deliberately, when no such industry was in existence at all, to levy a duty and take the chance of the industry afterwards coming into existence in the United States. That is all I propose to say about it.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, it seems the duty on tin-plate has not succeeded in inducing our people to engage in the business; it has not been sufficient. Tin-plate is an article of universal consumption, as much so as tea or coffee or sugar. Therefore the existing duty is precisely in accordance with free-trade doctrine. It collects revenue equally from all parts of the country and from all the people, and is not for protection. It is purely a revenue duty. It stands precisely on the ground of the English duty on tea, 10 cents a pound, of which the poor man pays as much as the rich man. He does not pay according to the value of the tea. His 25-cent tea pays 10 cents, and the rich man's 2-dollar tea pays 10 cents.

The difficulty with the Senator is that by a little increase in this duty, which is now purely a free-trade revenue duty, it is extremely probable, it is certain that the manufacture will be largely introduced into this country, and it perhaps may be that in two, three, four, or five years such things will happen, and all that we need will be produced here. Then the inevitable result follows that by competition the processes are improved, and after a time, and a reasonable time, the price goes down. For an example of what I am speaking of, see the marvelous history of Bessemer steel. The Senator will find that a little higher duty becomes protective, while the present duty carries out the idea of free trade.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is true, as stated by the Senator from Missouri, that of the enormous consumption of tin-plate in this country there is not a single pound produced by American manufacturers at the present time, but this unfortunate fact is owing solely to the inadequate duty imposed upon its importation by existing law, and to no other cause. If any other article in the metal schedule had been treated in the same manner a similar result would have followed. For instance, the American producers have almost the entire market to-day for bar-iron. If twenty years ago the duty on bar-iron had been placed at a less rate than that imposed on pig-iron not a single pound of bar-iron would now be produced in the United States, and this industry would be extinct, and the Senator from Missouri could have called the attention of the Senate to the futility of maintaining a duty upon bar-iron.

The Senator from Missouri alludes to the fact that we do not produce or have not produced tin in this country to any considerable extent to be used in the manufacture of tin-plate. The manufacturers of tin-plate in Wales are not dependent upon Great Britain for their supply of tin. The tin used in Wales is very largely imported from the Straits of Malacca; two-thirds, I think, of the entire amount used in Great Britain is foreign tin. We can obtain tin from these and other sources, as I have already stated in the course of this debate, as cheaply as the manufacturers of Wales. We have the skill and capital to roll the iron or steel sheets as well and as cheaply, except cost of labor, as they can be rolled anywhere in the world.

Nothing but insufficient protection prevents the establishment and maintenance of this large and important industry in this country.

Mr. Mill and other political economists of the school to which the Senator from Missouri belongs have favored protection of infant industries. We are told every day by Senators on the other side of the Chamber, in discussing the rates of duty on articles in this bill, that the industries affected are old and well established, and that they no longer need the protecting care and encouragement of the Government, thus admitting by inference that they are in favor of the development and encouragement of new industries.

Here we have an industry which is entirely new, and in every sense an infant. The committee have been assured by the testimony of reliable manufacturers who have plants now in use in rolling of sheet-iron or sheet-steel, that if this duty is made protective, that within six months from the date of the passage of this bill they will be prepared to make every pound of tin-plate that is consumed in this country.

What does that mean? It means the production here from American iron or steel of 285,000 to 300,000 tons of tin-plate where not one single pound is now produced. It means giving profitable employment to at least 70,000 people. Is not the successful accomplishment of this result worthy of our efforts?

Now, let us examine the question of the difference in the cost of production and the price here and in Wales at the present time. The cost of production in Wales may be assumed to be in the neighborhood of $3 to $3.37 a box weighing about 105 pounds. That same quantity could be produced in the United States for about $5.10 to $5.50.

The price of English tin in the New York market to-day is about $5.07 or $5.25, or very near the price for which it can be manufactured in this country, the margin between the cost in Wales and in New York being made up of say $1.05 duty and $1, or whatever the balance may be, of profit to the English importer. I believe, if this bill should be enacted into a law, that within one year from the time it takes effect domestic tin-plate of superior quality will be selling in New York City at a price not much, if any, in excess of the price of foreign tin to-day; and we should have the further beneficent result of furnishing employment to a large number of people and of creating an important American industry.

A Senator near me suggests that it is quite as much the function of a protective tariff to encourage new industries as it is to maintain existing ones. It certainly fails of its highest functions if this be not true.

Mr. VANCE. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. VANCE. Will not that tariff duty, if imposed, increase the price of the domestic article?

Mr. ALDRICH. If the increase in duty goes into effect before the American producer secures a part or the whole of the American market, undoubtedly it will.

Mr. VANCE. Yes. Well, who will pay for that increased duty while the American producer is trying to get hold of the market?

Mr. ALDRICH. The people of North Carolina will pay but very little of it.

Mr. VANCE. That is not the question. The people of North Carolina will pay their full share of it, and the Senator knows it, and if the Senator will stand square up and answer that question I will let him off. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALDRICH. The people who buy tin-plate and consume tin-plate will probably pay the additional cost.

Mr. VANCE. Will probably pay?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes, will probably pay.

Mr. VANCE. If they probably do not, then who probably will?

Mr. ALDRICH. Well, I can conceive of a great many other people. As the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] suggests, the importer of tin-plates might be obliged to reduce his profits, the wholesale jobber or retail dealer in tin-plates might contribute a share, the packer of canned goods might be forced to decrease his profits, and the difference might be distributed among many different people, or it might be paid in whole or in part by the ultimate consumer. No one can say exactly who would pay the additional price which would be placed upon tin-plates. The Senator from North Carolina no more than myself can accurately make a statement as to the precise result.

Mr. VANCE. A favorite expression of a witness in court when he wants to dodge is "he mought and again he moughtn't." He mought pay this and again he moughtn't, and then the importer mought and again he moughtn't, and in all probability in the long run, as the Senator says, the price will go down, but in the short run we know into whose pockets the money will go.

Mr. ALDRICH. Into whose pockets does the Senator think it would go in this case?

Mr. VANCE. Into the pockets of those men who have been hanging around here asking for this duty to be raised.

Mr. ALDRICH. Before they commence the manufacture?

Mr. VANCE. The whole amount of the increased price until such time in the distant future as domestic competition will bring it down to where it is now.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let me see if I understand the Senator from North Carolina. We agree that ultimately the price may be reduced by American production. Now, does the Senator say that until American production commences the American manufacturer will receive the benefit of the increased duty?

Mr. VANCE. There was so much noise that I did not hear the question. Will the Senator please repeat it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Exactly. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALDRICH. I will repeat the question. The Senator from North Carolina and myself agree that ultimately by American competition the price may be reduced to near the foreign level.

Mr. VANCE. Hardly ever, because a trust would step in whenever competition got troublesome.

Mr. ALDRICH. Until that time arrives and before the American production could have any effect upon the price, does the Senator mean to say that the increased price would result in benefit to the American producer?

Mr. VANCE. Not until there is such a thing as an American producer. But whenever he comes into operation with this exclusive and prohibitory tariff put upon the foreign article, then he will begin to put the money into his pocket.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am quite willing to say to the Senator that so far as I am concerned, and speaking for myself alone, I will agree that the average effect of a protective tariff is to increase the price of protected goods to the American purchaser.

Mr. VANCE. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. ALDRICH. If it were not so, a protective tariff would not be protective.

Mr. VANCE. I hope the Reporter will get that down.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope he will, exactly as I have said it, and I have no doubt he will.

Mr. DAWES. I will suggest to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] one consideration when he inquires who will pay this duty at once. He is well satisfied that by and by the article will become cheaper, but the struggle is apparently in the mind of the Senator from North Carolina to make out that at first the consumer of the tin-plate will pay that duty.

Mr. President, that will depend upon another thing, and that is whether the foreign producer struggles to keep the American market. If he desires to run a race with the American producer and see which will keep this market, he will pay the duty in order to get into the market and compete with the American producer. So it is by no means certain that the moment the duty is imposed it will be added to the price to the consumer. That will depend altogether upon the conclusion of the foreign producer, whether under these circumstances, which are a disadvantage to the foreigner and an advantage to the American, it is worth while for him to contend for this market.

Mr. VANCE. Will the Senator answer me a question if I put it to him?

Mr. DAWES. If I can.

Mr. VANCE. I hope you can, because there is a good deal of meat in it. The question is this: The proposed duty on tin-plates is about 100 per cent. of the value of the article. Does the Senator suppose that the foreigner will pay the duty of 100 per cent. and then make the American people a present of the article?

Mr. DAWES. No; I hope he will not.

Mr. VANCE. I hope he will. I am for that kind of a duty.

Mr. DAWES. I will answer the question. I hope he will give up at once and let the American market belong to the American producer, where it ought to belong. I hope he will give it up at once.

Mr. VANCE. Then it is the object of the Senator in voting for this high duty to force the foreigner to give it up.

Mr. DAWES. That is my object.

Mr. VANCE. So that the American consumer will be at the tender mercies of American manufacturers of tin-plates.

Mr. DAWES. I will answer the Senator further, so that there can be no mistake between him and me.

I had rather the American consumer should be turned over to the tender mercies of the American producer than to the tender mercies of the foreign producer, and so far as I can understand every feature of legislation that it is possible for me to infuse into this tariff, it shall have that result. It is emancipation of American labor and American production from domination by foreign labor and foreign production that I am seeking.

Mr. VANCE. And submission to an American trust. That is the domination.

Mr. DAWES. Between an American trust and a foreign trust I have no hesitation.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. President, we have heard so often that one of the prime purposes of the protective tariff was to protect the American consumers against the high prices charged by the foreigners that I take considerable pleasure in presenting to the Senate some statistics furnished by Mr. Swank in this very connection.

I have heard the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] again and again assert on this floor that the purpose of a protective tariff was to decrease the cost of articles to our consumers; but when the question was asked him some days since if there was not also a reduction abroad in the prices of articles consumed in this country, he replied that it was very often the case that it was, and the reduction was forced by American competition—that these prices came down by reason of the manufactures that we built up here by our protective system.

Mr. DAWES. I did not say so.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I so understood the Senator.

Mr. DAWES. I did not say we brought it down. I said the foreigner brought it down in order to bring his goods into our market.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I understood the Senator to say that the foreigner brought it down on account of American competition; that the building up of American industries compelled the foreigner to reduce his price.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator mistakes me. The Senator refuses to understand plain English. I said that the foreigner finding that the American market being at the disposal of the Americans brought down the price, that that induced him to bring his price down in order to compete here with us.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. That is in effect what I stated that the Senator had said. I was satisfied that when he came to think of it that he would say so.

I wish now to call attention to the fact that there have been reductions in this article of tin-plate when there have been no American industries to compel the foreign producers to reduce their price. The statement submitted by Mr. Swank was that in 1871 there were imported into the United States 82,969 gross tons; that their value was $9,946,373. There was an increase of the importation, with an increase also in value, but the latter much smaller in proportion than the increase in the amount of importation—I will not detain the Senate by reading the entire table, though I will put it in the RECORD—until 1887, when there were imported into this country 283,836 tons at a cost of $18,699,145—about five times as much of importation at about twice the cost. This is the table:

Years.	Gross tons.	Values.	Years.	Gross tons.	Values.
1871	82,969	$9,946,373	1880	158,049	$16,478,110
1872	85,629	13,893,450	1881	183,005	14,886,907
1873	97,177	14,240,868	1882	213,987	17,975,161
1874	79,778	13,057,658	1883	221,233	18,156,773
1875	91,054	12,098,885	1884	216,181	16,858,650
1876	89,946	9,416,816	1885	228,596	15,991,152
1877	112,479	10,679,028	1886	257,822	17,504,976

So you have had tin-plates reduced without an American industry to bring the price down, when we get our entire supplies from abroad. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that there has been a great decrease in the value of this article, which has not been brought about by any American protective tariff, and I want other Senators who are constantly pointing us to the fact that there have been decreases in the prices of goods that have been protected and who always claim that protection brings about these results, that there are some things which may be reduced in price without a protective tariff.

Mr. DAWES. Did the Senator from Arkansas understand me to say that every reduction of price in everything was brought about by the reduction of the price on particular things in the United States; that that was the result of the tariff? There is no doubt that there are a great many reasons which combine to reduce prices abroad, and a great many reasons combine to reduce prices here; but where an article is not produced at all in this country, of course the reduction of price abroad is not affected for that reason, and I do not think the Senator understood me to say that the price of an article that was not produced in this country was lessened abroad because it was produced in this country. I did not make myself so absurd as that.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Not at all.

Mr. DAWES. I know that the price of tin-plate abroad has been diminished from time to time as other things have, and I know that the price of articles that are produced in this country has been reduced from other considerations not imputable entirely to the effect of a tariff. There are other reasons which combine with the condition of the American market to make it necessary for a foreigner to reduce his price. The fact that the American market has brought them down is an element that compels him to bring his own down if he comes near our market. But any man who undertakes to ascribe the reduction of prices to one thing, to one element, to one cause, does not do justice to himself any more than he does to the very industry he is discussing.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. If I may be permitted to resume, I will state once more that it has been again and again claimed on that side of the Chamber, whenever there was a reduction in the price of any particular article foreign or domestic, that this reduction has been caused by protection; and while you have not said in distinct terms that all the reduction comes from the protective tariff, you have in effect so said, and you have often given us to understand that there is hardly a single blessing known to American citizens that has not come from protection, and you have even claimed that it has gone to the extent of creating a commercial Elysium in some sections of this Union.

I simply call attention to this article of tin-plates to show that it was possible, while it might have escaped the attention of the Senators on the other side, that there should be a reduction in the price of an article of necessity which did not result from a protective tariff. That is one instance. That was the purpose I had in view in calling the attention of the Senator to it.

There is one other thing that I wish to mention. Ever since I have been in Congress, before every committee that I have ever known anything about investigating this question, the statement has been made that by the erroneous ruling of Mr. Fessenden the tin-plate business had been construed out of existence. It was characterized by one of the witnesses before the committee at this session as being "the most inexcusable and costly decision on record."

There are some things in the history of this matter to which I want to call the attention of the Senate. In 1846 it was provided that tin-plate should be taxed 15 per cent., and this was the language used in the bill:

Terne-plates, tin in plates, tin-plates galvanized, not otherwise provided for, 15 per cent. ad valorem.

The tariff of 1857 referred to the schedules of the tariff of 1846, and by naming the schedule fixed the tariff on tin-plates at 10 per cent.

On page 181 of volume 12 of the Statutes at Large we find in the tariff law of 1861 the following words:

Tin-plate galvanized, galvanized iron coated with zinc, 2 cents a pound.

On page 188 of the same book and in the same act we find the following:

Tin-plates in sheets, terne tin in plates and sheets, 10 per cent. ad valorem.

So you see there was a distinction in the act of 1861 between the item of "tin-plates galvanized and galvanized iron" and the item of "tin-plates, terne-plates, and taggers' tin," and in 1862 the same difference was preserved in pretty near the same language.

In 1864, when the tariff law was enacted which the advocates of this tariff have been fond of saying was misconstrued by Mr. Fessenden, the following language was used. This act made no reference specifically to tin-plates, terne-plates, and taggers' tin, as had been uniformly the rule up to that time. It did not repeat that language, but it repeated the precise language of the other section, leaving out the single word "galvanized," and I want to call the attention of Senators particularly to the structure of this clause. On page 204, volume 15, Statutes at Large, we read:

On tin-plates and iron galvanized or coated with any metal by electrical batteries or otherwise, 2½ cents a pound.

That is precisely the language that appears in the act of 1862 in describing an article well known, except that the word "galvanized" is left out in one place. When that bill was passed with that provision in it it was immediately claimed by those who were advocating an increase of the tax upon this article of universal consumption, of absolute necessity, that this clause was intended to embrace tin-plates, terne-plates, and taggers' tin. Mr. Fessenden held otherwise, and the wails that have come up from these people who claim to have been wronged and outraged by that ruling of his have been heard by every committee that has investigated this question from then until now; but in the tariff bill of 1874 and in the succeeding tariff bills the distinction between tin-plate galvanized, etc., and tin-plate, terne-plate, and taggers' tin was made, as it was in 1861. On page 233 of the seventeenth volume of the Statutes at Large we find—

On tin in plates or sheets, terne, and taggers' iron, 15 per cent. ad valorem; on iron and tin-plates galvanized or coated with any metal by electrical batteries or otherwise, 2 cents per pound.

Showing that the uniform, unvarying practice of Congress has been in every instance, except in the enactment of the tariff of 1864, to make a distinction between these two articles and to impose different taxes upon them.

Now, it does look very much as if somebody had devised that clause in the tariff of 1864 to increase the tax on tin-plates more than 200 per cent. covertly—by a fraud—without the knowledge or consent of Congress or of anybody except the authors of the scheme. I have looked at the record on the passage of that bill and I find no reference made to the marvelous change that would be effected in this tariff on tin-plates by the adroit omission of a single word. I believe Mr. Fessenden carried out the spirit of the law and the intention of Congress. I believe he acted wisely in refusing to allow these people to levy additional taxes upon the consumers of the country. I know that his action has been ratified by Congress since, and, as I read this morning, no less a personage than the venerable and distinguished father of the tariff himself, in 1883, when this matter was under consideration, took strong ground in favor of not increasing this tariff.

In 1875, when the tax was first changed from an ad valorem to a specific tax, it was made 1.1 cents a pound, when the ad valorem at that time was not over three-fourths of a cent. Yet by reason of making it a specific tax you have increased the real rate of taxation steadily from then until now. Up to that time the rate had never been above 25 per cent., and had generally been 10 or 15 per cent., but by the cunning imposition of a specific tax you have increased the rate now to more than 30 per cent., and now you propose to carry out openly what was attempted in 1864, as I believe, by a fraud.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to modify the amendment I offered, or to amend it in line 21 of the printed amendment, after the words "than the," by inserting the following words:

Rates imposed by the preceding paragraph upon the.

And by inserting the same words, in line 29, after the words "than the."

These amendments are really to make certain what the intent of the original amendment now is, and do not change in any way the sense. I ask that they may be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated from the desk.

The SECRETARY. In the amended paragraph 145, line 21, after the words "than the," it is proposed to insert "rates imposed by the preceding paragraph upon the;" and in line 29, after the words "than the." to insert "rates imposed by the preceding paragraph upon the."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I will move in a moment or two that the Senate adjourn, but I want to call the attention of Senators to the fact that we have a great many very important amendments still pending to this bill where opportunity ought fairly be given to discuss them. I do not wish to reflect upon any speeches that have been made to-day, but if we occupy much more time in general debate as to whether the prices are advanced or reduced, or whether the general system of protection is wise or otherwise, I fear we shall not have time enough left for the discussion of these questions between now and the 22d of January, when the final vote is to be taken. Therefore I wish to consult the convenience of Senators whether or not we should not begin our session to-morrow at 11 o'clock. Of course I know that I can not carry that motion now at this late hour, unless it is with the general consent of the Senate. I therefore ask the consent of the Senate that when we adjourn to-day it shall be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. I wish the Senator would change that notice so as to make it Friday instead of to-morrow. I have an important committee meeting called for to-morrow morning at half past 10 o'clock.

Mr. ALLISON. If it will not suit the convenience of Senators, I shall not press the matter for to-morrow.

INTEROCEANIC CANAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying communication, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have the honor to lay before you a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying correspondence, in relation to the possible disturbances on the Isthmus of Panama, in the event of the stoppage of work on the proposed interoceanic canal.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, introduced a bill (S. 3830) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Choctaw Coal and Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory and for other purposes," approved February 18, 1888; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. REAGAN introduced a bill (S. 3831) for the relief of R. C. Oglesby; which was read twice by it title.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask leave to refer the two papers inclosed in the bill with it to the Committee on Claims, in order that they may have the information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PUGH in the chair). The bill will be referred to the Committee on Claims, with the accompanying papers.

Mr. EVARTS introduced a bill (S. 3832) granting a pension to Mary Hamilton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. HOAR. I waive any objection on my part to the motion suggested by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. VEST. Let it not begin until Friday.

Mr. ALLISON. I will ask unanimous consent that on Friday and Saturday we meet at 11 o'clock instead of 12, so that we may be able to go on with the paragraphs that have not been considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that on Friday and Saturday of this week the hour of daily meeting shall be 11 o'clock a. m. instead of 12 o'clock m.

Mr. ALLISON. I will add Monday and Tuesday next also.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And Monday and Tuesday of the week following, that the daily hour of meeting of the Senate upon the four days named shall be 11 o'clock a. m. instead of 12 o'clock m. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 17, 1889, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 16, 1889.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SAMOAN ISLANDS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress:

On the 2d day of April, 1888, I transmitted to the House of Representatives, in response to a resolution passed by that body, a report from the Secretary of State relating to the condition of affairs in the Samoan Islands, together with numerous letters, dispatches, and documents connected with the subject, which gave a history of all disorders in that locality up to that date.

On the 21st day of December, 1888, this information was supplemented by the transmission to the Congress of such further correspondence and documents as extended this history to that time.

I now submit a report from the Secretary of State, with later correspondence and dispatches, exhibiting the progress of the disturbances in Samoa up to the present date.

The information thus laid before the Congress is of much importance, since it has relation to the preservation of American interests and the protection of American citizens and their property in a distant locality and under an unstable and unsatisfactory government.

In the midst of the disturbances which have arisen at Samoa, such powers have been exercised as seemed to be within executive control under our Constitution and laws, and which appear to accord with our national policy and traditions, to restore tranquility and secure the safety of our citizens.

Through negotiation and agreement with Great Britain and Germany, which, with our own Government, constitute the treaty powers interested in Samoan peace and quiet, the attempt has been made to define more clearly the part which these powers should assume in the government of that country, while at the same time its autonomy has been insisted upon.

These negotiations were at one time interrupted by such action on the part of the German Government as appeared to be inconsistent with their further continuance.

Germany, however, still asserts, as from the first she has done, that she has no desire or intention to overturn the native Samoan Government or to ignore our treaty rights, and she still invites our Government to join her in restoring peace and quiet. But thus far her propositions on this subject seem to lead to such a preponderance of German power in Samoa as was never contemplated by us, and is inconsistent with every prior agreement or understanding, while her recent conduct as between native warring factions gives rise to the suspicion that she is not content with a neutral position.

Acting within the restraints which our Constitution and laws have placed upon executive power, I have insisted that the autonomy and independence of Samoa should be scrupulously preserved according to the treaties made with Samoa by the powers named and their agreements and understanding with each other. I have protested against every act apparently tending in an opposite direction, and during the existence of internal disturbance one or more vessels of war have been kept in Samoan waters to protect American citizens and property.

These things will abundantly appear from the correspondence and papers which have been submitted to the Congress.

A recent collision between the forces from a German man-of-war stationed in Samoan waters and a body of natives rendered the situation so delicate and critical that the war-ship Trenton, under the immediate command of Admiral Kimberly, was ordered to join the Nipsic already at Samoa, for the better protection of the persons and property of our citizens and in furtherance of efforts to restore order and safety.

The attention of the Congress is especially called to the instructions given to Admiral Kimberly, dated on the 11th instant, and the letter of the Secretary of State to the German minister, dated the 12th instant, which will be found among the papers herewith submitted.

By means of the papers and documents heretofore submitted and those which accompany this communication, the precise situation of affairs in Samoa is laid before the Congress, and such executive action as has been taken is fully exhibited.

The views of the Executive in respect of the just policy to be pursued with regard to this group of islands which lie in the direct highway of a growing and important commerce between Australia and the United States, have found expression in the correspondence and documents which have thus been fully communicated to the Congress; and the subject in its present stage is submitted to the wider discretion conferred by the Constitution upon the legislative branch of the Government.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

SCHOONER AMANDA TOMPKINS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of an appropriation to pay the owners of the schooner Amanda Tompkins for injuries sustained by collision with the United States steamer Nina; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

TENURE OF OFFICE, ETC., OF APPRAISERS.

ROCK ISLAND BRIDGE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting an estimate of an additional appropriation for prosecution and operation of the Rock Island bridge for the current fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYÉS IN NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a report of the names and salaries of the employés in that Department, and stating that their services are indispensable; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, and ordered to be printed.

ECKINGTON AND SOLDIERS' HOME RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a report of the president of the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railroad Company, submitted in compliance with the requirements of its charter; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BUNNELL, by unanimous consent, obtained indefinite leave of absence on account of private business.

EMPLOYÉS IN POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ANDERSON], on behalf of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, asks that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11819) for the relief of employés and late employés in the Post-Office Department, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

PROVINCIAL MONASTERY OF THE GOOD SHEPHERD, NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL], on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations, asks that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6318) for the relief of the Provincial Monastery of the Good Shepherd, East Ninetieth street, New York City, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Claims. If there be no objection that order will be made.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

EXCAVATION OF SHIP-CHANNEL, NEW YORK HARBOR.

Mr. DUNN. I am directed by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to report back two resolutions of inquiry, which were reported at the last session, but were then objected to on account of the absence of a quorum.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, August 6, 1888.

Mr. BUCHANAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries:

"Whereas one Joseph Cumings has a contract from the War Department for the excavation of 800,000 cubic yards of material from the main ship-channel in New York Harbor, and has chartered for use in filling such contract the English steam-ship State of Alabama, a vessel built in 1873 at Glasgow, Scotland, to run between that port and New Orleans, which vessel is now being fitted out at the Erie basin with a new dredging machine owned by an English syndicate; and

"Whereas it appears by the following letter that the said steam-ship has been allowed to be imported free of duty for that purpose:

"'TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., June 2.

"'SIR: The Department is in receipt of a letter from the Secretary of War, in which, upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, he requests that Joseph Cumings, who has a contract under the War Department to deliver 800,- 000 cubic yards of material from the main ship-channel in New York Harbor, may be permitted to import to our port without payment of duty thereon and use for the purpose of fulfilling this contract a large foreign vessel adapted for the necessary powerful machinery. It is represented that no domestic vessel of sufficient strength and capacity can be obtained for the purpose mentioned and that it is of the utmost importance that the work be completed prior to the 1st of December next, or during the present working season, which can only be done by the use of said foreign vessel. The Chief of Engineers states that the vessel referred to is to be used solely for the purpose of carrying out said contract, and that she will not engage in any way in the coastwise trade. Under the circumssances you are authorized to comply with the request of the Secretary of War.

"'C. S. FAIRCHILD,
"'Secretary of the Treasury.

"'COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS, New York.'

"And whereas it is alleged that domestic vessels of sufficient strength and capacity could have been obtained for that purpose and were ready to be chartered: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested and directed to transmit to this House copies of all correspondence, orders, and decisions in his Department relating to said matter."

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Add to the resolution the words, "together with his reasons for such action."

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. DUNN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. I ask now for the reading of the other resolution and proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BUCHANAN submitted the following preamble and resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries:

"Whereas it appears by a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the collector of customs at the port of New York, dated June 2d instant, that the said Secretary is in receipt of a letter from the Secretary of War in which, upon recommendatoin of the Chief of Engineers, he requests that Joseph Cumings, who has a contract under the War Department to deliver 800,000 cubic yards of material from the main ship-channel in New York Harbor, may be permitted to import through our ports without payment of duty thereon and use for the purpose of fulfilling this contract a large foreign vessel adapted for the necessary powerful machinery; and

"Whereas upon receipt of said letter from the Secretary of War the said Secretary of the Treasury instructed the said collector as follows: "Under the circumstances you are authorized to comply with the request of the Secretary of War;" and it is alleged that under the said instructions the steam-ship State of Alabama, built at Glasgow in 1873, has been so entered and is being fitted up at Erie basin, in the city of Brooklyn, N. Y., with machinery owned by an English syndicate, for such work: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to this House copies of said recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, of his said letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, and of all correspondence on file in his Department relating to said matter."

The amendment reported by the committee is as follows:

Add to the end of the resolution the following:
"Together with his reasons for such action."

The amendment of the committee was agreed to, and the resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. DUNN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ABBOTT was recognized.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw his demand for the regular order until I can submit a request for unanimous consent from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield to me for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois can not yield for that purpose; he must withdraw the demand for the regular order.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw his demand for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. If the demand for the regular order is withdrawn the Chair will have to submit the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ABBOTT], who has already been recognized.

Mr. BLOUNT. I merely ask the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw his demand for the regular order so I may submit a request to the House on the part of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

FILING OF REPORTS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask, by unanimous consent, that all members having reports to submit from the several committees of the House may file them.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

FORT BROWN MILITARY RESERVATION.

MARY A. LONG.

Mr. HUNTER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11993) granting a pension to Mary A. Long; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARTIN KEATING.

Mr. LAWLER, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11724) for the relief of Martin Keating; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to withdraw his demand for the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. For a moment only.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the regular order having been withdrawn, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ABBOTT].

Mr. BLOUNT. I understood the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw his demand for the regular order at my request.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ABBOTT] had been recognized, and was on the floor when the demand for the regular order cut him off.

PUBLIC BUILDING, FORT WORTH, TEX.

Mr. ABBOTT. I ask, by unanimous consent, to call up for present consideration the bill (S. 1974) for the erection of a public building at Fort Worth, Tex.

The SPEAKER. The bill and report will be read subject to objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I demand the regular order of business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire the floor only for a moment, to submit a request on the part of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] demands the regular order of business, and the Chair has no discretion in the matter.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am not complaining of the Chair, but merely ask that the demand for the regular order may be withdrawn until I can submit my request.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I object to the bill which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ABBOTT] asked unanimous consent to call up for present consideration, and then will withdraw the demand for the regular order of business.

CLERKS IN FIRST AND SECOND CLASS OFFICES.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to make to the House a request at the instance of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and it is that that committee be allowed to report in the Post-Office appropriation bill legislation providing for the classification of clerks in first and second class offices. It has been recommended by the President and by Postmasters-General from time to time, and the only reason the matter has not been disposed of has been the difficulty under the rules of the House of reaching the matter. I hope there will be no objection to my request, so that the matter may be brought before the House for disposition.

Mr. BURROWS. To be considered in order.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is all. I merely ask that it may be brought before the House for consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TAULBEE. I shall have to raise the point of order against the proposition if it is to bring these clerks under the provisions of the civil service.

Mr. BLOUNT. It has no relation to the civil service.

Mr. TAULBEE. I would like to hear, then, exactly what is the object of the proposition.

Mr. BLOUNT. The object of it is simply this: The gentleman from Kentucky is aware that the clerks in the Post-Office Department have their salaries fixed. He is also aware that the letter-carriers have their salaries fixed by law. The postal clerks also have their salaries fixed by law, but so far as the first and second class offices are concerned the clerks therein have their salaries fixed, not by law, but regulated by the chief of the salary and allowance division in the Post-Office Department. The proposition we ask to bring before the House for consideration is in relation to that matter.

Mr. TAULBEE. That is the object of the provision, then.

Mr. BLOUNT. The object is to fix the salaries of these clerks in first and second class offices.

Mr. TAULBEE. I am for it. I do not object to that. I thought it was a proposition to classify them within the civil service.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire whether the object of this request is to classify in the same manner as in the Department, or to increase or diminish the salaries of the employés?

Mr. BLOUNT. No, sir; not to increase, but simply to classify them. So far as the details are concerned, whether the salaries shall be higher or ower, is a matter for the House to determine.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to know whether my friend proposes in any respect to increase these salaries or the grade of the employés in the branches of the Department to which he refers?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the classification proposed carry any particular rate of salary?

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, that is just the very object, to fix the salary and to limit the power of the head of the bureau in the matter.

Mr. CUTCHEON. But will not this allowance of salaries have to be paid as heretofore, through the Department?

The SPEAKER. This is not debatable.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to ask the gentleman from Georgia if a bill has been reported heretofore to the same effect as he now proposes from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads?

Mr. BLOUNT. Oh, yes, I think on several occasions.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But I mean during the present Congress.

Mr. BLOUNT. Not during the present Congress, for the reason that there were certain elements then wanting to enable us to reach a proper conclusion, which have since been supplied by the Postmaster-General, and hence are not wanting to-day.

Mr. MCMILLIN. What is the objection to letting the provision be brought in when the bill is before the House, without asking us beforehand, and without our knowing what the provision is, to make an exception to the general rules of the House which have proved so salutary in the past?

Mr. BLOUNT. I will say to my friend from Tennessee that if it is brought in outside of the Post-Office appropriation bill, the gentleman himself will readily understand that the chances are not one in a hundred of ever reaching the bill.

Mr. COX. That is so.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But what I mean is, why not go along until you reach the consideration of the bill, then submit your proposition and ask unanimous consent when the bill is being considered to let the amendment come in, notwithstanding the rules which would prohibit the consideration of the subject?

Mr. BLOUNT. Why, that would be absolutely futile work. I have no objection whatever to letting the House vote upon it, and accept or reject it, but it would certainly seem superfluous to go to work and prepare a bill on this subject, notwithstanding that it has the recommendation and indorsement of the President, the recommendations of the Department, and others interested in and familiar with the subject, when one single objection on the floor of the House would prevent the House from considering it.

Mr. ADAMS. But a single objection will do that now.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am only asking that the House will give consent that the committee may formulate the proposition in the bill, and then it will be for the House to determine whether it will accept the proposition or not.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But the gentleman ought to bring in his proposition first. The difficulty about his request is that I do not see why the House should bind itself beforehand to consider a proposition which is brought in in violation of the rules when it does not even understand what the proposition is. If the gentleman will state his proposition at the time that the bill is being considered, and if it commends itself to the sense of justice of the House, it would no doubt, as many other matters of the same kind have done heretofore, be considered by the House and no doubt agreed to. On the contrary, if the proposition is an objectionable one, it is too late, after the privilege is given in this manner—after the point of order is waived—to make objections which, under the present circumstances, would prevent the consideration of the matter.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, it is prefectly competent when the bill comes before the House to discuss it and vote it out if the House is unwilling to accept the proposition.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But the gentleman from Georgia knows that the power to vote out is often utterly useless, and that it can not be exercised here always in cases where it ought to be exercised.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to say to my friend that I appreciate his great desire for extreme care in legislation; and I also appreciate that rule which excludes certain legislation from appropriation bills. But there is not a member on this floor who does not feel at times the necessity for legislation for a great Department of the Government which is absolutely essential, but which can not be entered upon because of the stringent provision of the rule which makes no exception. This is a matter we believe to be essential. My friend certainly recognizes the difficulty that we have had in reference to the distribution of the mails by reason of defects in this very matter of legislation in regard to the clerical service of the Department. It has been urged for a great many years that such a change be made. It is not by any means a new question. My friend will see that hereafter, if it is fixed by law now, instead of a chief of division having to contest with every member on this floor as to the salary of each employé throughout the first and second class offices in the United States, when you shall ascertain his salary by law as you have done in relation to the postal clerks, letter-carriers, and clerks in the various Departments, that there is but little to surprise the House with in the matter which will come from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. That is all there is of it, simply to fix the salaries ourselves and take the right of fixing them from the chief of division. Let them be ascertained and fixed by law, as the salaries of other employés are fixed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again state that this subject is not debatable. If any gentleman objects to the request of the gentleman from Georgia the matter is not before the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, the matter is of such importance that I hope the Chair will permit a brief effort to satisfy gentlemen.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to understand from him——

Mr. MCRAE. I demand the regular order.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman will not do that.

Mr. BINGHAM. Give us a minute longer.

Mr. MCRAE. I do not object to the request of the gentleman from Georgia, but I do object to further debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated that the matter is not debatable. If any gentleman objects the question is disposed of.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ascertain from my friend from Georgia to what extent he proposes to increase the aggregate appropriations for clerical service for first and second class post-offices?

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, that is a matter difficult of ascertainment. So far as the allowance for clerk-hire goes now, the salaries are fixed by the chief of the division.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know; but you make the appropriation for clerical hire in gross, do you not?

Mr. DUNN. To be distributed according to the favoritism of the chiefs of divisions in the Department, instead of by law, as it should be.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is true.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do you propose to diminish the amount appropriated for the coming year?

Mr. BLOUNT. I can not say whether it will increase or diminish the allowance for clerk-hire, because that is dependent upon the arbitrary action of a chief of division, and I do not know sufficient about the details of the Department to know whether it increases or diminishes the appropriation.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. There is so much confusion that we can not hear what is before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has submitted a request for unanimous consent, and the Chair is endeavoring to ascertain whether there is objection. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from New Mexico is entitled to the floor for thirty minutes.

Mr. JOSEPH rose.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, was leave given to file reports in accordance with the request made a few moments ago?

The SPEAKER. It was.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to state, without any arrangement having been made as to the closing of the debate, that I desire to move the previous question not later than half past 2 o'clock to-day.

Mr. STRUBLE. I do not think that will give time enough for this side.

Mr. SPRINGER. We will endeavor to accommodate everybody.

Mr. BURROWS. Let the debate run on.

Mr. JOSEPH. Mr. Speaker, New Mexico, the oldest Territory now in the Union, has joined hands with her giant sister Territories, Dakota, Montana, and Washington, and for the fourth time in her political history she is again knocking at the doors of Congress for admission into the sisterhood of States on an equal footing with the States that now compose this grand Republic. New Mexico, in my opinion, has stronger claims for admission at this time than the other Territories included in this bill under consideration, in the line of treaty obligations under which she was ceded and annexed to the United States, and by virtue of which this nation's honor is pledged to her admission as a State.

In 1530, but thirty-eight years after Columbus first beheld the shores of America, an intrepid Spanish voyager, Cabeça de Vaca by name, found his way into the valley of the upper Rio Grande. He was the first European to visit New Mexico. Stimulated by the accounts which he brought of the wonderful fertility of the country and the prosperity of its native inhabitants, and aroused partly by that spirit of adventure which then animated the entire Spanish nation and partly by that eager zeal for the salvation of souls which possessed the Christian church, various other expeditions during the next sixty years explored this new country, and each brought back more wonderful accounts of the dwellings of the inhabitants, of the abundance of precious metals, of the fertility of the soil, and of a genial day where the kindly sun was never obscured by clouds.

In 1591, Don Juan de Oñate, an influential Mexican, descended from the first Spanish explorers of that country, organized an expedition partly of soldiers, partly of friars, and partly of colonists, who passed through Northern Mexico, reached the Rio Grande, and traveled up that river until near the present border of the State of Colorado. Choosing a site upon the banks of the Rio Grande, surrounded by a country of great fertility, attracted by its convenience of access, its beautiful prospect, and its wonderful climate, a place long before chosen by the Indians for one of their pueblos, at a date about fifteen years before the settlement of Jamestown, and more than twenty-five years before the Pilgrim Fathers landed at Plymouth Rock, they founded the city of Santa Fé, the earliest permanent European settlement and seat of government within the present borders of the United States.

This ancient seat of civilization and Christianity in America has remained for over three hundred years the political center of New Mexico.

New Mexico continued a Spanish possession until Mexico declared its independence of the Spanish crown in 1821, when it became a part of the Republic of Mexico, entitled to representation in the Mexican Congress, and other privileges of statehood. In the year 1822 the first public schools were established in New Mexico, and from time to time their number and efficiency were increased. The first newspaper printed on the continent west of the Mississippi River—El Crepusculo (The Dawn)—was published, in 1835, at Taos, N. Mex., by Padre Martinez.

With the American occupation under Col. S. W. Kearny in 1846, and the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo of February 2, 1848, New Mexico became a part of the United States of America. At that time the people of New Mexico believed that they were entitled under the provisions of the treaty and the inducements held out to them to be admitted into the Union as a State. Accordingly, on the 20th of June, 1850, a State constitution (prohibiting slavery) was adopted by New Mexico and subsequently submitted to Congress. An election was held under this constitution. Henry Connelly was elected governor and William S. Meservy Representative in Congress; the Legislature, under the constitution, chose R. H. Weightman and F. A. Cunningham as Senators to represent the new State. This Representative and these Senators appeared and demanded admission for the State under its constitution, but their prayer was denied, and Mr. Meservy, elected as a Member of Congress, was admitted to the House as a Delegate.

Much disappointment was felt by the people of New Mexico at this action of Congress, but this in no manner abated their allegiance to their new Government. Such was their feeling of attachment that at the outbreak of the war, only thirteen years after the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, the people of New Mexico rallied to the support of the national flag and furnished more troops to the Federal Government than all the then existing Territories combined, including the present States of Nebraska, Nevada, and Colorado. No stronger answer than this can be given to the charges that the native people of New Mexico are foreign in spirit or lacking in devotion to the United States.

In the year 1874 a bill was presented to the Forty-third Congress for the admission of New Mexico as a State. An extended debate occurred in the House of Representatives (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 2, part 5, pages 4129 to 4138, and part 6, Appendix, pages 295 to 302), and the chief argument which the opponents of the bill could then advance, headed by the distinguished member from New York, Hon. Clarkson N. Potter, now deceased, was that the constitutional representation in the Senate was greater than should be possessed by a new State. At that time the population of New Mexico was but 110,000, as compared with over 175,000 at the present date, while hundreds of miles of railroad now existing, which render intercourse easy between the different sections of the Territory and invite immigration, had not then been built.

This bill passed the House by a three-fourths majority—160 to 54. Among the votes cast in favor of the bill were those of the following members of the present House: Hon. R. R. BUTLER, Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON, Hon. ALFRED C. HARMER, Hon. ROGER Q. MILLS, Hon. CHARLES O'NEILL, and Hon. DAVID WILBER. There were also then recorded in favor of the bill the following distinguished members of the House who now occupy seats in the Senate: Hon. HENRY L. DAWES, Hon. CHARLES B. FARWELL, Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE, and Hon. PHILETUS SAWYER. Among other distinguished gentlemen who have since then passed out of both Houses of Congress, who then voted for the admission of New Mexico, are the late President Garfield; the distinguished Interstate Commerce Commissioner, Hon William R. Morrison; that distinguished Republican from Iowa who has since represented his country abroad with great credit, the Hon. John A. Kasson; together with Hon. O. D. Conger, of Michigan, afterwards Senator; Hon. Charles E. Foster, of Ohio; and Hon. William Lawrence, of the same State. All of those whose names are mentioned, excepting Representative MILLS and Commissioner Morrison, were members of the Republican party. Certainly that party, urged on by such leaders, can not now fail to include New Mexico among the Territories to be admitted into the Union.

In the Senate the bill met a like reception (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 3, pages 1691, 1692). After a debate in which very little opposition was developed to the admission of the Territory, the Senate passed the bill by a vote of 32 to 11. Among the Senators now holding seats in that body who voted for the bill are Senators ALLISON, INGALLS, MITCHELL, and STEWART, while other no less distinguished Republicans who are no longer in the Senate were recorded in favor of the bill, among them being Hon. George S. Boutwell, of Massachusetts, Hon. Simon Cameron, of Pennsylvania, Hon. Hannibal Hamlin, of Maine, Hon. John A. Logan, of Illinois, and Hon. William Windom, of Minnesota. It is certainly to be supposed that if three-fourths of both Houses of Congress at that time were in favor of the admission of New Mexico the vote at the present time should be practically unanimous. Certainly none of the distinguished gentlemen whose names are mentioned and who are still in either House of Congress, can fail not only to vote for, but also to advocate vigorously, the admission of New Mexico. The passage of the bill by the Senate was at so late a day that the two Houses were unable to agree upon points of detail about which differences existed and the bill failed to become a law before the adjournment of that Congress. But for the accidents of legislation New Mexico would now be a State.

In the Forty-fourth Congress the Senate again passed a bill to admit New Mexico as a State, by a vote of 35 to 15, among those voting for the bill being the following distinguished Senators who still occupy seats in that body: Messrs. INGALLS, JONES, of Nevada, MITCHELL, PADDOCK, RANSOM, and SHERMAN (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 4, part 2, pages 1607 to 1617). This same bill was subsequently reported back to the House of Representatives by the Committee on Territories, but in the crowded condition of public business in the House it failed to receive consideration or become a law.

Had the House considered it there can be no doubt that New Mexico would have entered the Union as a State at that time. How strongly do the votes of these distinguished leaders of the Republican party refute the slanderous report of the minority of the Committee on Territories of the present House.

The right of New Mexico to admission as a State thus practically admitted both in 1874 and 1876, upon what ground, I ask, can it now be denied after a great increase in population and material development? I have sought with great diligence to ascertain the objections urged by the opponents of admission. I have read editorials from some of the Eastern papers opposing admission, and have given careful attention to the minority report filed in the House. So far as I have been able to find, the objections urged are the result of gross ignorance of the people, the conditions, and the prospects of New Mexico. I am amazed that persons in responsible public positions should attempt to assert themselves in respect to matters as to which they have plainly made no reasonable inquiry. To read some of these accounts one would suppose that New Mexico was one vast Sahara, with scattered oases occupied solely by tribes of savages, and destined to be forever a desert without resources of any avail for human use.

First among these accusations is that the people of New Mexico are not only ignorant but are not desirous of learning, and that to their ignorance they add a willful disregard of law. It is undoubtedly true that the opportunities for education in a sparsely settled Territory can not be those afforded by a thickly inhabited State like Massachusetts, and in years past the advantages of a complete school system have necessarily not been open to New Mexico. But this state of affairs no longer exists. People to whom the best opportunities for education have been denied are often those most deeply interested in obtaining a greater measure of knowledge for their children than they themselves have been able to acquire. A special school tax is now assessed throughout the whole of the Territory, a compulsory school law exists, and public schools are held in sufficient numbers for every child of school age to attend. The people of the Territory are eager in availing themselves of the present opportunities. The daily demand is for a still greater expansion and development of the school system. The Lincoln County Leader of recent date voices this demand in these words:

> The coming session of the Legislature will give us a school law which will compare with any of the States. The people have demanded it from present necessity and assured development.

This sentiment is common to the whole Territory. There are no people in the United States more devoted to the public-school system and more determined that its advantages shall be spread among them than the people of New Mexico. Nothing will give greater impetus to this sentiment than the recognition by Congress of New Mexico as a State and the gift to its people of the well-earned right to exercise their share in the government of the United States.

Any assertion that the native citizens of New Mexico are characterized by a contempt or defiance for law betrays the grossest ignorance. Among all the people of this continent no more peaceful and law-abiding citizens can be found than these. Their regard for law is so great that the statistics show that 75 per cent. of the crime of the Territory is committed by wandering desperadoes from neighboring States and Territories.

Upon this point I again quote from the Lincoln County Leader of December 22, 1888:

> As to the character of the people, no subject has been so grossly misrepresented and so generally falsified. It is an outrage upon our people. We defy any one to name a community either North or South that is more law-abiding than our own White Oaks. With its public school with an attendance of 75 daily, our academy with over 25 pupils as a starter, the Young Men's Benevolent Association with a membership of 75, Knights of Pythias, Independent Order of Good Templars, a lodge soon to be of Ancient Order United Workmen, the Methodist Church about completed, and other religious denominations holding service, the Masonic fraternity building a hall, the Grand Army of the Republic strong and growing, with the auxiliary Woman's Relief Corps, it is the universal remark of strangers that White Oaks, morally, socially, and intellectually, is far ahead of many pretentious places. What is true of White Oaks is in a manner the case throughout Lincoln County, the largest of the Territory and settling very fast. The proportion of Mexicans to the whole number is overestimated by our outside chaps. Reliable estimates place the Mexicans about two-fifths of the whole in the Territory, while in White Oaks precinct, with over 270 voters at the last election, there were less than 20 Mexicans.
> We have among our Mexican fellow-citizens some as able and brilliant men as any community can boast of, and as a whole no class of people in this country have been so vilified as the Mexicans of New Mexico. The court statistics are our best guide. New Mexico, compared with Nebraska, to-day has less crime per capita.
> The objection to Catholic Spaniards should be no stronger than to Catholic Irish or Germans, Swedes, and Lutherans in the other Territories. In a word, the Mexicans of New Mexico, for the purposes of statehood, are in advance of the recent-arrived Swede of Dakota or the lawless elements of other nations in many sections of the country; when compared to a Southern State, far superior.

To the stranger in New Mexico, next after the industry of the citizens, their hospitality is notable. Their last crust is divided with the stranger—not equally, for the New Mexican takes the lesser portion. Whatever the native New Mexican possesses, that is free to his guests. In all their financial dealings they are open and honorable. In short, these descendants of that nation which discovered the New World and first brought it under European and Christian control, possess in a high degree all the qualities necessary to fulfilling the obligations of complete citizenship.

But the objection most frequently made to the admission of New Mexico is that her inhabitants are of a foreign race, alien to popular government, and unable to appreciate the blessings and advantages of the American Constitution. Such contention has no basis in fact, but even if it were true it is plain to my mind that the easiest mode to teach such people the proper method or exercising the duties of citizenship is to confer its privileges upon them. These privileges can not be forever denied without a violation of the treaty stipulations of this Government. Article IX of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo of February 2, 1848, contains the following promise in relation to the admission of the territory acquired under this treaty:

> Mexicans who, in the territory aforesaid, shall not preserve the character of citizens of the Mexican Republic, conformably with what is stipulated in the preceding article, shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and be admitted at the proper time (to be judged of by the Congress of the United States) to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States, according to the principles of the Constitution; and in the mean time shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property, and secured in the free exercise of their religion without restriction.

It is true that Congress reserved to itself the right to determine when the time should arrive for the admission of New Mexico as a State. But it is plain on the face of this provision that the people of New Mexico have a right to demand that that discretion should be exercised in good faith and that the circumstances under which the promise of ultimate admission was made should be considered in determining its propriety at any given time. When this stipulation was made it was perfectly well known to the framers of the treaty that the inhabitants of New Mexico were then Mexican citizens and spoke the Spanish language. All persons remaining in the Territory by so remaining renounced their Mexican allegiance, but can it be said that Congress can fairly oblige them to renounce their native language before entering as a State of the Union? Can it be believed that Mexico, while yielding this discretion to Congress, believed that, as a condition-precedent to the admission of New Mexico, it could properly be required that all its inhabitants should forswear the Spanish language? I can not think that any such condition is consistent with carrying out in good faith the promises of the treaty. To interpolate such a condition is a violation of the treaty obligations.

But even if such a condition is required it is now fully met. It may be that in a few remote districts of New Mexico some persons may be found who still have no knowledge of English, yet there is but a small proportion of native New Mexicans of Spanish descent now in the Territory who can not both speak and understand English freely, while practically all the younger generation who have recently attained to years of manhood speak and understand English as they do the Spanish of their forefathers. It can not be expected that the Spanish language will wholly disappear. A language is as much an integral part of a people as the contour of the face or the tint of the skin. It will remain for generations. Even in Wales many persons are yet to be found who can not make themselves understood in the English tongue. The devoted natives of that little country who have found homes in America cling so tenderly to that language, to us so harsh, yet to them the sweetest of all tongues, that they have in America two papers published wholly in the Welsh language. Yet in spite of this devotion to the ancestral tongue I have yet to hear it asserted that the subscribers to these Welsh papers in this country are any the less fitted for the duties of American citizenship, nor has it ever been contended that the members whom these devoted Welshmen send to represent them in the British Parliament are less fitted to legislate for the British Empire than the representatives of purely English-speaking constituencies. The Representatives upon this floor from the State of Louisiana can tell you that many of the most respected of their constituents still preserve in family use the French tongue as the means of communication between father and son, mother and daughter.

The honorable gentlemen upon this floor who represent the agricultural regions surrounding York and Lancaster, in the State of Pennsylvania, can tell you that that curious compound of German and English known as "Pennsylvania Dutch" still survives as a living language among their constituents, and that religious services are held, sermons preached, schools taught, and the laws printed in that language, and that many citizens of these localities who are as well qualified as any in the country to exercise the sovereign right of franchise conduct all their conversations and negotiations in that dialect and are none the less fitted for their duties. I doubt if anywhere in the Union can be found any more substantial class of citizens than these very men, and the State of Pennsylvania would sadly miss them if they should disappear.

A recent editorial in the New York Tribune thus states this objection to the admission of New Mexico:

> Its population is not American as we understand the word. The people are largely of Mexican descent and speak the Spanish language. A few years ago five-sixths of the schools were taught exclusively in that language, and in half the remainder Spanish and English divided the honors. In many essentials it is still a Mexican province. The average of intelligence is low.

The Las Vegas Daily Optic thus pointedly and fully answers this unwarranted position:

> In this article, which is one of the least abusive that we have seen, it will be noticed that figures are taken from the condition of New Mexico before the railroads had reached her borders. If such criticism had been applied to the much-vaunted Dakota, before railroads had been continued to that section, it is doubtful if she could have made even so good a showing as New Mexico is able to make, notwithstanding the fact that the figures are manipulated by her bitter partisan enemies. Then, too, on what ground does the Tribune assert that immigrants from Old Mexico are not desirable? On what ground does it put them as inferior to the Swedes, Hungarians, Poles, Italians, and foreigners of other nationalities by whom much of the Northwest Territories have been populated?

Then, too, suppose the people are largely of Mexican descent and speak the Spanish language, can the Tribune show that they are any the worse for that? Were they not the same at the time the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo was signed? Were they not then guarantied the rights and privileges of American citizens, and was there any stipulation that the most important of these rights, that of self-government, should be withheld until they learned to speak the English language?

Those who advocate the exclusion of New Mexico because the Spanish language is still spoken there by some of her citizens belittle the greatness of this country. The American Union is so extensive and the privileges of American citizenship so great that the one flag can wave above persons of all races and descent, and representatives of every population on the globe to-day are gladly embracing the opportunities afforded by a free Government and equal rights.

But in what just sense can even the Spanish-speaking citizens of New Mexico be classed as a foreign race? If their interests are not with the United States to whom do they hold allegiance? Not to Spain, for Mexico severed the bonds that bound her to the Spanish crown long years ago; not to Mexico, for it now approaches a half century since Mexico yielded to the United States all right and title to the Territory of New Mexico, and all feelings of obligation and allegiance have long since disappeared. The material ties are all with the United States. The great railroads now span New Mexico east and west, and every article of commerce produced in the Eastern States finds its way to these great arteries of travel into New Mexico, while the connection with Old Mexico is difficult and the commerce of but small importance.

It is difficult to see how objection can be made to the admission of New Mexico upon the ground that its inhabitants are of foreign allegiance and interests when no objection on that account is raised to the admission of the Territories of the Northwest. The census of 1880 furnishes information which places New Mexico in the highest rank of all the Territories of the United States in the proportion which its native-born inhabitants bear to their whole number. The following table, from the census of 1880, shows the proportion of native-born to foreign-born inhabitants in the Territories of Dakota, Montana, New Mexico, and Washington:

Territories.	Native.	Foreign.
Dakota	83,382	51,795
Montana	27,638	11,521
Washington	59,313	15,893

From this it will be seen that while the proportion of foreign to native born population is about 1 to 14 in New Mexico, it is 1 to 4 in Washington, 1 to 3 in Montana, and 2 to 3 in Dakota. The proportions have certainly not changed since 1880 to the disadvantage of New Mexico, for the Territories of the Northwest have received tremendous accessions from Norway and Sweden, as well as from Hungary, Poland, and Bohemia, while the most unfortunate class of Russians have been settled by thousands upon the broad plains of Dakota, and even now are loudly calling for substantial aid in their extreme necessity from our citizens of the East. The immigration into New Mexico in this period has been of the best class of farmers from States farther east, who have greatly aided in the progress of the Territory. Such has been the development that I do not hesitate to affirm that a knowledge of Spanish would not be half so essential in the remotest part of New Mexico as a knowledge of Scandinavian in many recently settled parts of Dakota.

Can it be said that a native of New Mexico, who renounced his allegiance to the Republic of Mexico over forty years ago, has less interest in the Government of the United States, less devotion to republican principles, or less fitness for full American citizenship than a subject of the European kingdoms who has within but a few years left his native home? The honorable and industrious inhabitants of New Mexico of Spanish descent are devoted to American principles, will ever uphold the American Constitution, and will continue to honor and support the American flag as the sign and symbol of that Government under whose authority they have so long lived. The mingling of the blood of the Spanish race with that of the Anglo-Saxon, such as is now taking place in New Mexico, can not fail to produce, as such mixtures always have done, wonderful results of the greatest benefit to humanity, and I do not hesitate to prophesy that before many years have elapsed, under the genial warmth of the sun which always shines upon New Mexico, aided by the material prosperity which is now pouring in upon her from the East, New Mexico will raise up to the glory and pride of our common country orators, poets, artists, and statesmen of the highest rank. I can not forbear quoting the eloquent dedication of the Historical Sketches of New Mexico, by Hon. L. Bradford Prince, as a fitting tribute to the people of the Territory:

To the people of New Mexico, threefold in origin and language, but now one in nationality, in purpose, and in destiny;

To the Pueblos, still representing in unchanged form the aboriginal civilization which built the cities and established the systems of government and social life which astonished the European discoverers nearly four centuries ago;

To the Mexicans, who, in generosity, hospitality, and chivalric feelings are worthy sons of the Conquistadores, who, with undaunted courage and matchless gallantry, carried the cross of Christianity and the flag of Spain to the end of the earth;

To the Americans, whose energy and enterprise are bringing all the appliances of modern science and invention to develop the almost limitless resources which nature has bestowed upon us;

To all, as New Mexicans, now unitedly engaged in advancing the prosperity and working for the magnificent future of the Territory, of which the author is proud to be a citizen—

These sketches of part of its earlier history are respectfully dedicated.

Upon what grounds does New Mexico assert her title to a position among the States of this Union? Any investigation of these will amply establish that in territory, in population, in natural resources, and in prospects for the future she is fully entitled to such a position. The area of New Mexico comprises 122,460 square miles, or nearly 80,000,000 acres. The area of New Mexico is three times as great as Ohio, and larger than all of New England, New York, New Jersey, and Delaware combined. The average elevation of the southern portion is 4,000 and of the northern portion more than 6,000 feet above the level of the sea, thus producing a mild and equable climate throughout the year.

The population by the census of 1880 was 119,565, this including 9,772 Indians, most of whom, being those dwelling in the ancient pueblos, are citizens of the United States and men of industrious and peaceful habits, well advanced towards civilization. No census of the Territory has been recently taken, but the present governor, in his report to the Secretary of the Interior for the year 1888, places the population at 175,000, an estimate which I deem erroneous, if at all, in the direction of too great moderation. I quote his remarks from his report:

POPULATION.

No census of the Territory having been taken since 1885, it is impossible to state definitely the increase in population since that date. From information I have been able to obtain upon careful inquiry in different quarters of the Territory, especially in the public-land sections, I am certain that the increase during the past year has been from 10,000 to 12,000. Fully one-quarter of this has been in the southeast, and largely from the State of Texas. The bureau of immigration has, during the past year, received many thousands of letters of inquiry from States eastward, mainly from the Mississippi Valley States, desiring information of New Mexico as to business chances, agricultural conditions, climate, opportunities for profitable investment, etc., which would indicate a growing interest in the Territory on the part of home-seekers, and the probability of a very considerable immigration in the near future. I deem it a safe estimate that the population of New Mexico is now about 175,000, exceeding by several thousand the number of people entitling it to admission to statehood.

The apportionment bill of February 2, 1872 (volume 17, Statutes at Large, page 28), provides that no State shall hereafter be admitted to the Union without the necessary population to entitle it to at least one Representative. This declaration, a permanent statement of the principles governing the admission of future States, carries with it, as a necessary converse, the proposition that any Territory is entitled to admission into the Union upon proof that it has reached such number. Under the last apportionment the ratio necessary for a Representative was 150,000, and it is beyond a doubt that New Mexico has far passed this mark. She therefore appears before you for admission, fulfilling the requirements of law, and demands admission as a right. At the last election for Delegate in Congress the total vote was 32,627.

This, it must be remembered, represents a larger number of inhabitants in New Mexico, where the polling places are widely scattered than in a more thickly settled vicinity. The Congressional Directory discloses the striking fact that more votes were cast at this election than were cast in electing Representatives to this Congress in two hundred and thirty-eight districts out of a total of three hundred and twenty-five. That is to say, the vote cast at the election of each of a two-thirds majority of the members of this Congress was less than the total vote cast at the last election for the Delegate from New Mexico. Less than one-third of the members of the present House hold their seats as the result of elections at which votes were cast in larger number than in New Mexico. Surely no member can object to the admission of New Mexico if the Delegate upon this floor from that Territory come here as the result of an election at which a greater number of votes were cast than in the election by which the Representative holds his seat. There is no ground for fear that the population of New Mexico may suffer any diminution. While New Mexico has not been the scene of such wonderful strides in population as some of the Territories of the Northwest, yet ever since she became a part of the United States her population has steadily and gradually grown greater. Since the railroads have entered the Territory this increase has been most marked.

The mineral resources of New Mexico are familiar to all who have any knowledge of the West. Gold and silver are found in large quantities, while enormous deposits of copper, which only await development to rival the copper mines of Lake Superior, are known to exist.

These mines were known to the Indians before the Spanish conquest. In her deposits of coal New Mexico stands easily pre-eminent. Not only are there immense fields of bituminous coal, but a pure anthracite, rivaling in its valuable qualities the famous anthracites of Pennsylvania, is found in such large quantities that with the further development of these mines New Mexico will doubtless stand to the West as Pennsylvania does to the East in furnishing the finest quality of fuel. In the northern part of the Territory, near the present Navajo Indian reservation, petroleum is found of the finest quality, and already Eastern capitalists have fixed their eye upon these fields, which give promise of a certainly lucrative future. Arrangements are already made for a pipe line from these fields to the railroad, an enterprise involving millions of dollars, which capitalists who know the capabilities of New Mexico are anxious to invest. The mineral resources of New Mexico, notwithstanding the already large production, have but begun their development.

In my former remarks on this subject, which appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 28, 1888, I referred in full to the agricultural resources of New Mexico and to the fact that New Mexico produced vastly greater quantities of corn than either Montana or Washington Territories, whose admission as States appears assured. The total production of corn in the two Territories of New Mexico and Montana appears from the following table, taken from the Agricultural Report:

	Bushels.
Montana	22,000

New Mexico, too, is well fitted for the cultivation and production of all the best-known fruits. Peaches, plums, and pears grow in great abundance and luxuriance, as well as figs and pomegranates, without danger of killing frosts or blighting mildew. There is no part of the country where the grape flourishes with less care and with greater profusion than upon the hillsides of New Mexico. New Mexico and California will in the future produce the wines of America, and our people can be free from the evil effects of doctored and impure foreign wines.

I have met at times an impression that New Mexico is one vast desert, where farming can never be successfully carried on. This idea is wholly due to ignorance. It is true that in many parts of New Mexico rain seldom falls, and that irrigation is essential to agriculture in the greater portion of the Territory. But irrigation as an aid to agriculture is known the world over, and has been practiced from time immemorial; while the incidental fertilization and the certainty of crops derived from irrigation vastly exceed the disadvantages brought on by the absence of rain. So general has become the interest on this subject, and so important is irrigation to the welfare, not only of New Mexico and Arizona, but of Colorado, Kansas, Nebraska, and Nevada, that at the last session of Congress an appropriation of $100,000 was made for the beginning of a national system of water storage and irrigation which would render vast territories, which are without such aid not susceptible of cultivation, among the most fertile of this country. I quote from the last report of the governor of New Mexico to the Secretary of the Interior, as showing the great advantages of a system of irrigation and the vast possibilities of agriculture in New Mexico under that system:

In view of the fact that a failure of crop is not possible with a reasonably complete system of water storage and distribution, whereby the farmer can compute his crop practically to the pound, in advance, year by year, with a given extent and thoroughness of cultivation, it follows that that system of cultivation will pay all, or more, the additional cost of irrigation, as the liability of failure of crop is thereby reduced to the minimum.

New Mexico differs materially from all the Western Territories in that, lying in the southern foot-hills of the Rocky Mountains, it has few of the continuous, rugged ranges that characterize much of the North. The country here is broken into alternate valleys, mesas, mountain peaks, and short ranges. Excellent facilities are thus afforded for the gathering and storage of water, and at elevations that permit its distribution, by the force of gravitation, to practically every tillable acre of land in the Territory.

The area of New Mexico is 79,000,000 acres. Of this it is estimated that not less than 60,000,000 acres may be classed as tillable with sufficient appliances for placing water thereon. This can be done only by a general system of storage in the higher altitudes, so disposed as to gather and hold the surplus that comes down from the mountains and runs the streams bank full at certain periods of every year, and thus reserve it for distribution during the dry periods of the later spring and earlier summer months.

In the same report a full exhibit is made of the recent achievements of New Mexico in agriculture and fruit-raising, so interesting that I incorporate it as a portion of my remarks:

AGRICULTURAL DEVELOPMENT.

There has been in all parts of the Territory marked progress in the development of our agricultural industries, illustrated by the late local and Territorial fairs, in grains, vegetables, fruits, and garden products, and by the corresponding cheapness and abundance in which they are found on sale in the markets. Large areas of land have been brought under cultivation for the first time this year, and the yield has been good. These productions include all varieties peculiar to the temperate zone, and some, such as figs, almonds, pomegranates, English walnuts, etc., that are classed as semi-tropical. The great range of latitude of New Mexico, from the thirty-second to the thirty-seventh parallel, affords a range of climate unknown in any Eastern State and a corresponding variety of product, while the range of altitude of tillable land, from 3,000 to 8,000 feet above sea-level, adapts the country alike to the products of the extreme North and the more northerly States of the South.

The development in agriculture has more than kept pace with the increase in population, and New Mexico is this year well started on the road towards self-supply in all the staples of consumption. In fruits, especially, the advance has been very marked. Orchards and vineyards that were planted a few years ago by the earlier colonists have this year come to bearing, and the volume on product has been something remarkable and exceeded only by the quality.

The Doña Aña County fruit fair, held in September at Las Cruces, in the quality of the fruits displayed of all kinds, was a surprising exhibit and a revelation of the wonderful capacity of the country, and of the Rio Grande valley especially, for the production of every description of fruits, more especially of grapes. The Black Hamburg, the Muscat, the Muscatelle, the Flaming Tokay, and many other equally valuable varieties, including excellent wine and raisin grapes, are there produced in astonishing size and profusion and of rare excellence. It is apparent from that exhibit that the manufacture of wines and raisins and the preparation of canned fruits are destined to become staple and profitable industries of that section.

The Santa Fé fruit exhibit, during the same month, was a gratifying display of the capacity of that region for the production of fruits of all kinds adapted to the latitude and the altitude—between 35° and 36° north and 7,000 feet.

At Las Vegas, last fall, was displayed an exhibit of grains, fruits, and vegetables especially adapted to the northern portion of the Territory, which indicated a marvelous productive capacity in a region that had been accounted almost a desert. The grains comprised wheat, oats, barley, and corn gathered promiscuously from the fields, many specimens of the small grains standing 6 to 8 feet high and the heads surpassing the average of the West, even in the weight of the grain—much of it grown without irrigation.

The Territorial fair at Albuquerque was an equal surprise to those unacquainted with the capacities of the country. In grains, vegetables, fruits, and textiles the display was of surpassing interest in its demonstration of the capacity of the Territory for the development of, practically, every product of the soil that contributes to the satisfaction of human needs and human comforts. Here were exhibited deliciously-flavored apples that weighed from 20 to 23 ounces, and peaches, pears, quinces, apricots, plums—in fact, every variety of corresponding size and quality, gathered from every quarter of the Territory; wheat weighing 70 pounds to the bushel and yielding 40 bushels to the acre, and oats, barley, corn, all the usual grains, fully up and even superior to the yields of the Middle States, as also in variety and quality; potatoes weighing 2 to 4 pounds, cabbages 40 to 50 pounds, and every variety of vegetable product of corresponding yield and weight.

During the past few years especial effort has been made to the introduction of improved agricultural machinery and modern methods of agriculture, and the result of that effort has been perceptible in these displays. Deep plowing and the introduction of intelligent, systematic pursuit of the science of agriculture have developed the fact that the soils of New Mexico, though at first sight forbidding and apparently a desert, possess in a remarkable degree all the elements of fertility, and that the great bulk of its lands, with intelligent cultivation, is susceptible of a high degree of development.

Until very recently the impression has prevailed that the successful production of American corn was impossible on account of the altitude, but the past year's experience has effectually dispelled that unpleasant delusion. As large and perfect American corn, the product of New Mexican corn-fields, was displayed at the late fairs as can be produced in any of the Mississippi States, and of quite equal yield, evidencing that that cereal is destined to hold its rank here as one of the great Western staples.

A gratifying indication of the increasing interest in and growth of our agricultural industries is the incorporation of irrigating companies. Nineteen of these associations have been chartered during the past year, and construction commenced on several of the number. Conspicuous among the latter is the Pecos Irrigation and Improvement Company, in Lincoln County, which has projected two canals, one 25 and the other 40 miles in length, and sufficient to irrigate 150,000 acres of land, now under contract. Other similar enterprises are also under way there, aggregating, in all, 140 miles of ditches and intended to water 250,000 acres of land. Lincoln County is more especially an agricultural county, and is rapidly filling up with farmers. The facilities for irrigation are generally good, and what was not many years ago known only as the Llano Estacado, or Staked Plain—waterless and treeless—comprising the eastern half of the county, will, before the lapse of many years, become one of the most populous and prosperous agricultural sections of the Southwest.

An extensive ditching enterprise is also on foot in the northwestern counties, another very promising agricultural section.

In Grant County an experiment at storage and distribution has proven an abundant success, so much so that a project for a considerable extension of the system has become a certainty.

In western Bernalillo County an enterprise is now under way for the establishment of a reservoir to be supplied from the watershed of the surrounding country and independent of running streams. This experiment will be watched with much interest, as, if successful, it will solve a troublesome problem and demonstrate the possibility of water storage and irrigation under conditions that have heretofore been considered impossible.

New Mexico, however, justly claims pre-eminence for its suitability for domestic animals. The following table, also from the Agricultural Report, shows that in the total number of horses, mules, and cattle New Mexico exceeds the whole of Dakota and far surpasses Montana and Washington, while the number of sheep in New Mexico is three times as great as in the other three Territories combined, out of which it is proposed to make four States:

Animals.	Dakota.	Montana.	New Mexico.	Washington.
Horses and mules	218,004	129,710	30,494	82,954
Cattle	810,490	751,000	1,169,789	343,088
Total	1,028,494	880,710	1,200,283	426,042
Sheep	253,672	718,750	4,328,753	544,548

What fit answer can be made to this as displaying the resources of New Mexico? It is safe to say that enough sheep can find grazing in New Mexico to supply wool to fill the need of the people of the whole United States. Recent experiments show that a combination of the native breeds of sheep with the best American and foreign breeds results in the production of wool of the finest quality.

There are now over 1,500 miles of railroad in the Territory, while other lines projected—some now in course of construction and nearly all to be constructed within one or at most two years—will triple the total mileage. Along the lines of every railroad spring up thriving towns, while the increase of population is composed of responsible and intelligent settlers from the Eastern States who desire to try their fortunes in a region where cyclones and droughts are alike unknown, and where that dreaded scourge of the eastern coast, consumption, can not invade their households, and where the fever and ague of the inland States is equally a stranger.

Of the advantages of New Mexico from a hygienic point of view too much can not be said. During the past two years the rush of travel has been directed towards Southern California, and fortunes have been made and lost in a single week in speculation there. But those who know the future of that country best assert that its continued development is absolutely assured, because in that region can be found what multitudes from the East and Northwest have sought in vain—freedom from many of those dread diseases so prevalent throughout other parts of the Union. New Mexico presents precisely the same advantages. In her beautiful elevated valleys the sun shines every day throughout the year. Diseases of the lungs are unknown, while that affliction which has at length come to be known as the national disease—catarrh—never plagues the inhabitants of New Mexico. The following testimony on this point is taken from a work entitled "Rocky Mountain Health Resorts," by Charles Denison, M. D.:

In New Mexico, Arizona, and Utah not a little evidence of an altitude of immunity is shown in communications I have had the pleasure of receiving from Army surgeons who have served at elevated stations. Surgeon John F. Hammond, United States Army, writing on the diseases of New Mexico, Rio Grande valley, says: "Phthisis pulmonalis I have never seen in the country except in two instances—once in an officer of the United States Army, and once in an American emigrant. It was developed in each before he left the States, and each very gradually improved."

Dr. Irwin reports for Fort Defiance (6,500 feet), Northwestern New Mexico:

During a service of some seven years in New Mexico and Arizona, ranging over a region embraced between the thirty-first and thirty-sixth degrees of north latitude—Fort Union, New Mexico, to Fort Buchanan, Arizona—I never saw or heard of a case of tuberculous disease amongst the native inhabitants of those Territories.

In connection with the altitude and the dryness of the air, the numerous wonderful mineral springs of New Mexico co-operate to make it the great health resort of the continent.

In a former Congress, when the bill for the admission of New Mexico passed the Senate, a distinguished Senator from California, Senator Sargent, gave this eloquent description of her resources and future:

A doubt with reference to the resources of New Mexico would seem to be hardly plausible. New Mexico has peculiar advantages for wealth. It is a great pastoral country. Of that there can be no doubt; and it has enormous wealth in the way of cattle and sheep. But New Mexico is something like California in one respect. If I am not mistaken, Daniel Webster, in discussing the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, by which California became a portion of the territory of the United States, said it was a land of rocks and deserts with rattlesnakes enough to fence it. Whether he ever said that or not, I do not know; I have never sought to verify it, but it is popularly believed that that was the estimate put upon California by Daniel Webster.

I went there before the State was admitted into the Union, in 1850, and I know the estimate among our own people at that time was that we had no agricultural capacity, or very slight. The idea of raising fruit in the mountains would have been considered absurd, and was so for a number of years after I went there, until the first experiment was timidly tried, and the hills then blossomed with fruit trees at once, bearing most magnificent and luxurious fruit. Our valleys were supposed to be sterile, to be impossible of cultivation; and yet now we are feeding Europe; we are beating Russia in the markets of Liverpool with the wheat which we send around the Horn, the product of our great valleys which were considered so sterile; and very much the same conditions exist in New Mexico. We do it partially by irrigation; we do it partially by differently alternating seasons; as, for instance, during this year the winter has been open, the snows and the rains have come on our State until the heart of the State is made glad by the promise of a harvest more abundant than that ever known to the history of the State, while last year the harvest was slight on account of the light rains and there being no snow whatever. So I say the seasons alternate.

The vast crop of a single year is enough to enrich the State for five, the luxuriance is so teeming. We can garner in our granaries as they did in Egypt in the old time against seasons of drought or periods of slackness of trade, and wait for the markets of the world. These same conditions exist in a very large degree in New Mexico. They have these vast plains. They have occasional seasons of heavy rains. They have their mountains garnering their snow, with the opportunity for irrigation, as we have in California. Of course the great agricultural resources are confined principally to the valleys, but the valleys are broad and extensive. The mountains, I have no doubt, are adapted to fruit raising, as they are in California, and those mountains are seamed further with valuable resources of minerals, with coal, and the precious metals, given promise by and by of enormous development, as our people shall pour in there.—Congressional Record, volume 4, part 2, page 1610.

The people of New Mexico are anxious to be relieved from the condition of tutelage and dependence in which they are now situated.

The governor in his last annual message to the Legislative Assembly thus referred to the development of the Territory and to the necessity for its admission as a State:

Especially in the mining and agricultural industries the advancement and development have been of a substantial and very gratifying character, surpassing the record of any corresponding period of our previous history. These two industries are destined, and for all time, especially agriculture, with which stock-raising will become closely blended and a constituent, to become and continue the basic industries of the Territory. In the mining of gold, especially, the development has been exceptional in extent and volume, which, if continued, will tend largely to obliterate the present factitious discrimination in values of the gold and silver metals as commercial standards of exchange.

In the nature of things, however, as all industries and all values are bottomed on successful agriculture, it becomes us in all ways and under all conditions to conserve and stimulate that industry. To that end, as it is apparent that in large areas of the Territory any general, prosperous system of agriculture is dependent on an equally general and effective system of water supply and irrigation, a bill was introduced in Congress at its last session providing for the admission of New Mexico to statehood, and donating a stipulated amount of the public lands in the Territory to be devoted to the establishment of reservoirs for water storage for purposes of irrigation. As it is not at all probable that this donation will be made except upon the admission of New Mexico to the Union, and in order that we may be placed at the earliest possible day in possession of that very important means of development, as also that we may be able to utilize as speedily as possible the usual appropriation of public lands for public schools and the purposes of public education, I suggest that the Legislative Assembly by public resolution memorialize Congress for the prompt passage of the measure now pending in the House of Representatives for the admission of New Mexico to statehood. It is confidently believed that the passage of this measure containing these two very important propositions would be the means of very greatly stimulating immigration, investment, and development.

The people of New Mexico are anxious to assume the full obligations of citizenship. The leaders of both parties alike are calling for statehood. From a recent number of the Chicago Times I cut the following article, displaying the sentiment of one of the leading Republicans of the Territory:

Ten years ago W. H. H. Llewellyn, of Omaha, was appointed Indian agent for the Mescalero and Jicarilla tribes of Apaches in New Mexico. When his term of office expired he moved to Las Cruces, in the Rio Grande valley, and enjoyed a lucrative law practice. The town in which he resides is in the center of the great fruit section of the country and much property is owned by Chicago investors. He was a delegate to the Republican national convention four years ago and, naturally, is intensely interested in the question of admitting New Mexico into the Union. "The people of New Mexico feel entitled to some consideration from the rest of the people of the United States," says he. "Both Democrats and Republicans are working for the cause. It is not a party question in the least, and of all the souls in the Territory fully three-quarters of them would vote yea to the question. We polled 40,000 votes at the last election, and with our natural resources we are as fully equipped for statehood as any Territory. A great cry in the North is, 'Don't let the Greasers in.' They are an orderly, well-behaved race, who respect the Government, and if the court records of all the crimes committed in that country were looked up, it would be found that 75 per cent. were committed by the so-called Americans."

Mr. Llewellyn says that civilization has progressed most rapidly in his Territory during the last few years. This is especially notable among the Indians. The Navajos, the largest individual tribe in the United States, are now self-supporting, save the establishment of schools, which work is carried on by the Government. Last year they sold 1,500,000 pounds of wool of their own raising.

Mr. Llewellyn will remain at the Leland for a few days and then visit the East.

The Lincoln County Leader of December 22, 1888, thus presents the need of admission:

New Mexico has a taxable value of $130,000,000; Montana, $69,000,000. Why admit Montana and not New Mexico? The discrimination seems to be religious as well as partisan. From all sides we receive such assurances of renewed immigration when we are admitted as a State as to assure us that capital will feel more secure; and while we are at present expending large sums in private enterprises, notably the irrigation of 200,000 acres of land in this county, involving an expense of over $2,500,000, we have untold wealth in our mines, undeveloped, to say nothing about our superior climate.

The following appeal for statehood and the prompt response show the general interest now existing in this subject:

AN APPEAL FOR STATEHOOD.

NEW YORK, December 15, 1888.

There is a subject of the greatest importance to New Mexico that requires immediate action within the Territory. I refer to its admission as a State. A number of Territories are to be admitted either before March 4 or very soon after. If that number should not include New Mexico it will be the cause of great injury to us. A Territorial condition is considered here as a proof of backwardness and lack of progress. Heretofore we have had the excuse that no Territory could be admitted as parties stood in Congress, and pointed to Dakota as an illustration; but if three or four are now brought in and we are left out, it will be understood as meaning that we are not fit for statehood, and are retrograding rather than improving. Every acre of our land would lose value and every industry be injured by such an event.

And yet there is grave danger of it. The States talked of here are Dakota, Montana, and Washington. Even Idaho is mentioned; but not New Mexico. There are various reasons for this. Some we can not prevent. But one we can obviate. People think we are not prepared because we are not clamoring for admission as other Territories are. In them they take every means possible to obtain admission. Their Legislatures petition, their boards of trade pass resolutions, they hold meetings and send delegations to Washington, and they fill the newspapers with accounts of their efforts and their claims. The general public thinks that each Territory is prepared for statehood in proportion to its efforts to obtain it. Just now the subject is attracting much attention. Every one understands that a number of new States are to be formed. Dispatches appear every day from Dakota, Montana, and Washington on the subject. Scarcely a day passes that I am not asked whether New Mexico will not have population enough before a great while to make application! My answer that we have had population enough for years, and we are far more ready in every respect for statehood than either Montana or Washington, is received in surprise and perhaps a little incredulity, and they say, "Why, I haven't noted any movement there on the subject."

This is very vexatious, and worse, because the underlying idea is harmful. People will not go to or invest their money in a section that they think is backward or non-progressive. Men are like sheep. They want to go with the crowd. If they emigrate they prefer a locality which is growing up rapidly. And the idea of statehood, or at least of efforts for statehood, are directly connected here with progress.

So it is important that our people should act promptly. Every board of trade should pass resolutions and have them telegraphed by the Associated Press. Every organization that can have a meeting should do likewise. The Legislature, of course, should act as soon as it meets. This very morning the New York Tribune has an editorial which shows the danger of longer inaction. It urges the admission of four new States, but the keeping out of New Mexico on the avowed ground that the Territory is too backward and has not the elements of a substantial community. I will endeavor to answer that here, but we should act unitedly and energetically all over the Territory. Will not the press of New Mexico aid in this?

L. BRADFORD PRINCE.

To the citizens of Lincoln County:

As citizens and residents of New Mexico we very fully appreciate the truth of the foregoing communication, and comprehend the value and importance of a democratic representative government, equally with the blessings of the great Union of States. We believe that we have outgrown a Territorial government, and that the Territorial condition is detrimental to the development of our interests and our industries.

Therefore we earnestly urge upon the citizens of Lincoln County and the Territory of New Mexico to convene in mass meeting in their respective communities on the 5th day of January, 1889, for the purpose of general discussion of the subject of statehood, and to select delegates to a general convention to be held at Santa Fé, N. Mex., January 12, 1889; said convention to urge our claims to admission to the sisterhood of States, and select a committee to go immediately to Washington and present the same to Congress.

It is suggested that delegates be selected on a basis of one for each 100 votes or fraction thereof, each precinct to be entitled to one delegate regardless of the vote.

The importance of each citizen of New Mexico taking an active interest in the matter can be readily understood by reading the columns of slanderous and damaging matter daily being circulated throughout the East by the leading journals concerning our population and resources while discussing the question of New Mexico's admission to statehood.

It is also suggested that delegates selected who are unable to attend send their proxy to the chairman of the board of county commissioners, at Lincoln, N. Mex., who will deliver them to such delegates or other persons as may be selected and signify their intention of being present at the convention at Santa Fé.

The convention thus called has met and has adopted resolutions demanding immediate admission. These will be presented to the House as soon as they arrive.

New Mexico as a Territory has long suffered from the neglect of the General Government. In years past the ravages of hostile Indians have been unchecked, and, while on the one hand protection has been denied, on the other compensation for past injuries has been refused. Then, too, by the neglect of Congress the titles to land for a great number of acres in the Territory have remained unsettled ever since the first occupation of New Mexico. Notwithstanding this her people have been patient, believing that at last some redress would be afforded. Now they call upon Congress for that consideration to which they are entitled—their admission as a State. No greater encouragement to immigration and development can be given.

The admission of New Mexico will stimulate her people to renewed activity in developing the resources of the country, and will operate to attract extensive immigration from the States of the East, for as a State its resources will become known. Once admitted as a State her rapid development is assured. Her future is not doubtful. High up among the mountains of New Mexico numerous smelting furnaces will be busy in preparing for use the vast mineral wealth now buried in the earth. Thousands of prosperous citizens will be employed in the mining industries, and mountain cities equal to those of Colorado will arise. Throughout the upland region millions of cattle, horses, and sheep will pasture, increasing in number every year, since they escape all danger from the stress of hostile winters. On every side thousands of thrifty farms will be cultivated, and the diligent farmer, freed from the uncertainty of drought or floods, will contentedly cultivate his fields knowing that his diligent labor will surely result in an abundant harvest. Vineyards and orchards will adorn every hillside, and the fruits and wines of New Mexico will be as widely celebrated as those of California. Under these conditions prosperous cities will increase, while all of the inhabitants of this favored region, in a climate the delights of which are unequaled throughout the globe, will be blessed with health and longevity not to be surpassed in any other part of our common country.

These resources and possibilities New Mexico tenders to the Union. Her citizens will esteem it their highest honor to be admitted to an equal share in the responsibilities of the Union, and should danger menace they would deem it their greatest privilege to bear their full share and thus exhibit their devotion to our country's flag and the American Constitution.

During the delivery of the above remarks,

The SPEAKER pro tempore said: The time of the gentleman from New Mexico has expired.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I ask that the gentleman from New Mexico be allowed to proceed.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman desires ten or fifteen minutes more, and I hope it will be granted him.

Mr. MACDONALD. I move that he be allowed to conclude his remarks.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. JOSEPH. I thank the gentleman from Minnesota for his courtesy.

Mr. JOSEPH resumed and concluded his remarks.

Mr. JOSEPH. I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in my remarks some resolutions in my possession in reference to the admission of New Mexico as a State.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Mexico? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The papers referred to are as follows:

LAS VEGAS, N. MEX., December 29, 1888.

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

A public meeting was held here last night for a canvass of the statehood question. The following resolutions were adopted:

"Resolved, That we, the citizens and voters of San Miguel County, in mass meeting assembled, hereby proclaim that in our judgment the time has come for the people of the whole Territory of New Mexico to unite in a demand that New Mexico be admitted as a State into the Union as soon as the preliminary steps can be taken to secure such admission.

"Resolved, That we hereby ask the Territorial Legislature, as soon as possible after it shall convene, to pass a joint resolution memorializing Congress and asking the passage of an enabling act authorizing the calling of a constitutional convention to frame a constitution for New Mexico, and that the Legislature of New Mexico pass a law providing for the holding of an election for delegates to a constitutional convention fixing the time and place for holding the same.

"Resolved, That the press of New Mexico be requested to give these resolutions as wide publicity as possible, and that the friends of the movement for statehood everywhere in the Territory be invited to meet in mass meeting and by similar resolutions request the Legislature of New Mexico to take prompt and decided action in the matter, in order that Congress and the whole country may become fully advised of the general desire to secure a State government before the adjournment of the present Congress."

DEMANDING STATEHOOD—NEW MEXICO INSISTS ON BEING ADMITTED TO THE FEDERAL UNION.

[Special to the Republic.]

SANTA FÉ, N. MEX., January 13.

At the statehood convention, held in Santa Fé, the following resolutions were passed:

Whereas the Territory of New Mexico was ceded to the United States by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo in the year 1848, and has been an organized Territory under the laws of the United States ever since the year 1850; and

Whereas by the terms of said treaty it was stipulated and guarantied that the people in this Territory who should not preserve the character of citizens of Mexico should be incorporated into the Union of the United States and be admitted at a proper time to all the enjoyments of all the rights of citizens of the United States according to the principles of the Constitution; and

Whereas the people of this Territory have frequently demanded and asked for a compliance on the part of the Federal Government with the said terms of said treaty, and have always been desirous of being admitted into the United States and the enjoyment of the rights of citizens of the United States; and

Whereas the people of this Territory have ever since the cession of New Mexico to the United States been loyal to its principles and institutions and desire its perpetuity; and

Whereas the population of the Territory of New Mexico at the present time exceeds 170,000, exclusive of all Indians, which said Indians have no right to vote in the Territory and by its laws have always been prohibited from voting and never have voted at any election in the Territory; and

Whereas the Territory is now traversed by railroad and telegraph lines in various directions, giving every part of it speedy and easy communication with all other parts of the United States, such railroad lines amounting to about 1,400 miles in length, all of which have been constructed within the last nine years, bringing with them from the States of the Union a large, wealthy, intelligent, and enterprising immigration, nearly if not quite equal to the population which was in this Territory prior to the advent of said railroads; and

Whereas the assessed value of property in this Territory has been constantly and largely on the increase ever since its annexation to the United States, and in the last ten years such increase has been tenfold; and

Whereas there has been an increase during the last two years of over 5,000 votes actually cast at the last general election over the vote cast at the general election held two years previous, showing an increase in population in that time of about 30,000; and

Whereas a large and intelligent immigration from all parts of the United States is constantly coming into this Territory, settling it up and rapidly developing its resources and increasing its wealth, intelligence and prosperity; and

Whereas the Territory of New Mexico is possessed of sufficient resources, intelligence, and inhabitants, not including Indians, to authorize and require its admission into the Union as a sovereign State, equal in every respect with the present States of the Union; and

Whereas under the Territorial form of government limitations upon our right to legislate not contemplated by the Constitution of the United States or the spirit of American institutions are imposed upon us, the progress and development of our Territory are retarded, leaving us in a condition of tutelage and minority, thus impairing confidence in the stability of our institutions on the part of those seeking homes and investment in the West, all of which will be obviated by our admission to statehood; and

Whereas the name of New Mexico has been for more than three hundred years applied to that portion of the United States now embraced within our Territory, and the inhabitants have for generations held that name in veneration and desire to perpetuate it in our history as the name of a sovereign State: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved by the people of the Territory of New Mexico in convention assembled, representing every portion and political subdivision and every political party therein, That we insist upon and demand admission into the Federal Union as a State, in fulfillment of the pledges and guaranties solemnly made by the Government of the United States in the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and also by virtue of our wealth, population, and intelligence, which are amply sufficient to support and maintain a free and sovereign State and all the institutions incident thereto.

Resolved, That we further insist and demand that speedy action be taken by the Congress of the United States to the end that New Mexico shall be at once admitted into the Federal Union as a State thereof.

Resolved, That we deem it a sufficient answer to the many misrepresentations promulgated throughout this country as to the intelligence and morality of our people to advise the fair-minded people of the United States that more than one-fourth of all the revenue raised in this Territory, 90 per cent. of which is collected and paid into the school fund, is devoted to the support and maintenance of free non-sectarian public schools and that such schools exist in all parts of this Territory.

And be it further resolved, That simple justice to this people demands that they should be permitted to perpetuate the history and achievements of their forefathers by retaining "New Mexico" as the name of the new State.

Mr. STRUBLE withholds his remarks for revision. [See Appendix.]

Mr. MANSUR. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with my remarks by an arrangement with the members of the committee, I desire to yield twenty minutes of my time to the Delegate from Washington Territory [Mr. VOORHEES].

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. Speaker, four years ago the people of Washington commissioned me to present to the Congress the urgent commercial, geographical, social, and political importance of the erection of that northwest angle of the Republic into an American State. During all that period, frequently at the risk of rendering myself obnoxious to members, so little have they seemed to realize the intense bitterness of a disfranchised condition, I have laboriously sought to induce such results in this connection as would justify the confidence which impelled my constituency in placing in my hands this important and far-reaching trust. That the appeals of the people of this remote region of the Republic have thus far found dull ears has been to me a source of the keenest regret, not unmixed with a feeling of profound indignation. Whatever the causes may have been which wrought out this policy of non-action, a more indefensible position was never assumed than that predicated upon a supreme indifference to the repeated petitions of disfranchised thousands for constitutional enfranchisement.

On the 28th day of July last I made in this House a plea for American citizenship for a disfranchished constituency, in the course of which I used the following language:

> Confronted by the majestic presence of American citizenship mere political considerations grow mean and small. I address myself to this great question to-day, not as a Democrat, but as an American citizen. I care not what the future political complexion of the Territory may be, the citizenship of its inhabitants can not become less sacred, be the administration Democratic or Republican. American citizenship presents too exalted a question to be circumscribed by political considerations, and I shall always protest against the utilization of such a question for the perpetuation of party supremacy or for the achievement of mere party advantage. It is a question of statesmanship and not of politics.

My sentiments as then expressed have undergone no change or diminution. The rapid advancement and progress of the great commonwealth which I represent since that time have but served to intensify such a feeling, and to-day I feel that any scheme of party advancement which is to be based upon the continued disfranchisement of the people who sent me here will involve a grave crime against constitutional government and an indefensible transgression of the fundamental principles of civil liberty.

It is a subject for congratulation that this House has at last placed itself in a position to mete out tardy justice to more than a million of American citizens.

It is not possible to discover any sufficient reason for the apparent apathy which has heretofore characterized this House in its treatment of this vital question.

As so eloquently suggested by my learned and distinguished friend from New York [Mr. COX], an invocation of all the powers of imagery and of prophecy fails to furnish forth any adequate notion of the stupendous and unparalleled growth and development of the communities affected by the pending measure.

Even the far-reaching instinct of Thomas Jefferson, which bequeathed this empire to the American people, could not have felt the extent of the blessings to posterity which lay concealed in his wise and unerring statesmanship. The sturdy and intrepid spirits of Lewis and Clarke little dreamed that the vast and mighty solitude of that country—would, in less than a century's life, respond to the ringing voices of an imperial and astounding progress. Even in prophetic vision they could not have foreseen the establishment upon the splendid waters of Puget Sound of a seat of commerce which, in less than three generations, outstripping its older competitors, challenges the admiration of the commercial world as the ocean port fifth in importance in the United States. No amount of prescience could have revealed to them that in the year 1888 the total valuation of taxable property of Washington would be $84,641,548, having advanced to that amount from $18,922,922 in 1878.

> Where rolled the Oregon,
> And heard no sound save its own dashing,

Was there a prediction in any of the voices of the wild and savage life by which they were surrounded that there would be polled in the Territory, in the year 1888, 46,353 votes, representing a population at the least calculation of 231,665, as against a vote of 12,647 in 1878, the basis of a population of 63,235?

In the variety and permanency of her natural resources and advantages Washington has no equal amongst her sisters. In her superb maritime advantages she surpasses every other Territory, and very many of the States. By reason of her inexhaustible coal supply and her abundance of iron she has been very aptly styled the Pennsylvania of the Pacific Northwest. Within her borders is to be found the great lumber reserve region of this country. Her agricultural possibilities are excelled in no quarter of the globe, and her production of the precious metals is very pronounced. It will thus be seen that, in the aggregate of her resources and advantages, she is in advance of any State or Territory in the Union.

Admiral Charles Wilkes thus describes the maritime features of Puget Sound:

> Nothing can surpass the beauty of these waters and their safety. Not a shoal exists within the Straits of Juan de Fuca, Admiralty Bay, or Hood's Canal that can in any way interrupt their navigation by a 74-gun ship. I venture nothing in saying that there is no country in the world that possesses waters equal to these; they cover an area of about 2,000 square miles; the shores of all its inlets and bays are remarkably bold, so much so that a ship's side would strike the shore before her keel would touch the ground.
> The country by which these waters are surrounded is remarkably salubrious and affords every advantage for the accommodation of a vast commercial and military marine, with convenience for docks, and a great many sites for towns and cities, at all times well supplied with water, and capable of being well provided with everything by the surrounding country, which is well adapted for agriculture.
> The Straits of Juan de Fuca are 95 miles in length, and have an average width of 11 miles. At the entrance (8 miles in width) no danger exists, and it may be safely navigated throughout.
> No part of the world affords finer inlands, sounds, or a greater number of harbors than are found within the Straits of Juan de Fuca, capable of receiving the largest class of vessels and without a danger in them that is not visible. From the rise and fall of the tide (18 feet) every facility is afforded for the erection of works for a great maritime nation.
> The country also affords as many sites for water-power as any other.

Washington has 1,984 miles of coast line, all but about 170 miles of which is washed by the waters of Puget Sound.

In my speech of July 28 last I thus alluded, in a statistical way, to our vast maritime interests:

> The gigantic lumber, coal, agricultural, and other interests are of such proportions that in 1887 the number of American steam-vessels engaged in the foreign trade, which was 674 entering and clearing in the Puget Sound customs district, exceeded that of any other district in the United States, New York standing second with 488 vessels; and the tonnage of such vessels, representing 532,748 tons, was only exceeded by New York, where the tonnage was 764,551. During that year in the aggregate number of American and foreign steam-vessels engaged in the foreign trade, at 1,312, this district stood second only to New York, and in the aggregate tonnage of such vessels the district was seventh in importance. In the aggregate number of entrances and clearances of American and foreign vessels, steam and sail, the district was fifth in the United States, with 881 vessels, and in the aggregate tonnage of such vessels it was seventh. In the fiscal year of 1886 the collections of this district were $79,000, while such collections for the fiscal year of 1887 will not fall far short of $300,000.
> It is estimated that the export trade of Puget Sound in coal, lumber, wheat, and other products amounts to $10,000,000 annually.

The fact that Washington alone, of all the Territories, occupies a maritime position should long since have induced the conviction that delay in clothing her with a settled and certain form of government is fraught with the gravest peril and concern to the nation. Her exposed and totally defenseless position is a perpetual invitation to the aggression of every hostile foreign power. Great Britain, in the expenditure of more than a million of money in providing for the public defense in her provinces immediately to the northward, has set an example worthy of the emulation of the American Republic.

So forcibly did this consideration present itself that Senator MORGAN, in his most admirable speech upon the admission of Washington, in the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress, put forth the following observations:

> Considered in a political view, there could be nothing more important to the welfare of the whole Union than to have a State established at that angle of our Northwestern possessions, one side of which is washed by the Pacific Ocean and the other by the Straits of Fuca. I may describe it as a political buttress standing out there partly in the sea, opposed directly to the power and enterprise of the greatest rival that we have in the world—people of our own kith and kindred, whose power and enterprise we certainly ought to learn to estimate if we have not done it yet—the British people.

Considerations of this character, Mr. Speaker, are worthy of the thoughtful and earnest attention of the wisest statesmanship, and I commend such a course to the statesmen of this House.

So widespread and overwhelming is the desire for constitutional government amongst the people whom I represent that during the recent election it constituted the living, burning issue between the two parties. So keenly did these people in that election resent the delay in this House in responding to their continued appeals for statehood that a pronounced Republican majority was the result. In the intensity of their desire to rebuke the Democratic party for what they conceived to have been an unwarranted indifference to their appeals, they lost sight of the persistency with which I have during my four years of service here urged my friends in this House to immediate action.

I have no personal regret over my defeat, but it is a source of very considerable regret to me that my efforts have proved unavailing to impress upon my party friends in this House the wisdom of moving in such a way toward the accomplishment of this mighty result, which, during every hour of my service here, has been demanded by every dictate of American citizenship, as to inspire in the hearts of the people of Washington a feeling of friendliness for the splendid party of which I am an humble member. That I failed was not through a failure of diligent, determined effort on my own part, and I stand here to-day, in the shadow of overwhelming political defeat, to insist, with the same vigor and zeal that animated me in the sunshine of political success, that any further delay in the consummation of this paramount result is an unconscionable usurpation of the inalienable rights of nearly three hundred thousand American citizens.

Mr. MANSUR. Mr. Speaker, from what I believe to be the consensus of opinion upon the floor of the House, there is practically nothing left at this time to discuss, so far as the admission of Washington and Montana are concerned. I feel confident that this side of the Chamber has reached a conclusion in their own minds to support and vote for their admission. I believe a similar sentiment obtains on the other side of the House, and hence there is little to discuss in regard to them.

The proposition that seems at present to meet the best favor on this side of the Chamber is that known popularly as the "omnibus" measure. A few words in regard to that bill, and as to the points that I understand our friends on the other side differ with us upon. I believe I may say that in the formation of that bill the Delegates from all of the several Territories interested were consulted as to the details, and, so far as I know, from the time of its formation and presentation to the House down to the present time, in regard to these details there has been no difference of opinion and no exception taken to them, I repeat, so far as my knowledge extends, by any member of the House on either side, and I mean now all the details in the way of land grants, the mode and manner of calling conventions, their power and duties, etc. So that we narrow the field of our discussion down considerably when we say that in the details of this bill, so far as the committee were concerned, they were agreed, the several items of detail being acceptable alike to both sides.

What then, Mr. Speaker, were the differences of opinion in the committee? One was that these Territories should not all be included in any omnibus bill, but that each of them should stand on its own individual merits. Another was that Dakota ought to be per force of sentiment divided, and the southern part be admitted upon the constitution adopted a little over three years ago.

Another, and the last point of objection, was in regard to New Mexico—the Republican side of the House was not in favor of its admission into the Union at the present time. I believe I have stated fairly the differences, and gentlemen on either side of the committee can supplement these points of difference with any other existing. I know of none, but I may have forgotten, and if so I hope they will be presented to the House in the course of this discussion.

Whatever may have been the opinion of this side in the past, true it is that now our side of the Chamber have reached a conclusion that Dakota should be admitted into the Union; and we have also reached the conclusion that if it be the will of her people, upon due notice given and in a formal manner, to declare in favor of the division of the Territory, we will assent to that also.

So that, having conceded these great vital points on this side, it seems to me there is comparatively little left to differ with the other side upon, it is true, though personally I believe that it would be more than wise to resubmit the adoption of the constitution framed in the fall of 1885 to a direct vote of the people; and not only that, but that it should be done in such a manner as to disembarrass the minds of the people of that Territory from all fear that if they do not accept the constitution already adopted that they can not get another hearing.

Personally I would be glad to submit that question, and to couple with it another thing that would take from the mind of every person and every voter in Dakota Territory, North or South, all apprehension on that subject, and would do it in this manner: That at the time when the people vote upon the question of ratification anew of the constitution of 1885, with the various amendments submitted at that time separately, there should be also coupled with it a call for another convention and the election of delegates, who, in the event of a failure on the part of the people of both Dakotas to ratify the convention of 1885, should immediately assemble in another convention and there form another constitution, taking all the good features of this constitution they desire, and amending it in such manner as to make it thoroughly acceptable to all the people of Dakota of the present day.

This should be done, particularly when we remember that three years ago North Dakota had no voice whatever in that convention or upon the question of division, and when we remember that to-day, according to the vote of November, 1888, there is largely over 100,000 voters in that Territory. So that when they come to vote upon the question of the adoption or ratification anew of the constitution submitted for South Dakota they shall not be under any fear that by declining to ratify it anew they will be put to delay in the formation of a new constitution, but that at the one election they may pass upon all these questions. I believe it to be the preferable and better plan to get afresh the will of the people, and to give that right anew to all the people of that Territory, instead of permitting less than one-third of the number of voters that now exist in that State to decide it; for less than one-third of their present number voted on these questions at the election in 1885, when the constitution referred to in the Senate bill was adopted.

By such means we would get at the very last and best expression of their wishes. It would enable us to get a solution of the whole difficulty and truly enable the people of Dakota to determine these questions of local self-government for themselves. In that way they could consider all the merits and demerits of the old constitution and accept or reject it, free from all fear of losing statehood. It is not my purpose to canvass this question at any length, but rather to devote myself in the few remarks I shall address to the House in reply to the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE] who has just taken his seat.

By the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, forty years ago, I think it is safe to say that the honor of this nation was pledged that in due and reasonable time, when the New Mexican people should become citizens of our country, that country should be admitted into the Union as a State as other Territories have been. And I see from the observations and discussions in the past that Senators especially took that view years ago, to wit, that the good faith of the Union demanded that New Mexico should be admitted into the Union. This is especially the case in the debate of 1874 in the Senate upon the question then of admitting New Mexico as a State.

What my friend says about the past condition of New Mexico is as wholly irrelevant to the condition of affairs as they exist to-day as it would be for us to undertake to compare the condition of the Pilgrim Fathers after they had been in Massachusetts a month or a year—not, perhaps, in moral condition or in intellectual capacity, for that was great—but upon their financial ability to maintain a State government.

The House should remember that in 1876 there was not a mile of railroad in the Territory. The House should remember that none of our Territories have suffered as much as New Mexico from the ravages of Indians of the fiercest and most hostile character, for the Navajoes, the Arapahoes, and the Cheyennes have been the fiercest and bravest warriors in the West and Southwest, and they have ravaged this Territory more than any other, and kept it down and kept it backward for very many years. With these disadvantages, separated as it was by a thousand miles from the settled States of the East, with no means of getting to and from New Mexico except what used to be called in those days "bull-trains," which would only carry a person from our Missouri frontier to New Mexico in a period of from six to ten weeks, there was of course little opportunity for improvement for the people of the Territory. But the condition of affairs as described by writers thirty years ago, their descriptions of the utensils with which the people of the Territory then cultivated the ground, and the quotation of such descriptions as if they were applicable to the present condition of things, is, in the light of the progress that we make in the West each and every year of our lives, simply futile, and infantile besides.

The gentleman says that he will make no attack upon the religion of the people of New Mexico. I am glad to hear him say so. It is very hard indeed to read the report, of which he confesses himself the author, and reach that conclusion; but a late repentance is perhaps better than no repentance at all. It will not do to say that those New Mexicans, who are white, and who are within our territory and protected by the treaty stipulations made with Old Mexico when we took them within our limits in 1848—it will not do to say that they are not to be counted as a part of the population to entitle them to statehood; but it would seem from the tenor of the argument of the gentleman from Iowa as if the only character of people within the limits of the Territory of New Mexico is such as is stated in his report upon this bill and in his speech to-day, namely, that the people are ignorant, stupid, superstitious, and uneducated. This is not so.

Let me call the attention of the House to a couple of incidents occurring in the years 1874 and 1876. And first let me remind the House what period of time that was in the history of the Republican party. Politically, gentlemen, it was the greatest era in your history. In 1872, when General Grant was elected President for the second time, you had unlimited control over every department of the Government. The Senate and the House both were two-thirds in your favor; the Supreme Court was on your side; General Grant was your idol, and you had everything your own way. In that administration, in the year 1874, a bill was introduced in the Forty-third Congress to provide an enabling act for the admission of New Mexico into the Union. That bill passed both Houses of Congress.

It passed the House of Reprensetatives at the first session, on the 21st day of May, 1874, by a vote of 160 yeas against 54 nays, lacking only two of being a vote of three to one. At the second session of the same Congress, on the 24th day of February, the bill passed the Senate by a vote of 32 yeas to 11 nays, lacking only one vote of being three-fourths; and that was in the most stalwart Republican Congress, both in the upper and lower branch, that our history has known. But that is not all. That bill failed for want of agreement on some minutiæ in conference, and two years later the Senate led off and introduced a bill which passed by a large majority. Since that time neither House has passed a bill for the admission of New Mexico. Now, Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE] to say that the agricultural lands of that Territory are incapable of supporting such population as would reasonably authorize New Mexico to demand to be admitted among the States, and I understood him to says also that there were only about 5½ per cent. of the agricultural lands of the Territory which could be cultivated profitably without irrigation.

Mr. STRUBLE. Yes; without an improved system of irrigation. I made that statement and gave as my authority the governor's report.

Mr. MANSUR. The gentleman from Iowa has been quoting from literature on this subject as stale as a last year's almanac, but I desire in this connection to quote from the last two reports of the governor of the Territory, who ought to know something about the condition of affairs there. In his report for 1887 Governor Ross says:

It is impossible to accurately or definitely estimate or describe the undeveloped resources of New Mexico, so vast is the range of natural resources known to exist. Of the 122,500 square miles of land 10,000 are covered with pine forests; of the 78,000,000 acres, 40,000,000 are good average agricultural lands, and probably 20,000,000 of the balance are mountainous.

In his report for 1888 he says:

There has been in all parts of the Territory marked progress in the development of our agricultural industries, illustrated by the late local and Territorial fairs, in grains, vegetables, fruits, and garden products, and by the corresponding cheapness and abundance in which they are found on sale in the markets.

Again:

The development in agriculture has more than kept pace with the increase in population, and New Mexico in this year well started on the road towards self-supply in all the staples of consumption. In fruits especially the advance has been very marked. Orchards and vineyards that were planted a few years ago by the earlier colonists have this year come to bearing, and the volume of product has been something remarkable and exceeded only by the quality.

The Doña Ana County fruit fair, held in September at Las Cruces, in the quality of the fruits displayed of all kinds, was a surprising exhibit and a revelation of the wonderful capacity of the country, and of the Rio Grande valley especially, for the production of every description of fruits, more especially of grapes. The Black Hamburg, the Muscat, the Muscatelle, the Flaming Tokay, and many other equally valuable varieties, including excellent wine and raisin grapes, are there produced in astonishing size and profusion and of rare excellence. It is apparent from that exhibit that the manufacture of wines and raisins and the preparation of canned fruits are destined to become staple and profitable industries of that section.

The Santa Fé fruit exhibit, during the same month, was a gratifying display of the capacities of that region for the production of fruits of all kinds adapted to the latitude and the altitude—between 35° and 36° north and 7,000 feet.

At Las Vegas, last fall, was displayed an exhibit of grain fruits and vegetables especially adapted to the northern portion of the Territory, which indicated a marvelous productive capacity in a region that has been accounted almost a desert. The grains comprised wheat, oats, barley, and corn gathered promiscuously from the fields, many specimens of the small grains standing 6 to 8 feet high and the heads surpassing the average of the West, even in the weight of grain—much of it grown without irrigation.

The Territorial fair at Albuquerque was an equal surprise to those unacquainted with the capacities of the country. In grains, vegetables, fruits, and textiles the display was of surpassing interest in its demonstration of the capacity of the Territory for the development of, practically, every product of the soil that contributes to the satisfaction of human needs and human comforts.

Again:

During the past few years—

When did the railroads get in there? All of them, you may say, practically, within the last six or eight years.

During the past few years especial effort has been made to the introduction of improved agricultural machinery and modern methods of agriculture, and the result of that effort has been perceptible in these displays. Deep plowing and the introduction of intelligent, systematic pursuit of the science of agriculture have developed the fact that the soils of New Mexico, though at first sight forbidding and apparently a desert, possess in a remarkable degree all the elements of fertility, and that the great bulk of its lands, with intelligent cultivation, is susceptible of a high degree of development. Until very recently—

Mark the language—

Until very recently the impression has prevailed that the successful production of American corn was impossible on account of the altitude, but the pas-year's experience has effectually dispelled that unpleasant delusion. As large and perfect American corn, the product of New Mexican corn-fields, was displayed at the late fairs as can be produced in any of the Mississippi States, and of equal yield, evidencing that that cereal is destined to hold its rank here as one of the great Western staples.

The governor then proceeds to speak of what they are doing in the way of irrigation and the introduction of canals. He states:

Nineteen of these associations have been chartered during the past year, and construction commenced on several of the number. Conspicuous among the latter is the Pecos Irrigation and Improvement Company, in Lincoln County, which has projected two canals, one 25 and the other 40 miles in length, and sufficient to irrigate 150,000 acres of land, now under contract. Other similar enterprises are also under way there, aggregating, in all, 140 miles of ditches, and intended to water 250,000 acres of land. Lincoln County is more especially an agricultural county, and is rapidly filling up with farmers. The facilities for irrigation are generally good.

And he winds up his remarks on this subject by saying—

What was, not many years ago, known as the Llano Estacado, or Staked Plain—waterless and treeless—comprising the eastern half of the county, will, before the lapse of many years, become one of the most populous and prosperous agricultural sections of the Southwest. These are remarkable statements, and prove conclusively, that all ideas in regard to the sterility of New Mexico, based upon observations and experiences prior to the advent of railroads and the new modes of cultivation arising from the use of modern improved farming machinery, are absolutely to be discarded, and in determining the agricultural resources and capability of New Mexico to sustain a population worthy of a State both now and in the future, must be sought and obtained only from the period within the advent of railroads and of an aggressive, active, energetic farming class within her borders.

I have now called the attention of members of the House to the fact that the Republicans on two different occasions—I may say three, two in the Senate and one in the House—in 1874 and in 1876, voted that in their opinion New Mexico was entitled to admission; that she had all the elements necessary to entitle her to admission as a State. What has caused the change since? If anything, the climate has surely bettered. The improvements in other respects are great; and best of all, at least 75,000 stalwart American citizens—many of them Northern men, many of them Union men—have gone in there and are developing that country under the auspices mainly of a Boston company—a great railroad company—the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé Railway Company. Under the stimulating influences of this great railway 50,000 population has been added to the Territory, and these people are now building cities and peopling its valleys, carrying there wealth and advancement, creating farms, growing orchards, developing mines of fabulous wealth, and all this done by the best brains of New England and many other of the Northern States.

I appeal to the other side to say whether these 75,000, added to its population since 1880, our own brethren, American citizens, who when they left their homes were blessed with all the privileges of statehood, have done anything to forfeit their rights as American citizens by going into that Territory. Those people there say that they have not. I received this morning resolutions adopted by a convention held on the 10th of this month, at Santa Fé, in favor of statehood—vigorous, ringing resolutions, showing good reasons why, in the opinion of those people, that Territory should be admitted. Why should she not? Organized in 1850, she has since then seen seven States admitted into the Union from a Territorial condition. She has to-day a larger population than any Territory ever admitted as a State, if we except Texas and Maine. She certainly has wealth sufficient to entitle her to admission.

But, says my friend from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE], although we may concede that the elements of wealth to sustain statehood are there, yet there is so little intelligence among the people, so little education in her Legislature, that they quarrel and fritter away their time, and have in the last session of their Legislature—for there has been none since the one to which the gentleman refers—shown their inability to frame a revenue law adequate to the demands of that country. Well, the governor of that Territory did state, of course, what the gentleman has cited; but in his more recent report of 1888 he declares that public opinion is now wonderfully awakened on this subject, that everywhere the people see the necessity for such legislation, and that as soon as the Legislature again convenes, so great being the public interest in this question, he doubts not a suitable law to remedy this evil will be passed.

I am also informed by my friend Mr. JOSEPH, of New Mexico, that hitherto railroad property has not been assessed; that property is valued at some thirty millions or more of dollars. Hereafter it will be assessed, and when so done, will carry the assessed wealth of this Territory to between eighty and one hundred millions of dollars.

Furthermore, Governor Ross states this wealth other than the railroad is equitably distributed amongst the entire population of the Territory, and it is as fairly distributed in proportion to the number of people in the Territory as it is in any other Territory in the Union.

I want to call the attention of the House to the disingenuousness of the gentleman from Iowa, if he will pardon me for the assertion. The first extract my friend read from his own report, and which was copied from Governor Sheldon's report in 1884 made as governor of New Mexico, is as follows:

The people of the Territory have not for several years in the past been producing enough to supply the necessaries of life so far as food articles are concerned, but have been purchasing breadstuffs abroad which has depleted the country of cash. For several years the construction of railroads was extensive, which gave employment to a large number of people, and reliance was placed on this source of revenue to supply their wants. During the last eighteen months there has been little railroad building, and the cultivation of the soil having been neglected the people find themselves without much money. Hence trade is light and times are dull.

This was all he read. If he had read the next six lines he would have found the following antidote for the situation portrayed in the foregoing extract:

This year there has been a considerable increase in agricultural and fruit productions. From the very best information at command I am of the opinion that the production of cereals, vegetables, and fruits is nearly, if not quite, sufficient to supply the consumption of the people. There seems to be a general appreciation of the importance of these interests, and it may be expected that in future no money will be sent out of the country for articles of food that can be raised at home!

Now, a word as to what the gentleman said as to the ancient agricultural implements in use in the Territory of New Mexico. Of course no one can know just exactly what agricultural implements are in use in New Mexico unless he has seen them, and it is my belief from what I know that agricultural machinery has been taken into that Territory in sufficient quantity to answer all the requirements of the most improved cultivation of much of its cultivated soil. A son of mine travels for the firms of Deere & Co. and Deere, Mansur & Co., well-known firms in Illinois who are engaged in the sale of agricultural implements, and I understand they have supplied very largely to that Territory.

I have not the data at hand as to just what amount of improved agricultural machinery has been sent to New Mexico, but it has been going there beyond all doubt for a dozen years past and is going there every day, so that in my belief the Territory of New Mexico is fully up to the standard of most of the other Territories in supplying itself with all the necessary adjuncts of modern civilization so far as the cultivation of the soil is concerned. Of course gentlemen will understand that nearly all the machinery has been introduced there within the last ten or twelve years; that is, since the railroads were constructed and have been running into the Territory.

By the census of 1881 there were only 101,000 inhabitants there.

The governor in his last report states that the present estimate is 175,000 of population.

Now, I have an article here written by J. J. Fitzgerrell, member of the Territorial board of immigration, and who signs himself past department commander, New Mexico Grand Army of the Republic. In that article he states that he is a lifelong Republican, and went to New Mexico from Illinois. He states that the present population is estimated by the bureau of immigration at 204,040. I give it as my own opinion that the Territory of New Mexico in the last eight years has made more substantial progress than either Wyoming, Arizona, Idaho, or Montana not only in increase of population but also in all substantial developments necessary to permanent statehood. With her rich valleys and her capacity for irrigation, there are more elements for the future sustenance of a large population in New Mexico than in any of the other Territories I have named.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. You stated the amount of arable land was 40,000,000 acres. Now can you state how much of that arable land is under cultivation?

Mr. MANSUR. I do not know that I can state at this moment just how much is under cultivation. What investigation I have made has been on very short notice for the purpose of replying to my friend from Iowa. Indeed, what facts I have been able to gather have been the result of my work during the last few hours. I can not at present give an answer.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to an extract from the report of the governor just printed, the report for 1888, on the subject of education, in which Governor Ross says:

> The educational interests of the Territory have not been neglected. If there has not been that advancement that was hoped for substantial progress has been made. A compulsory school law was passed at the last session of the Legislature, but its conditions have been such that it has been practically inoperative, and yet it is a step in the right direction.
> On the whole, the school attendance has been increased, and larger amounts of money have been expended in the maintenance of the public schools. The number of schools has increased, as has also the number of denominational and parochial schools and the attendance thereon. Schools in the Territory generally are in a perceptibly better condition, and an increased and increasing public interest in the education of the youth is very manifest.

This is the latest official report made by one of the officers of the Government, who is in position to give definite information upon the subject.

Mr. WARNER. Will my colleague allow a suggestion?

Mr. MANSUR. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER. Can my colleague give any figures bearing upon this subject?

Mr. MANSUR. I have no figures at hand, but——

Mr. WARNER. I take it for granted that my colleague is familiar with the report of the auditor for 1886 and 1887, wherein it is shown that in New Mexico the total amount paid to school teachers for the year was, in round numbers, $33,000, and that there were but forty-one public school buildings in the Territory, or one to each 3,000 square miles of Territory. Is that the condition of things in the Territory that my colleague approves of?

Mr. MANSUR. That is one of the strongest reasons why this Territory should have the rights of statehood. Now, any donations or largesses of land to which she may be entitled under the general law when she shall be admitted as a State are not available. If we give her all of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of her vast area she will have money to go on and develop her school system, and will have means to aid in the advancement of the education of her people to a remarkable degree.

Mr. WARNER. Will my colleague allow another suggestion?

Mr. MANSUR. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER. The Territory of Dakota did not have any such provision, and did not have the lands, and yet she has expended about $2,000,000 for her public schools.

Mr. BUCKALEW. She had more taxable property.

Mr. MANSUR. The comparison may be to the advantage of Dakota. I know not how that may be, for I have not the figures at hand to compare the two; but I do know this, I know that South Dakota would be shorn of much of her reputation abroad if separated from North Dakota, for North Dakota grows all of the twenty millions or more of wheat which has made the name of Dakota famous the world over.

I understand also that up to four years ago—I do not know how it may be now—North Dakota paid more taxes than South Dakota. But that is altogether an agricultural country, and the people reside generally in settlements and they close up the gap and keep together, and therefore they can have numerous schools. But here is a Territory with a population of 175,000, and 125,000 square miles of territory, mountainous, uncrossable, and inaccessible in many parts, and therefore you can not have the same number of schools there under the circumstances that exist in her Territorial condition that you can have in a smooth, level, agricultural country like Northern Dakota.

But, Mr. Speaker, the increase in the number of schools of both kinds in this Territory under the compulsory law shows, and I think in the opinion of everybody present it will be conceded, that the Territory is making rapid and laudable strides to a better condition.

My friend, Mr. STRUBLE, stated also as his last objection, and I believe it is the last to which I shall call the attention of the House, "that the character of her people was such as to militate against her admission as a State," and that this character which he has assigned to her people as now constituted did not fit them for successful self-government. What has brought about this remarkable change since 1876, when the Senate by a two-thirds vote wanted them in, or what has brought about the change since 1874, when both Houses of Congress by a three-fourths majority wanted them in? We can not say it has been a change in the climate, for if there has been a change that way it is a change for the better, for the annual rainfall has increased from 17 inches to 23 inches in the last five years.

The only thing that is different now in her condition from that time is this: There has been an influx of some 75,000 of our Northern citizens, and they must have made the change, but they are all Republicans and all Democrats alike, and this House will be slow to believe any such proposition as that. No; on the contrary, the fact that there have been 75,000 of the best and bravest spirits of the country within eight years past seeking this Territory to make homes and fit it for future statehood is a reason why they ought to be admitted. In more than one-half of the counties in this Territory to-day, according to the last statistics, the Americans, if you please to call them so in contradistinction to the term "Mexicans," are now predominating. Not only that, but the majority of these men are Republicans. This is shown to be the fact, for the Territorial Legislatures for the last three or four sessions have been essentially Republican; and if you shall say that many of the Mexicans, a majority, perhaps, are Democrats, then you ought to say at once that many of the other element, which are in the majority, are Republicans.

But let me call your attention, in concluding, to a statement made by Mr. Fitzgerrell over his own signature, which I find published in the edition of the Weekly Optic of January 10, 1889.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair). The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. MANSUR. I would like, then, to print a brief extract from this letter.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I ask unanimous consent that my friend from Missouri have leave to finish his remarks.

Mr. MANSUR. I will not longer detain the House, but will print with my remarks in the RECORD the entire letter of Mr. Fitzgerrell.

It is as follows:

EAST LAS VEGAS, January 3, 1889.

Editor Chicago Tribune:

In your issue of December 25 you publish my letter, written by me as an old Illinois soldier, a life-long Republican, and a resident of Las Vegas for the past eight years. In publishing my letter and in your editorial reply you insert several interrogation points, and dispute the statements made by myself and other New Mexico correspondents. The impression created in my mind by your editorial is that if the statements made by the citizens of New Mexico are true New Mexico is entitled to statehood; not being true, she must be kept in a Territorial condition until her citizens can tell the truth. You say, "Party reasons should cut no figure in admitting Territories." That is right. But New Mexico is safely Republican for time to come, because her mining, agricultural, horticultural, and manufacturing industries demand protection. This is shown by her Legislature for a number of years past. Her present Legislature, too, is two-thirds Republican in both houses. The Republican party in the United States can not possibly object to the admission of New Mexico on party grounds.

You say, "Dakota does not urge her case because she has thousands of Sioux (Indians) within her borders whom she does not count, but because she has over one-half million of Americans. Montana and Washington do not include or base their claim upon their Indian population, but upon their American and white inhabitants. It is not right that New Mexico should enumerate her ignorant, mongrel, foreign-speaking Greasers in order to qualify on a representative basis for admission."

In your issue of December 20 you say: "Much time must elapse before this dense mass of Spanish-Aztec (Aztec means the Pueblo Indian) alien ignorance and superstition can be sufficiently infused with intelligence by the operation of immigration to entitle New Mexico to such an honor. To couple the weak, stagnant, mentally childish, unproductive rubbish population with the enterprising, energetic, industrious, and rapidly-increasing population of the magnificent Dakotas, and make the admission of the latter dependent upon that of the wretched, imbecile character of the former, or to demand their admission at the same time, is not only ridiculous but insulting."

New Mexico does not count the wild or Pueblo (called Aztec) Indians in her population. They are not taxed and are by law prohibited from voting. They never in one single instance attempted to exercise any of the rights of citizenship, all statements to the contrary notwithstanding.

The population in 1880, not counting a single wild or Pueblo Indian, was 119,565. The semi-decennial census of 1885 shows a population of over 134,000, an increase of 15,000 in five years. Since 1885 the growth of population has far exceeded that of the five years preceding 1885. The increase has been principally farmers, horticulturists, miners, capitalists, and active business men, generally from the New England, Middle, and Western States, drawn here through the influence of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad—the same class that have peopled the State of Kansas. They are largely the old soldier population, and none are from the slums of Europe, such as are dumped by the thousands in the Northwest.

Carefully prepared statistics just issued by the Territorial bureau of immigration place the population for 1889 at 204,040, an increase of 84,475 since 1880. As an illustration of the character of the increased population, there were eleven hundred homestead, pre-emption, and other land entries made at the Santa Fé land office during the last twelve months. One single township within 20 miles of Las Vegas one year ago did not contain one land entry; now it contains thirty-six entries by actual settlers. This is but a sample of the actual settlements made by farmers throughout New Mexico. The days of range cattle here in New Mexico are ending.

The best indications of the actual increase in population is shown by comparison of the vote cast in 1886 and 1888, showing a net increase of 4,045 votes. This will show the estimated population by the bureau of immigration for 1889, at 204,040, to be a conservative estimate.

An analysis of the census for 1885 shows the Mexican population to be about 101,000. They polled about 19,000 votes, and are practically at a stand-still. With an American population of about 75,000, nearly one-half the votes cast at the last election were cast by Americans from the East. Not by a naturalized European rabble element. In almost one-half the counties in New Mexico the American vote predominates to-day. With a rapid increase of American population, there can be no doubt that the next United States census will show a majority of American voting population.

By the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo with Mexico, in 1848, the admission of New Mexico as a State was guarantied. In 1850 a Territorial government was given New Mexico.

During General Grant's administration, in 1874, a bill was passed by a Republican Congress, to admit New Mexico as a State, by a two-thirds vote in each House, but failed to become a law for lack of agreement between the Houses in the matter of detail in the process of admission.

In 1876 the bill for the admission of New Mexico passed the Senate by a large majority, but failed in the House for want of action.

California was admitted in 1850 with a population of 92,597; Minnesota in 1858, with 120,000; Oregon in 1859, with 50,000; Kansas in 1861, with 107,000; Nevada in 1864, with 40,000; Nebraska in 1867, with 100,000: and Colorado in 1876, with 100,000. New Mexico, with her population of 175,000, is as well equipped for self-government as any people who now seek admission. Of the 75,000 American population the facts are that they are composed largely of the soldier element, reinforced by the young, active, progressive, enterprising, farmer, horticulturist, miner, and capitalist who have come to till the soil, develop the mines, and add to the material wealth and prosperity of the Territory.

The assessed valuation of New Mexico is $43,151,920, not including railroad property amounting to over $30,000,000. This does not include fully $10,000,000 valuation of unadjudicated private land-grants that escape assessment. By careful comparison with the assessed valuation and population of other Territories seeking admission, as shown by Bradstreet's report, it is found the per capita valuation of wealth in New Mexico is equal to that of the other Territories.

The Territorial census of 1885 also shows the rate of illiteracy was reduced 20 per cent. The ratio of reduction since 1885 has been much greater. This arises from various causes.

In 1874, when the Congress of the United States by vote deemed New Mexico worthy to be admitted to statehood, she cast a little over 15,000 votes; the population being almost entirely of Mexican descent. Hence, if New Mexico is not entitled to statehood to-day, it must be for the want of intelligence, virtue, and fitness for self-government of her 75,000 American population, who have immigrated into New Mexico since that time. In 1874 and 1876 there was not a single foot of railroad built within her borders. The only means of communication was by bull-trains and the stage-coach. To-day there are over 1,300 miles of railroad in active operation; with a number of well-built, active, enterprising American cities, built of brick, stone, and wood; with watering-places, health-resorts, and hotels, for size, beauty, and elegance of appointments equal to those of the large cities of the New England States.

The physical resources of New Mexico are to-day equal to those of any Territory at the time of admission to statehood. She is superior to many in her agricultural and horticultural resources. Her coal and mineral resources are superior to any, while her climatic condition excels any portion of the United States, as shown by the mortality table of the United States census for 1880. Death rate per 10,000 from the dread diseases of consumption, pneumonia, and diphtheria: New Mexico is the lowest, with a death-rate of 17.97; Wisconsin, 35.37; Washington, 35.93; California, 36.86; Illinois, 37.18; Dakota, 38.99; Colorado, 46.27; New York, 46.80; Maine, 51.79; Utah, the highest, 76.47.

The record of the United States Signal Service at Fort Union, N. Mex., shows the range of the thermometer is limited and the seasons remarkably uniform. The clear days, without a single cloud, preponderate. The average annual sunshine of New Mexico exceeds that of Central Park, New York, 50 per cent.; and that of Greenwich Observatory, in England, 112 per cent. The annual average temperature is 50.6°; the coldest month is January, with 31°; the warmest, July, 79.70°. But little snow or rain falls during the eight fall, winter, and spring months, leaving the husbandman, the miner, and the business man free to pursue his labors with comfort. The annual rainfall during the past few years was 21.19 inches; for the ten years preceding 1883 the annual average rainfall was 17.68 inches, a gain of 6.49 inches in three years. The rainy season comes annually during the months of June, July, August, and September, with annual average during the last three years for the months named of 13.85 inches. The lowest rainfall for the month of August for the past thirteen years was 4.76 inches, the highest 8.04 inches. While the annual average rainfall is lower than in the States, the rainfall in New Mexico is greater during the months that produce crops than in the States. Experience shows it is a matter of proper preparation of the soil and planting, according to the seasons as they exist, to produce abundant crops without irrigation. Rains are more sure in New Mexico during the crop-producing months than in the States. Agriculturist and horticulturist prefer to use irrigation when practical, for the reason that with irrigation abundant crops are absolutely insured one year with another. With her mountain ranges and a system of water storage ample water supply can be secured.

There are 60,000,000 acres of tillable land in New Mexico, capable of furnishing homes for 2,000,000 inhabitants, not counting the vast population engaged in mining, manufacturing, merchandising, the professions, and in other lines of business. There are over 12,000,000 acres of timbered lands, millions of acres of which are covered with as fine yellow pine as grows in Georgia or Alabama.

The attention of the American agriculturists and horticulturists is but just being called to the grand possibilities of New Mexico. Only during the past three years with the introduction of improved agricultural implements and planting according to the seasons, have the grand possibilities of New Mexico been shown in the production of abundant crops of a superior quality and quantity of wheat, both spring and winter, oats, rye, barley, buckwheat, hemp, hops, flax, castor beans, sorghum, broom-corn, and gouber peas or peanuts.

While we can not enter into details of the amounts produced in bushels and pounds per acre, the challenge is made to the agriculturist and horticulturist of the Eastern, Middle, and Western States to stand up the exhibits made in different New Mexico fairs against the exhibit made in the different State fairs. New Mexico will take the blue ribbon with ease, all reports and statements to the contrary notwithstanding. Many cereals produce two crops per year, such as oats, rye, and barley. In hay crops, from three to five crops per year can be cut of alfalfa, espercette, clover, etc. Of these feeds, as grown here, 2 tons by actual feeding test will fatten a steer for the market.

Over the Northwest, which for many winter months is blizzard-cursed, by which life and property are destroyed, and disease and death are produced, while during the summer months it is the breeding-ground for cyclones, by which terror is struck to the stoutest hearts, and of droughts and overpowering heats, the advantage of New Mexico over these regions to horticulturists, agriculturists, gardeners, and vine-growers are as follows:

First. Greater certainty of producing abundant crops of all kinds by rainfall without irrigation, and absolute certainty with irrigation.

Second. Owing to the superior soil and climatic condition the grain is heavy, plump, and bright; the straw and hay cure better, contain more saccharine matter, and remain green and bright for feed. In the case of fruits, freedom from blight, worms, and pests, a superior delicacy in taste and flavor. In the case of vegetables, the size, weight, and quality are simply astonishing, requiring personal inspection to believe the truth.

Third. A home market at advanced prices for all her products for many years to come, to miners and other non-producing classes of people. While the husbandmen in the Northwest must contend with blizzards in winter, cyclones, sunstroke, and droughts in summer, the husbandman in New Mexico pursues his daily vocations with comfort every day in the year, free from winter's cold and summer's heat. With us blizzards, cyclones, and sunstrokes are absolutely unknown.

It appears to the citizens of New Mexico that no portion of the United States has been so foully and maliciously misrepresented. It is still maintained that New Mexico is a barren, waterless, treeless waste. Hear William E. Dane, in the bureau of irrigation paper just issued. He says: "For thirty years I fed cattle and hogs in Iowa. Becoming disgusted with the cold and with the stock business, I provided myself with improved agricultural impliments, and came to New Mexico. In 1887 I put 450 acres of corn, oats, barley, and alfalfa, and found I produced more feed and a better quality, without irrigation, than I did in Iowa. Last winter I fattened 120 head of steers on one-third of the feed it required to fatten cattle in Iowa. The winter is about right for feeding; the climate is dry, clear, bracing, and healthful, with almost constant sunshine. I sowed oats and barley in July and August last. They harvested from 40 to 60 bushels to the acre in November. I have cut 2 to 3 tons of oat hay to the acre since the election, and am generally well pleased with farming in New Mexico." The experience of Mr. Dane is but one among thousands in New Mexico.

MINING RESOURCES.

The mining resources of New Mexico are in their infancy. The deepest mines are but a few hundred feet deep. Enough has been developed to show that no portion of the United States possesses greater or richer fields with the advantages of an all-the-year-round climate for mining operations. Mineral is found in every county. Large fields of gold, silver, copper, lead, zinc, coal, and other less valuable minerals are known to be on Government lands, that are practically valueless on account of the distance from railroad transportation and the want of the means to mine or wash out the gold, as in placer mining. Let an investigator visit the mining camps and he will be struck with the richness of the yields, and with the fact that the country has not even been prospected yet. Up to two years ago the hostile Indians scalped the miners and ranchmen within sight of the mining camps and of many of the leading towns, and held undisputed sway over millions of acres of valuable mineral and farming lands. The output of precious metals during 1888 will fall but little short of $10,000,000, while large amounts of high-grade ores have been shipped to reduction works in Colorado, Texas, and elsewhere, for which credit is given elsewhere. Large and valuable deposits of iron and coal, both anthracite and bituminous, of a superior quality, equal to the best in Pennsylvania, are known to exist, and are now partially opened.

With the building of new railroads the development of new mining districts will follow, building up cities where now the wild animals are the only occupants. At present the leading mining camps and reduction works are at White Oaks, Socorro, Silver City, Kingston, Hillsborough, Cerrillos, Chloride, Fairview, Magdalena, Nogal, Glorieta, Elizabethtown, Lake Valley, and Organ.

It appears to the citizens of New Mexico that no portion of the United States has ever been so foully, maliciously, and undeservedly maligned and misrepresented as New Mexico. In case her enemies still maintain that the statements made in this paper are not true, the writer would refer to the following-named gentlemen for confirmation: Hon. F. A. Manzanares, ex-member of Congress; Hon. E. V. Long, chief-justice for New Mexico; Jefferson Reynolds, banker; G. W. Hartman, merchant and farmer; Edward Haren, Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad, Las Vegas; Hon. E. S. Stover, ex-lieutenant governor of Kansas; Hon. W. S. Burk, editor and farmer; Hon. J. G. Albright, editor of Democrat, Albuquerque; Col. G. W. Morman, Laguna; Hon. Henry Lockhart, hotel man and capitalist, Col. J. A. Bahney, postmaster, Hon. J. C. Woodyard, druggist, Socorro; William Locke, merchant and stockman, Farmington, N. Mex.; Hon. A. Gusdoff, capitalist and ranchman, Taos; J. B. Dawson, farmer, W. E. Dane, farmer, Cimoliro; M. W. Mills, attorney, Springer; F. R. Butler, editor, Hon. H. Wigham, secretary Maxwell Grant Company, Raton; Col. C. M. Shannon, capitalist, Col. J. C. Miller, miner, Silver City; Norman C. Raff, banker, Col. J. P. Hyland, miner, Kingston; William H. Weed, merchant, Lee H. Rudisell, merchant, White Oaks; J. C. Lea, ranchman, E. T. Stone, ranchman, Roswell; S. V. Axtell, ex-chief-justice, L. Bradford Prince, ex-chief-justice, E. G. Ross, governor, Santa Fé.

THE MEXICAN PEOPLE.

The Americans that know the Mexican people the best are their warmest defenders. It comes with as bad grace for an American to call a Mexican a Greaser, etc., as for a Mexican to call an American a Gringo, etc. Both utterances are in bad taste when used in calling American-born fellow-citizens names.

Every Mexican born in New Mexico during the last forty years is as much an American citizen as if born in Boston. In 1848, cut off from Mexico by the fortunes of war, and isolated from the States of the Union as an advanced outpost of civilization, surrounded on all sides by a warlike, stealthy, treacherous Indian foe that greatly outnumbered them, the war-whoop of the Comanche, Apache, Cheyenne, Navajo, and other hostile tribes constantly in their ears, the only means of communication with their Government and to the first outpost of civilization was by bull trains and the stage coach over 1,000 miles of a trackless, waste country to Fort Leavenworth, on the Missouri River.

The bloody trail left by Victorio, Geronimo, and other hostile chiefs shows at what fearful cost of life and treasures these people have maintained themselves, and at the same time supported their little ones, with none of the opportunities to educate their children, as enjoyed by their fellow-citizens in the East, who now call them ignorant Greasers. For forty years the strong arm of the Government failed to notice them, and only until two years ago, with the aid of the volunteer militia, in which the American citizen of Mexican descent bore an honorable and conspicuous part, was the last hostile Indian corraled.

During the dark days of the rebellion these people volunteered for the defense of our flag and country, with a patriotism and devotion unexcelled, in proportion to their number, by any portion of our country. The bones of their heroes lie bleaching on Val Verde, Glorieta, and other hard-fought battle-fields, defeating the well-appointed armies of the Confederacy, and maintaining New Mexico in her allegiance to the Government.

The writer has sat on juries of his peers in the courts of Illinois, and has sat on juries in New Mexico, with the citizens sneeringly called Greasers. He is free to say the Mexican jurors grasped the evidence and law points presented by the judge in his charge to the jury as fully as their American brothers, and were as much and as obstinately divided among themselves as the American jurors were among themselves.

The Mexican citizen makes an honest, conscientious juror. The record of crime among the Mexican people is far less than among the American people. Now that opportunities for the education of their children are presented no people are more eager to avail themselves of such opportunities. None make better students. The proceedings of the courts of New Mexico are conducted in the English language. Interpreters are used here the same as in the courts of Chicago, when a witness or juror does not clearly understand the use of the English tongue; to the contrary notwithstanding.

It is respectfully submitted that the American-born citizen of Mexican descent, born within the past forty years, who knows no other flag than the Stars and Stripes, whose patriotism has stood the crucial test of war and been found true as steel, whose life has been one of constant warfare for its defense and preservation, is more entitled to and is more capable of the self-government that comes from statehood than are the hundreds and thousands of Danes, Norwegians, Swedes, Polanders, Hungarians, Slavonians, Italians, Russians, etc., who are landed at Castle Garden, on contract and otherwise, and railroaded by trainloads to the Northwest; who know nothing of the English language, and never will learn it; who know nothing of American institutions, who never had one single heart-beat in sympathy with the principles of universal liberty; do not know its meaning; whose steps never have and never will keep time to the music of the whole Union; who never gave a prayer for the preservation of the Government during her days of trial.

Their virtue, intelligence, and devotion to the principles of self-government are not to be named in the same category nor spoken of in the same connection as the American citizen of Mexican descent, whose blood has been shed and whose baptism by fire has sealed his devotion to this Government and the principles of universal freedom.

This rabble from the slums of Europe, who, if naturalized, are voted like cattle at so much per head, in their education and feeling have nothing in common with American institutions. They come to this country from various causes, hoping in some blind way to better their condition, as shown by recent Congressional investigation. The spectacle of bribery and corruption among such people at elections would cause our Mexican people to stand aghast with horror, as the Mexican people have political convictions of their own, and, having them, they dare as American freeman to exercise them.

LET JUSTICE BE DONE.

Since New Mexico became a Territory seven Territories have been admitted to statehood, not one of them possessing the qualifications of population, wealth, natural resources, and possibilities of New Mexico. None have been more patriotic or more devoted to our flag and country. Let even-handed justice be done New Mexico by her admission into the sisterhood of States by the present Congress. It will at once give strength to immigration, stimulate industrial pursuits, develop our vast mineral resources, and give a prosperity to our people, whose blessings will fall as the gentle dew on the heads of her friends who in the Congress of the United States do even and exact justice to her liberty-loving people.

Respectfully submitted.

J. J. FITZGERRELL,
Member Territorial Board of Immigration, Past Department Commander New Mexico, Grand Army of the Republic.

VETO MESSAGES.

The following messages were severally laid before the House, read, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 7, entitled "An act granting a pension to Thomas B. Walsh."

This beneficiary enlisted January 1, 1864, and was discharged August 1, 1865.

He is reported absent without leave in April, 1864, and further recorded as having deserted November 24, 1864. He was restored to duty in May, 1865, by the President's proclamation.

He filed an application for pension in December, 1881, alleging that he contracted rheumatism in May, 1865.

This statement of the claimant and nearly if not all the evidence in the case which tends to show the incurrence of the disability complained of, appears to fix its appearance at a date very near the return of the beneficiary after his desertion.

In these circumstances the proof of disability, such as it is, is as consistent with its incurrence during desertion as it is with the theory that the beneficiary suffered therefrom as the result of honorable military service.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 16, 1889.

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 2236, entitled "An act granting a pension to Eli J. Yamgheim."

The beneficiary named in this bill filed an application for pension in the Pension Bureau April 15, 1875, basing his claim upon an alleged wound of his left leg from a spent ball, about October 15, 1861.

There is no record of his incurring any wound or injury during his service, and it does not appear that the company to which he belonged was in action nearer to the date he specifies than September 17, 1861, and his captain testifies that the beneficiary was not injured in the engagement of that day, which lasted only about fifteen minutes.

The proof taken in the case establishes that before enlistment the beneficiary had a sore on his leg which was quite troublesome, which suppurated, and after healing would break out again.

In the medical examinations made during the pendency of the claim the diseased leg was always found, but no mention is made of any other injury, and no other injury seems to have been discoverable.

I can not avoid the conviction upon the facts presented that whatever disability has existed since the discharge of the beneficiary arose from causes which were present before enlistment, and that the same is not chargeable to his military service.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 16, 1889.

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 4887, entitled "An act granting a pension to Charles E. Scott."

This beneficiary entered the volunteer service nearly at the close of the war of the rebellion, and served from the 8th day of March, 1865, to July 24, in the same year, a period of four months and sixteen days.

He filed a claim for pension in 1884, alleging that he incurred camp itch in July, 1865, which resulted in partial blindness.

Upon the proof presented, and after examination, the claim was rejected upon the ground that it did not appear that the impairment of his vision was the result of any incident of his Army service.

I am entirely satisfied that this was a correct disposition of the case, and that upon the same ground the bill herewith returned should not be approved.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 16, 1889.

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 8469 entitled "An act for the relief of Michael Pigott."

This bill appropriates the sum of $48 to the beneficiary therein named, formerly the postmaster at Quincy, Ill., which was paid by him for the use of a telephone for the year ending June 30, 1873.

There is evidently a mistake made in the statement of the period covered by the use of this telephone, for the official term of the beneficiary extended from May 16, 1881, to June 18, 1885.

Assuming, however, that it was intended to describe the period ending June 30, 1883, it appears that the use of a telephone during that time was wholly unauthorized by the Post-Office Department, and that the only authority given for any expenditure for that purpose covered the period of one year from the 1st day of January, 1884.

The following letter, dated July 16, 1884, was sent to the beneficiary from the salary and allowance division of the Post-Office Department:

"In reply to your letter relative to amounts disallowed for use of telephone for your office, you are informed that the said expenditures were made without the authority of this office, and it is therefore deemed advisable not to approve the same.

"Your authority for a telephone was for one year beginning January 1, 1884. At the expiration of the time named, if you desire to continue the telephone service, you should make application to the First Assistant Postmaster-General for a renewal of the same."

The multitude of claims of the same kind which the legislation proposed would breed and encourage and the absolute necessity, in the interest of good administration, of limiting all public officers to authorized expenditures constrains me to withhold my approval from this bill.

PANAMA CANAL.

The following message from the President was laid before the House, read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have the honor to lay before you a report from the Secretary of State, with the accompanying correspondence in relation to the possible disturbances on the Isthmus of Panama in the event of the stoppage of work on the proposed interoceanic canal.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, 16th January, 1889.

To the President:

I have the honor to transmit, with a view of its communication to Congress, a copy of a dispatch just received from the consul-general at Panama, which indicates an apprehension on the part of the local authorities along the route of the proposed interoceanic canal of disturbances among the varied populations which have been employed on that enterprise in the probable contingency of a cessation of the work.

The exigency referred to by Mr. Adamson is peculiar; and as I am unaware of the existence of any fund which could lawfully be applied to aid in the deportation of American citizens from foreign countries when they are not mariners, nor are connected with the public service, it has been considered proper that the discretion of Congress should be consulted, in order that an adequate sum of money may by their action be placed under the direction of the Executive to be applied to the humane and charitable purposes indicated in the correspondence.

In this connection it may be well to take into consideration the obligation of the United States under the treaty of 1846 with New Granada in relation to maintaining an unembarrassed route of transit of the Isthmus of Panama in the locality in question.

It will be remembered that in 1885 it became necessary for the United States to send sufficient forces to the Isthmus for the purpose of performing their duty under treaty, to suppress disorder at that point.

Respectfully submitted.

T. F. BAYARD.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 15, 1889.

Mr. Adamson to Mr. Rives.

CONSULATE-GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Panama, January 3, 1889. [Received January 14.]

SIR: Under date of the 2d instant the secretary-general of the department of Panama addressed to me a letter, as per copy herewith, showing that the local government fears that disturbances of the public peace may follow the suspension of work on the Panama Canal, which suspension is expected soon.

In view of what may be anticipated, the governor of the department suggests that the foreign consuls should solicit authority from their respective governments to send home their countrymen who may thus be deprived of the means of subsistence.

I acknowledged the receipt of the letter of the secretary-general, as per copy, and now submit the matter for your consideration. The work on the locks still continues, and it is understood that Mr. Eiffel, contractor for that part of the work, had a large advance placed to his credit with a third party before he commenced. The supposition is that he will continue until that advance is exhausted.

Work has stopped at Bas Obispo and will be stopped at Culebra on the 5th instant.

We appear to be on the verge of a crisis, and grave results may well be apprehended.

Fortunately there are comparatively few Americans employed on the canal, but those few will surely demand my aid.

Whatever may occur, I shall do my best for the protection of American interests here, and hope to merit a continuance of that kind support heretofore given to me.

I am, etc.,

THOMAS ADAMSON,
Consul-General.

[Inclosure No. 1.—Translation.]

Mr. De Fabrega to Mr. Adamson.

[Republic of Colombia, government of the department of Panama, secretaryship-general. Department of government, bureau of public order. Circular No. 1.]

SIR: I have been instructed by his excellency the governor to direct to you the present circular with the object of learning, in all courtesy, the steps which you will take in the events which may result from the suspension of the canal works, thus leaving without employment a considerable number of laborers, the majority of whom derive their sustenance from daily work.

The government has unquestionably the duty of maintaining peace and order, and, with the necessary elements, relies upon doing so, and though desirous of avoiding severe measures, will not omit any effort which permits a proper and peaceable solution.

His excellency the governor thinks that an understanding between the consuls with the local government to ship away their respective countrymen appears to offer the most convenient measure which could be adopted, and as it is supposed that you have received no instructions upon this matter, it would be desirable to notify your Government of the anticipated emergency, and to ask definite orders, so as to co-operate in the solution as above indicated.

In the name of his excellency the governor I must say to you that the local government will at all peril comply with its duties, and will maintain peace and order in the Isthmian territory, no matter how painful may be the measures it may feel obliged to adopt, thereby protesting against any responsibility which it might be claimed to result from the measures adopted.

Please acknowledge the receipt of this, and accept, etc.,

FRANCO DE FABREGA, JR.

[Inclosure No. 2.]

UNITED STATES CONSULATE-GENERAL AT PANAMA, January 2, 1889.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your official communication of this day's date, informing me that his excellency the governor desires to know what measures this consulate-general will take in case that the operations of the canal company should be suspended and the laborers on said enterprise be thus deprived of the means of subsistence.

I note with pleasure that while the government acknowledges it to be its duty to maintain peace and order and has the elements necessary for this purpose it desires to avoid severe measures and will spare no efforts to bring about a proper and peaceable solution of the case.

I also note the opinion of his excellency the governor that an understanding between the consuls and the local government, with a view to the removal of the laborers, appears to be the most feasible plan; wherefore he suggests that the governments of the respective consuls be notified of the emergency which it is expected may arise, and that they ask for definite instructions in the case.

I note also that his excellency the governor is firmly resolved to maintain peace and order on this Isthmus, and that he disclaims any responsibility for the results of the measures which may be adopted.

In acknowledging the receipt of your very important communication, I limit myself, for the present, to saying that I shall send a copy thereof to my Government immediately and await instructions.

I am, etc.,

THOMAS ADAMSON,
Consul-General.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I desire to yield thirteen minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HERMANN]. When he shall have finished I will resume the floor.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the kindness of the gentleman from New York; but as much has been already said on this great question I shall not ask the indulgence of the House for even the limited time so kindly allotted me. Cordially uniting with my associates as to the advisability of an immediate admission into the Union of Dakota, Montana, and Washington, I desire more particularly to address the House as to the latter Territory, though I should, in justice, even favor an enabling act for Idaho and Wyoming.

No State, sir, feels so deep an interest in the admission of Washington Territory as the State which I have the honor to represent.

For over 325 miles the great Columbia River is a common boundary. The same mountain ranges which divide Oregon into its principal parts also divide Washington Territory, producing the same climatic changes and conditions and yielding substantially the same productions. The resources are likewise similar, and wonderful in each. Our commercial interests are largely reciprocal. This Territory was once a portion of the Oregon Territory, and the struggling trials and privations in the early settlement of each were borne by a common people. This indicates briefly the bonds which unite us, and explains the universal desire among our people for the admission of this Territory into the Union of States. The people of this great section now number at least two hundred thousand and the increase is continuous and large. They embrace the best elements of the Eastern population—the moral, the intelligent, the progressive, the energetic, and the inventive.

Capital from every portion of the Union is seeking investment there in the vast coal fields, the lumbering mills and camps, the fisheries, the gold and iron ore mines, the railroads, the shipping, and the manufacturing, grazing, and agricultural interests. No stronger proof of these various industries can be presented than that shown in the assessment-rolls of the Territory. That for 1887 exhibits assessable property to the extent of $61,562,739, and still later exhibits are here for 1888, which show a further remarkable increase. I have not the exact figures at hand. When we are reminded that assessments as usually made represent less than 50 per cent. of the actual value, it can be seen that the full property value is over $100,000,000. This does not include millions of rich acres of the Northern Pacific land grant, the immense value of which I do not pretend to approximate. The increase of population as well as the material riches since 1880 has simply been phenomenal. But one other Territory excels her.

The commercial importance of Washington Territory is as far different from as it exceeds that of all the other Territories. It is the only Territory yet remaining which has a coast line. All others are interior. In the light of her ocean commerce she presents a record that stands out in astonishment even to the great States of the Union. This has been well adverted to by the honorable gentleman representing her on this floor, but it is so important that I may be pardoned for a second reference.

Quoting from the statistics of the Puget Sound customs district we find that—

1. In the number of American steam-vessels engaged in the foreign trade, this Territory stands first.
2. In tonnage of American steam-vessels engaged in the foreign trade, second only to New York.
3. In the aggregate number of American and foreign steam-vessels engaged in the foreign trade, second only to New York.
4. In the aggregate tonnage of American and foreign steam-vessels engaged in the foreign trade, seventh.
5. In the aggregate number of entrances and clearances of American and foreign vessels, steam and sail, fourth.
6. In the aggregate tonnage of all vessels, American and foreign, steam and sail, seventh.

The revenue annually collected in the Treasury through the custom-house now exceeds one-quarter of a million of dollars.

Over two thousand vessels have entered and cleared during the past year, and this, of course, does not include an immense fleet of coasting vessels under license.

The export trade amounts to over ten millions of dollars. This alone affords the strongest showing of the immense resources of the Territory already being utilized by her busy and energetic population.

In 1853 Washington was separated from the Oregon Territory and organized as a separate Territory, and for thirty-six years has remained such and been subjected to all the inconveniences and obstacles which always attend Territorial limitation. In view, however, of the marvelous development made, with all these disabilities to retard her, what further aggrandizement would she not have achieved by this time had she been favored but for half of this interval with the advantages of statehood. Six years after the separation of the two Territories Oregon was admitted into the Union, while Washington still remains, with all her magnificent development and nearly one-fifth of a million in population, a mere province so to speak, among States many of which she far exceeds. In the face of such a record what becomes of that compact in the fundamental laws of the Republic as to that great expanse of empire west of the Mississippi?

Whenever any of said States shall have 60,000 free inhabitants therein such State shall be admitted by its delegates into the Congress of the United States on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever.

Judged in a political or national sense every consideration of public duty pleads in behalf of prompt and unconditional admission. Indeed, the long delays already suffered reflect no credit on the majority in this Congress thus far. Washington Territory should have been a State in this Union ten years ago, and then would have exceeded the wealth as well as population of most of the States of the Union at the time of their admission.

Lying as she does, contiguous to a foreign power, with numerous conflicting interests, inviting serious contention at any time, it is highly essential that her people be clothed with those higher powers which enable a State to put forth greater and more immediate defenses than when a mere Territorial body. Her people have discussed this question of admission for many years, and now there exists a perfect unanimity of sentiment. There is no dissension either as to the boundaries, the form and substance of the organic act, or as to the necessity or expediency of immediate admission. In conventions, in legislative sessions, and in the elections this sentiment has repeatedly been expressed. It is not a question there between Democrats and Republicans, nor should it be in this body. It is a question for every citizen impartially to consider. There is to-day throughout our whole nation not a single valid reason or objection urged against admission. All parties are now in favor of it, and there are no constitutional impediments existing, while every argument of local benefit to the people directly concerned, as well as that greater benefit which appeals to every patriotic American, earnestly and loudly protests against further delays.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I desire to invite the attention of the House for a few moments to the real question at issue.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Before the gentleman begins I should like to ask him if it is the intention to press this matter to a vote this evening?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. It is the intention to press this matter to a vote at the earliest possible hour. The chairman of the committee is better able to state when that will be than I.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to have disposed of this evening the formal amendments which were submitted by the Delegate from Dakota to the Senate bill, so as to perfect that bill, as the friends of the bill desire that it should be perfected, and thus make it possible for me to submit the substitute which I intend to submit at the proper time, and take a vote as early as possible.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Is it the purpose to submit the substitute to-night?

Mr. SPRINGER. It would be to-night, if possible.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desire to invite the attention of the House for a few moments to the real question at issue. The debate thus far has proceeded upon the proposition presented by the so-called "omnibus bill." The House has been instructed in the situation as regards the claims to statehood of Montana, Washington, and New Mexico; while Arizona and Idaho have also advised us that they are getting ready to demand membership into the family of States. Utah also urges her claims. My idea of our duty is that we should speed the coming of every new State when assured that the proper conditions exist; that a Territorial government should be tolerated and continued so long as the people thereof are too few in number and too scant in resources, material, moral and otherwise, to maintain a strong and healthy State.

A Territory is acquired to become a State and not to be held as a colony and governed by Congress with absolute authority.

This has been and is the policy of the Republican party. For four years we have vainly endeavored to exemplify it in the case of South Dakota, but have encountered so many obstructions along the way that all efforts thus far have been in vain.

My views as to the claims of South Dakota were fully expressed in the speech delivered by me during the present Congress, in May last, upon the bill presented by me, which had been reported adversely by the House Committee on Territories, and which is the same bill subsequently passed by the Senate and allowed to slumber in committee until the 17th of December, when, under the influence of the recent Presidential contest, as I take it, the honorable chairman of the committee was persuaded to request that the Committee on Territories be discharged from the further consideration thereof and that it be made a special and continuing order for the next and succeeding days of the session until disposed of, with leave to offer as a substitute therefor the "omnibus bill," to which attention has mainly been directed by the debate thus far had.

The real question before us, then, is the passage of the pending Senate bill for the immediate admission of South Dakota, a new State created by carving out of the great Territory of Dakota the southern half thereof, embracing a State which in area will rank eighth in the Union, and in material and other respects to-day ranks ahead of many of the older States. Theirs is a contest for home rule. A new State embracing a population of about 400,000 people of push and enterprise, with an area of about 77,000 square miles, with wonderful resources, as I have shown on a former occasion, has for a decade been denied admission to the Union upon grounds and for reasons that are unworthy in the extreme.

The resolution of the 17th of December also provided that after this bill should have been considered the House would go on and consider until disposed of other bills for the admission of new States. The only State asking admission with a constitution already adopted by the people is the State of South Dakota, except, perhaps, Montana. For several years, ever since 1885, South Dakota has been knocking at the doors of Congress for admission to the Union. The proposition has been antagonized on the Democratic side of the House with propositions of different kinds, so that in one way and another final action has been postponed and no general debate in the House has been permitted until the present. The "omnibus bill," so far as it relates to all the Territories named, is in the nature of an enabling act. In effect it disregards all the steps taken heretofore by the people of South Dakota in the way of preparation for statehood.

South Dakota is ready for statehood, equipped with a constitution which has received the indorsement of the people of that Commonwealth.

Montana, a year or two before, adopted and brought to Congress a constitution, and later on in this debate the Delegate from that Territory will, he informs me, offer an amendment with a view of having that State admitted under the omnibus bill. So far as Washington, New Mexico, Arizona, and Idaho are concerned, the only effect of this proposed legislation will be to create an enabling act under which those Territories, by future action of their people, may form constitutions, organize State governments, and come to Congress for admission to statehood. I insist, Mr. Speaker, that it is the duty of this Congress to admit immediately the State of South Dakota under the pending Senate bill. I am opposed to the omnibus bill, because it seems to load Dakota with the other propositions; moreover, because there is no more necessity for these enabling acts than there is for a fifth wheel to a wagon.

Representative Grow said, in January, 1857, in reporting the enabling act for Oregon:

Gentlemen seem much averse to giving this authority, which is a mere matter of form, as the people of the Territory can meet in their assemblies and form a constitution and send it here as well without this authority as with it.

And Representative Jones, of Tennessee, said:

That is exactly my opinion.

In my remarks on a former occasion I discussed this subject in the following language:

It is said, first, that she has proceeded in her application for admission in an irregular and revolutionary method; second, that the State has been organized out of a portion only of the great Territory of Dakota. This Territory was organized subsequent to the admission of the States of Iowa, Minnesota, and Wisconsin, which were carved out successively and admitted as States from territory including what is now the Territory of Dakota.

Let us examine these propositions and ascertain if the objections made are at all tenable. It will be borne in mind that twenty-five States have been admitted since the Constitution was adopted by the thirteen original States. Of the twenty-five, Texas was admitted under a treaty compact, it being at the time an independent sovereign State; West Virginia was admitted by virtue of the power to consent to a division of one State into two or more States; Maine was admitted by the consent of Massachusetts, of which it formed a part; Vermont was admitted by the consent of the contiguous States of New Hampshire and New York, which made some claim to it; Louisiana was admitted under the treaty with France, but was already an organized community.

Twenty States, therefore, are all that have been admitted into the Union from the Territories to the United States, exclusive of Louisiana. Some of these have been admitted without any previous Territorial organization. One half of them had previous enabling acts and the remaining half had no such acts, or at least none under which proceedings were taken to organize themselves into States and make application for admission. The method pursued by Dakota is precisely identical in principle with that pursued by Tennessee, Iowa, Michigan, Arkansas, Wisconsin, California, Oregon, Kansas, Florida, and Kentucky. Thus it is shown that one-half of all the States admitted into the Union from the outlying and unorganized Territories belonging to the United States pursued the same identical course which the people of Dakota have pursued in their efforts to obtain admission of their State. Can it, then, be claimed with reason that Dakota has pursued any irregular method, since she has followed the precedents which have been approved by Congress in one-half of all the States admitted from Territories? Upon principle, are not these precedents just as binding upon Congress as those where the other method was pursued? What, I ask, is an enabling act but a mere invitation to the people of a portion of the territory of the United States to organize themselves into a State and apply for admission into the Union?

I have said Congress can not make a State. It has the power to admit new States, not to create them. Congress organizes Territorial governments solely under the authority of the Constitution, which gives the right "to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territories or other property belonging to the United States." The people alone can organize the State. It must be their work. No other power or tribunal can do it for them. The power is reserved to Congress to admit new States.

Congress may clothe a community in a Territory with the forms of laws under which they may proceed to organize for themselves a constitution and State government, and all the effect which the law of Congress has upon the subject is merely to throw around their proceedings such forms of law as will allow and direct an orderly movement of the people to the desired end. If Congress neglects or refuses to thus directly furnish such community with the forms of law—the invitation—under which these proceedings may be had, may not the local legislative authority perform that, or may not the people themselves in their primary capacity assemble in public convention, frame and adopt a constitution, organize a State government, and demand admission of the new State thus formed into the Union? Either method is clearly regular.

No objection was made, none has ever been made upon the ground that the constitution framed is not republican in form. No objection has been made to the admission of the State upon any grounds that are important and weighty in the consideration of a question of such magnitude as this. Consider for a moment, Mr. Speaker, the tactics of the opponents of the Dakota bill. At one time it was proposed, in order to defeat the object of the people and their efforts for admission, to compel a division upon a line running north and south, and a bill was introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] accordingly. Subsequently, after that bill had been introduced, printed, and buried in the archives of the Committee on Territories, another proposition was brought forward by the same gentleman for the admission of Dakota only as a whole, and the committee in their majority report on such bill made the absurd and now confessedly ridiculous argument which I will read from their report, presented May 25, 1886, No. 2577:

The question as to whether the Territory should be admitted as a whole or subdivided into two or more States or Territories is not remitted by this bill to the people of that Territory, that being a question, in the opinion of your committee, in which the people of all the country are equally interested. As demonstrated in your committee's report on the Senate bill, that Territory has neither the area, the population, nor the legal right to be admitted into the Union other than as one State.

If Dakota should be admitted into the Union as one State, it will be but a few years until State pride, local interests, and its diversified resources will be such as to demonstrate beyond all peradventure the wisdom of single statehood. The demand for division will not be insisted upon when all questions of the present and future are carefully considered.

In view of these facts and considerations, yonr committee are of the opinion that no greater wrong could be done to the inhabitants of that Territory than to provide for its division.

That report was made in the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress, on the 25th of May, 1886. At that time the population of the Territory was over 400,000. Now it is conceded to be nearer 600,000, and I have heard it stated by residents of that great Territory that its population is to-day much larger. The proposition to insist upon the admission of Dakota as a single State was never seriously urged in Congress because it was clearly in violation and disregard of the will and wishes of the people. It was of a kind with many others that have emanated from our Democratic friends in regard to Dakota.

Why, sir, if I were a Democrat, standing up here and speaking of the treatment by Congress of the Territories, I should unhesitatingly say, and I believe at least one member on the other side of the House has admitted, that the treatment of the Territories by Congress during the last twenty-five years has been such as to lose to the Democracy every Democratic Territory in the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, upon the question of division of South Dakota, and of the rights and qualifications that entitle her to statehood, I need spend no time. Some question was made by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Territories [Mr. SPRINGER] as to some minor portions of the constitution which has been adopted by the State, but I regard those objections as frivolous. Without doubt the first act of the Legislature of the new State of South Dakota will be provided for a constitutional convention. In my judgment the duty of the hour is to admit South Dakota to statehood. That State should come in untrammeled by these other propositions. The pending Senate bill, with the amendments proposed by the Delegate from Dakota [Mr. GIFFORD], meets the question, and the whole question. Pass it, and under the resolution adopted by the House on the 17th of December we can go on and consider fairly and fully the case of every other Territory seeking admission or asking the passage of an enabling act under which it may proceed to the adoption of a State constitution and the organization of a State government.

What is the attitude of the other side? Simply this: Our Democratic friends say, by their acts, South Dakota, though in all respects worthy and well qualified, although having passed the most rigid civil-service examination, and having been duly instructed in the correct countersign, is so made up as to the people thereof that there is little hope for the Democratic party there for all time to come; therefore, unless we can be permitted to incorporate in the bill an enabling act for New Mexico and the other Territories, and unless we can reduce South Dakota to the necessity of traveling over again for the third time the steps preliminary to statehood, so that she shall not be admitted in advance of her less enterprising sisters, we will continue to hinder, delay, and obstruct.

I have said before, Mr. Speaker, and will repeat and emphasize:

The three millions of American people rebelled against the exercise of the same identical powers by Great Britain over them which the Government exercises over the Territories. They complained, and were by the world justified in complaining, that they were kept in a state of semi-vassalage. They had their governor appointed by a foreign tribunal; so have the Territories. They had their judges appointed by the same foreign tribunals; so have the Territories. They had their local legislatures, which enacted laws for them, subject to the revision of the same foreign agency; and so have the Territories. They were taxed without representation; and so are the Territories. Laws were made for them by a tribunal in which they had no voice and in which they could exercise no influence except such as one citizen may, by petition and argument, exercise over another; so have the Territories. They dared the force of the most powerful nation on the face of the earth to be rid of these evils. They were rid of them, and it never was contemplated that in this day and generation they should impose upon their fellow-citizens the same evils which had been imposed in those days by their fellow-citizens upon them. It will be a happy solution of many difficulties in legislation when all the outlying Territories may be populated, created into States, and admitted into the Union. The necessity for Territorial governments is unquestioned, but no effort should be made to constitute it an enduring evil anywhere. It is unjust to the new State to reject it. It is a self-imposed wrong upon the old States to keep her out, and to do so can not be defended on any ground.

[Applause.]

One of the redeeming features of this discussion on the Democratic side of the House is the attitude of my colleague from New York [Mr. COX] on this question. He has stood up here bravely and expressed himself in favor of the admission of South Dakota singly, if possible, or with the other Territories if it must be. In the views he has expressed he is leagues ahead of his party. He deserves honor and praise for the advanced position he has taken with reference to this great question. [Applause.] We owe it to ourselves, we owe it to the people of Dakota and of these other Territories, that immediate legislation be had in their behalf; but no good reason can be given, none has been attempted, why the pending act to admit South Dakota should be turned into a mere enabling act and the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, Montana, and Washington included in one bill therewith. An enabling act is a mere invitation to do what South Dakota has already done. So far as it relates to South Dakota the omnibus bill is an insult, to be borne only because those people consider the source from which it comes. The gentlemen from Montana and Washington Territories have characterized in appropriate language the sentiments of their Territories in respect of the treatment of them by the Congress during the past four years. [Applause.]

What I object to is the attaching to this bill of the provisions for an enabling act for Washington, for Montana, and for New Mexico. The Delegate from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] is prepared to offer an amendment to include his Territory in the bill and to provide for its admission two years hence. There is no objection, perhaps, to an enabling act, but what is the necessity for it? As I have said, such an act has been held over and over again to be a mere matter of form, an invitation to the people of a Territory to form a State constitution and organize themselves for admission to statehood, but such an act is in no case necessary. Every one of these Territories has a legal and constitutional right to come here at any time, with a constitution already prepared, with a State organization already perfected, and ask immediate admission to statehood. And that is what I claim for South Dakota.

For seven long weary years Dakota was knocking at the doors of Congress for the passage of an enabling act in her behalf. That was denied. Then her people went forward, as they had a perfect right to do, organized a government and prepared a State constitution, which has been before this House for several years. It was before the Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, and the Fiftieth Congresses. These people are abundantly equipped for statehood, and by all the precedents connected with the admission of twenty-five States are entitled to immediate admission.

It will be urged by my friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], the chairman of the Committee on Territories, that his bill, the "omnibus bill," will meet the whole question by one vote. But this is too great a question to be disposed of by a single vote, without the fullest and fairest consideration. Arizona, if entitled to be attached to this "omnibus bill," ought to be. Her case is certainly entitled to the fullest consideration. Wyoming desires to be embraced in this same bill. Shall these two Territories be denied consideration? Why are these Territories left out and New Mexico alone included?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will answer my friend. All the Territories embraced in the "omnibus bill" have a population exceeding the ratio of one Representative in Congress; the other Territories have not. That is the reason.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. It is claimed that Wyoming has such a population.

Mr. SPRINGER. Wyoming has a population of less than 100,000.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Wyoming claims a population sufficient to entitle her to statehood, and is asking admission or the passage of an enabling act. Now, if we are to have action on a case where a community equipped in all respects for statehood comes asking, not for an enabling act, but for admission into the Union, let the case be considered alone; and then, if enabling acts are desirable for other Territories, let us pass acts meeting those cases. I trust the House, when it comes to vote on this question, will reject the proposition to pass the "omnibus bill," because when we come to that the other Territories will properly urge their claims. They have a right to be heard. We have given no consideration to Wyoming, no full and satisfactory consideration to the claims of New Mexico. Washington and Montana have had but a partial hearing, although the representatives from those Territories have spoken out in condemnation of the treatment which they have received at the hands of this Democratic Congress.

I appeal to the House and desire to urge with all the power I possess that we shall reject the proposition to load down Dakota with four or five other Territories. I am in favor of their admission as States at the earliest possible day. I would vote enabling acts for them if they desired it. But I say to those people, come up as Dakota has done; build up your constitution, organize your State government, come to Congress and claim the constitutional right you have of admission to statehood.

I hope I have made clear the status as to the present bill. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD] proposes, after the consideration of the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], to urge his substitute which has been printed in the RECORD. It will take some time to read it. It is perhaps entitled to be debated. All those matters ought to be considered, as we have the right to consider them under the continuing order of the House, but let us in the discharge of our duty under the obligation resting on us first vote on the Senate bill, which is alone the proposition before the House to-day.

The bill for the admission of South Dakota ought to be passed without any barnacles in the shape of enabling acts in reference to four or five other Territories, and thereby delaying the admission into the Union of South Dakota, as provided for in the Senate bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to ask him whether there is anything in the situation which prevents the Committee on the Territories from reporting an enabling act for each one of the Territories comprised in the so-called "omnibus bill" instead of attaching them to the substitute?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Nothing at all.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Can you suppose any other purpose in the action proposed than to smother the Senate bill?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. It appears to me that the effect of lumbering up the Senate bill with propositions in reference to the other Territories is to delay and obstruct action and defer the admission of South Dakota into the Union. It can have no other result. The case as to the other Territories of course is entitled to full consideration. That will have to be given to it in any case.

Mr. ADAMS. Can not we go on and pass the Senate bill, and immediately afterwards, under the extraordinary power given to the Committee on the Territories to control the time of the House, go on to-morrow and the day after to-morrow and pass bills in reference to these other Territories?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. That is exactly what I have said. We have the right under the continuing order to take up the case of each of the several Territories and consider it on its merits. We have had a discussion between the gentleman from New Mexico and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE] in regard to New Mexico. There is as much, perhaps, to be said on one side as on the other. I am strongly disposed to legislate in favor of New Mexico, but I think all these cases ought to be considered, each upon its own merits, and at length.

Washington Territory, in whose behalf the Delegate [Mr. VOORHEES] spoke so eloquently, is entitled to proper consideration. This side of the House has always been ready to give it. Montana has been here for several years asking for admission as a State. This side of the House has been ready to consider its claims and to admit it as a State into the Union. North Dakota asks simply for an enabling act, but they have already taken steps to formulate a constitution and to come here fully prepared to ask for admission as a State. It matters not whether we pass enabling acts for these Territories, as it will not delay their admission as States. They can come in as other States have done, but it is not just to obstruct and delay the passage of the Senate bill for the admission of South Dakota by unnecessarily tacking these other Territories upon the Senate bill, which is now under consideration. We have the right, under the continuing order, without interfering with the appropriation bills or the contested-election cases, to go on and legislate in reference to each and every one of these Territories.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am not entirely familiar with the provisions of the proposed substitute or "omnibus bill." Is it not provided there that this question in referenee to Dakota shall be remitted to the people for another election? Will not the effect be, if that "omnibus" proposition be adopted, to hinder and delay the admission of South Dakota into the Union?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. The adoption of that omnibus proposition must result, as every gentleman can see, in obstructing and delaying the admission of South Dakota. As originally reported by the committee the "omnibus bill" provided for the admission of one Dakota. The majority of the committee prior to the last election conceived it to be their duty and only the right of Dakota to come in as one State. Subsequent to the election new light came to the minds of our Democratic friends, and they have come to the conclusion that the people of Dakota are entitled to consideration and admission as two States.

But, Mr. Speaker, I wish to emphasize the fact that the passage of the "omnibus bill," or the substitute which has been printed and offered by my friend from Illinois, will practically operate to do away with all the legislation and the acts of the people of South Dakota already done in regard to statehood. It practically resubmits to them the constitution and requires a new vote upon that instrument; and so I repeat, we had better put aside all these collateral propositions and act directly upon the bill of the Senate now before us.

Thanking the House for its patient attention, I reserve the remainder of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire that those gentlemen who wish to take part in the debate, or who propose to do so, will proceed to-night, or that we can agree upon a time when the debate shall close. But before that I desire to ask unanimous consent that the amendments introduced by the Delegate from Dakota may now be read seriatim and agreed to by the House.

Mr. ADAMS. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. You can move any amendment you desire.

Mr. ADAMS. I know, but I wish to discuss an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. ADAMS. I object.

Mr. SYMES. I object, unless there is an understanding with the chairman of the committee, which I presume I can have, that I can take the floor in my own right for the purpose of debate. It was understood that I should have the floor in my own right after the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER]; but both the gentleman from New York and myself have refrained from taking the floor before, Mr. Speaker, with the intention of giving the Delegates from the Territories an opportunity to represent their people by arguments in support of their views upon amendments to be submitted by them or on the bill as presented. I shall insist, therefore, on having the floor in my own right, and will say for the information of the House that I have promised more than one-half of my time, as much, perhaps, as two-thirds of it, to other members on both sides of the House who desire to talk pointedly upon the bill and the substitute, as well as some proposed amendments to the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am perfectly willing, and ask unanimous consent now that the gentleman from Colorado shall occupy that hour to-morrow morning, immediately after the reading of the Journal, provided we can have these amendments taken up and disposed of at once.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has already submitted the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not want to object to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, but I want to remind the gentleman, as well as the members of the Committee on the Territories, that there are other members of the House who would like to have five or ten minutes' time to explain their position upon so important a measure as the proposed introduction into the Union of several new States.

Mr. SPRINGER. This will not prevent gentlemen from exercising that privilege.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The interest in this question is not confined solely to two or three Territorial Delegates or to the members of the Committee on the Territories; and I shall object to any consent which will involve the cutting off of gentlemen who desire to be heard for at least a brief time. I think they should be permitted to make an explanation of their position upon the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no desire——

Mr. SYMES. Permit me to say in reply to my friend from Ohio that my principal object in claiming the hour is to try to distribute it so that gentlemen may have the opportunity to which he refers of expressing their views upon the subject, and I shall retain but a very small proportion for myself.

Mr. SPRINGER. The proposition that I have submitted did not involve the cutting off of gentlemen who desired to participate in the debate, but only asked consent to take up each of these amendments offered by the gentleman from Dakota and consider them now seriatim.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman will understand that my only object was to secure time for those who desired to be heard.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has eight minutes.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I yield that to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to renew the request I made, that the amendments of the gentleman from Dakota [Mr. GIFFORD] be read and considered seriatim. Let the first be announced, and if there is objection——

Mr. REED. I suppose it is understood that whenever the substitute is adopted, if ever, the House will have an opportunity to amend that?

Mr. SPRINGER. Of course.

Mr. REED. That is the understanding, then?

Mr. SPRINGER. Of course the opportunity will be offered.

I renew the request, Mr. Speaker, for unanimous consent.

Mr. ADAMS. I object, and the reason is that I desire to take more than five minutes myself on a substantial amendment which I propose to move.

Mr. SPRINGER. Well, you can have the time right now.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I propose to yield the remainder of the time belonging to me to the gentleman from Idaho.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York not having reserved the time at the time he took his seat, the Chair recognized the gentleman from Illinois for the purpose of asking unanimous consent; but after this matter is determined the Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from New York did reserve his time, but allowed me to take the floor for a request.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. The gentleman from Illinois desired to make a request for unanimous consent, which has been objected to; and now I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Idaho.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York——

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to ask of my colleague that the proposition I made be adopted.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I object. Objection was made, and I want my friend from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] to occupy the remaining eight minutes of my time.

Mr. DUNHAM. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope that that will be withdrawn.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. DUNHAM. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 46.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now I ask that the amendment first submitted by my friend from Dakota [Mr. GIFFORD] be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection has been made to the request of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. We had better have the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have the right to move to close debate upon this amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the gentleman from New York reserved the balance of his time, and as there are only eight minutes remaining, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Idaho, after which the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. Speaker, I take it for granted that there will be no objection, founded on sound public policy or justice, to the admission of North and South Dakota, Montana, and Washington.

There seems to be a doubt in the minds of some members as to the expediency of admitting New Mexico. No argument has been advanced to prove that the citizens of New Mexico are not law-abiding and attached to the principles of our Government. On the other hand, it is admitted that New Mexico is well governed, and is inhabited by an industrious, intelligent people, whose higher and only civil allegiance is to the Government of the United States.

The foreign and native-born population is about equal in numbers, and they live and act in harmony. An end has about come to more than the usual foreign immigration which is seeking homes in the far West, and with statehood the only valid objection to the admission of New Mexico would quickly pass away. The brave and ambitious youth of New England, the Mississippi Valley States, the Northwestern and Southern States would flock there as they do to the other Territories. With or without statehood New Mexico must inevitably be peopled very soon by a majority of native-born citizens. As was clearly shown by the able and conscientious Delegate from New Mexico, she is fully equipped in every way for statehood.

I regret that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE] has considered it to be his duty to object to the admission of New Mexico for the reasons which he gives. The claim that Congress will best settle the disputed land titles and develop the country by a system of irrigation from streams or artesian wells is contrary to all the teachings of the past and present in the history of national legislation affecting the Territories. If anything has been settled by this debate it is that the only hope that the Territories have for the full expansion of their resources is under a State government.

Congress does not legislate for the Territories in agreement with their desires and needs, and will not allow them to legislate for themselves. They have shown no disposition to appropriate money to the Territories for any purpose, and do not even allow them the money provided by law. In my judgment, the arid lands of New Mexico and all those Territories whose lands require irrigation will not be reclaimed until the Territories become States. The people of New Mexico desire statehood and its accompanying responsibilities, and I believe it will accept and bear the promotion proudly and to the honor and glory of the nation.

There seems now to be an era of good feeling toward the Territories, and disposition among the members to divest their minds of all partisan prejudice, and do the Territories tardy justice. I trust this is not merely a "spurt," and that you will not "break and go to pieces" over the stated objections to New Mexico.

The remarks which have been made by the various Delegates whose Territories are included in the bill under discussion apply with full force, clearness, and fairness to Idaho. They could be iterated and reiterated in a hundred different ways, yet the truth would not be half told. The order under which this discussion is being held provides—

That after the Dakota bill is disposed of other bills in relation to the admission of Territories reported from the said committee shall be in order in the House in like manner until disposed of, to be considered in the order fixed by the committee.

I will not at this particular time in this discussion insist on a recognition of the just claims of the Territory which I have the honor to represent, because it might retard the justice which I believe and hope you are prepared to mete out to our sister Territories. I will please my fancy in the hope that the journey on this road of fairness to these brave and loyal people, who have been harassed and handicapped so long beyond the usual probationary period of Territorial government will bring such unqualified peace and contentment to your minds that you will quickly recognize and pass upon the appeal of Idaho.

I do not ask immediate statehood. My people do not claim admission at once. We ask an enabling act which will definitely fix a time when we can assume the responsibilities and blessings of a State. We care not what conditions you may impose as to population or resources. It makes no difference to us whether we come in under the ordinance of 1787, which requires 60,000 free inhabitants, or whether we are to have the number equal to the ratio of representation for a member of Congress. We desire a certain "stake" which we can move to. We wish to avoid the danger of being made a political football in the future, and are anxious to catch this tide of good-nature and brotherly love at the flood, and prepare the way for our admission when we fill all the conditions which the most technical can demand.

I do not intend to make a detailed statement at this time in regard to our resources, but will in a general manner briefly call your attention to the present condition and capabilities of the Territory.

Idaho is greater in area than New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire combined. Its climate is unexcelled. The warm currents of the Pacific sweep over the Territory and have a most beneficial effect on its arable belts. The average or mean annual temperature of the valleys is about 51°, about 4° warmer than Connecticut.

No Western or coast State or Territory is so well watered as Idaho. The Snake River, Clarke's Fork, Spokane, Salmon, Boisé, Payette, Weiser, Big and Little Wood, Bruneau, Malad, Portneuf, Clearwater, Cœur d'Alene, St. Joseph, and Kootenai are all large rivers into which many smaller ones empty. There are at least 15,000,000 acres in the valleys and uplands which can be irrigated and made lavishly productive.

All cereals and vegetables which can be raised north of the cotton-growing line in the Atlantic States flourish in the greatest profusion. Apples, pears, prunes, apricots, nectarines, and all smaller fruits, and berries of the finest quality are produced with never-failing regularity.

Irrigation is necessary in South Idaho. Nearly all the lands which lie adjacent to the smaller streams, and which can be irrigated with trifling cost, have been taken up and are cultivated. The expense of building large canals from the great streams is so great that individuals can not afford it, and companies are loath to invest their money in it without subsidies of land. By giving Idaho statehood and granting them the control of certain lands, provided the State will first reclaim it by putting water on it, every acre would be settled up within four years. The lands which could be made the most productive in the country are now valueless and will remain so for years to come under our present system of Territorial government.

North Idaho is different in climate somewhat, and raises grain, vegetables, and fruit in the greatest abundance without irrigation. There is no better farming country anywhere than in North Idaho, and it is fast settling up with an intelligent and industrious class of farmers. North Idaho alone will have 200,000 people within eight years, and South Idaho will have double or treble the number if statehood is given. Between 1,200,000 and 1,500,000 acres of land in Idaho are now under improvement, and within the region of 1,000,000 acres of agricultural land has been patented. Five hundred thousand acres of agricultural land were taken up last year under the various land entries.

When you consider that Rhode Island contains less than 900,000 acres of land, you can form some idea of the present condition and future possibilities of the agricultural resources of this Territory. The forest area of Idaho is 7,000,000 acres, and the growth is heavier than in a majority of the timbered States east of the Rocky Mountains. There are varieties of fir, white, red, and black spruce, scrub oak, yellow and white pine, mountain mahogany, juniper, tamarack, birch, cottonwood, alder, and willow.

Such a prodigious amount of timber to the acre can be found in no other part of the United States, except on the western slopes of the western mountains in Washington Territory. The timber is of large growth and magnificent for lumbering purposes. White-pine logs, 5 feet in diameter, 100 feet long, without a knot and straight as an arrow, are common.

Nine million dollars of gold, silver, and lead was produced last year, and you might say that mining is in its infancy in the Territory. Experts say that it is the best of all the mining States or Territories. Rich copper mines have also been discovered.

The population of the Territory at the present time is carefully estimated at 106,000, and the property at $60,000,000.

The unstable form of Territorial government is a great drawback to the development of the country. The people all eagerly desire statehood.

Nearly 1,000 miles of railroad are operated in the Territory, almost all of which has been built since 1882.

The bill was accordingly ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was according read the third time, and passed.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

THE REVENUE LAWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? If there be none, that order is closed, and the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 9051.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] as a substitute for paragraph 145.

Mr. HALE. Before the Senate goes on with the consideration of the amendment which was pending at the time of the adjournment yesterday, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa, who is in charge of the bill, what portions of the bill still remain unacted upon.

It is now within three or four days of the time when the final vote must be taken. I apprehend that nobody will seek to extend the time when we reach the point that has been fixed by the Senate for taking the vote. I also apprehend that there are large and important portions of the bill which have not yet been considered by the Senate, and for one I should be glad to know what those portions are, how extensive they are, and what we have got to pass upon in the next three or four days.

Mr. ALLISON. There are a number of important matters. The entire wooden schedule has been passed over; the sugar schedule has been passed over; the wool and woolen schedule entire has been passed over; and then there are fractions of other schedules.

Mr. BROWN. Rice.

Mr. ALLISON. Rice and a great many detached portions of other schedules have not yet been considered, such as cutlery, and various things that will lead to more or less debate. I hope we can have an early vote this morning upon the amendment which is now pending. Of course it is an important amendment.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I do not wish to protract the debate, but I want to make a single remark in regard to the pending amendment as to tin and terne plate.

The whole of the argument made upon the other side in favor of imposing this duty is that within thirty days, according to the Senator from Iowa, certain iron establishments now in existence in this country will go into the manufacture of tin-plate if this duty is imposed. Yesterday we had the statistics showing the enormous amount, to use the language of Senators upon the other side, of tin-plate now consumed in this country. It seems to me, with entire respect to the Senator from Iowa, that it would be a most exceptional case if this trade could be taken away inside of thirty days or sixty days, or a year, or two years, from the foreign importers.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator understood me to make that statement he misunderstood me, or I failed to say what I intended to say.

Mr. VEST. I think the RECORD shows that the Senator made this statement (of course I do not want to do him any injustice) that if this duty was imposed, within thirty days many establishments would go into this business in the United States. I inferred as a matter of course that the plant already existed here as to iron and steel, and that they would by simply employing additional hands and putting additions to their manufactories go into the manufacture of tin-plate. As a matter of course they could not construct the factories in thirty days, and employ the labor, and originate a new industry.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him just there?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. The testimony before the committee is that there is capacity now for the production of about 200,000 tons of the iron or steel plates for the application of tin, and that at least one-half of that plant could be at once utilized in the production of tin-plate. There would have to be added to that of course more or less pickling and clearing establishments, and more or less vats for coating, which it was stated to us could be done in a very short space of time.

I did not mean by saying thirty days to be mathematically accurate. I meant to say that within a brief space, in my judgment, this industry could be started. But the committee, with a view of making it absolutely certain that time should be given, has provided in this amendment that this increase of duty upon tin-plate shall not take effect until the 1st day of January, 1890. Of course no one can predict what the effect of such a prospective provision would be. My impression is that the tendency of it would be at once to depress the price of tin-plate.

Mr. VEST. The Senator has anticipated much that I intended to say as to the modus operandi in this industry, without having any practical experience in the matter, which was simply inaccessible, for the reason that there is no such industry or production now in the United States, even if I had the time and sufficient knowledge to go and examine the details. I have, with the limited time given me, examined the evidence as to the different processes which are necessary in order to produce tin-plate, and it is simply physically impossible that this industry should be created in this country to any extent so as to meet the demand inside of twelve months, putting it at the most reasonable limit.

Now, Mr. President, what is to become of the American consumer until this industry is established?

Mr. ALLISON. What is to become of him?

Mr. VEST. What is to become of him?

Mr. ALLISON He will be in no worse condition than he is now.

Mr. VEST. He is to pay the additional duty imposed by this bill after the 1st of January, 1890, unless the American industry shall have then arrived at such proportions as to supply the American market.

Mr. ALLISON. Do I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. VEST. Of course not. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator except to state my views as respects this matter.

Mr. VEST. It is no interruption.

Mr. ALLISON. The consumption of tin in the world is a very large consumption. It is now manufactured chiefly in Wales. Germany has commenced recently to manufacture tin. Of course the consumption of tin within the last few years has increased more rapidly than the establishments for its manufacture.

If we shall largely increase, as I believe we shall under this provision, the establishments for the manufacture of tin, and thereby increase largely the supply of tin to the world, the effect will be to depress the price of tin-plate, the production of which is now an absolute monopoly, practically, in the hands of a few men, who have had for the last few years an immensely enlarged market for the product.

Mr. VEST. The official statistics do not carry out the Senator's statement that this has been a monopoly.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not mean strictly a monopoly, I mean to say that the demand has been larger than the supply, practically, and that has increased the price.

Mr. VEST. I know the demand has been very large. It has increased with the increasing population of this country. That goes without saying. But the statistics show, as the Senator from Arkansas read yesterday, that the price has gone down in the market.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. In this connection I should like to call attention to another fact, if the Senator from Missouri will permit me. The Senator from Iowa yesterday stated that the cost of manufacture in Wales in the production of tin-plates was $3.37 per box. That would make the cost $67.40 per ton. There were 283,000 tons imported into this country last year, at an expense of $65 a ton, which was $2 a ton less than the actual cost of the manufacture in Europe, if the statement just made by the Senator from Iowa is correct. There is no monopoly in that sort of a statement.

Mr. ALLISON. That is dealing with special figures. I am talking now about this great industry. As a matter of course there have been new methods. Tin-plate was entirely made from iron only a few years ago. Recently it is made from steel, and the utilization of steel for its production has largely decreased the cost undoubtedly. What I mean to say is that in comparison with the establishments in the world for the production of tin-plate the consumption of tin-plate has largely increased within a few years, and this has enabled those who have been fortunate enough to have those establishments to hold up the price substantially as they desired to have it held up.

Mr. VEST. There is no question but that the consumption has increased, because tin enters into all the ordinary details of every-day life as to domestic utensils, buckets, pans, etc., and also into the covering of houses and other necessary uses, into the canning of fruits and fish, an industry which has largely increased in the United States. There is no doubt about that consumption having increased, but there has been immense competition at the same time. The tin supply of Cornwall has not been sufficient for the English manufacturers and they have imported large quantities of tin from Malacca and other parts of the world. But the fact still remains that the price has gone down.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator mean the price of tin or tin-plate?

Mr. VEST. The price of tin-plate; and tin is the article which is now of immediate importance in the consideration of this question. Of course as to the thin iron plates which receive a bath of tin, to use the language of one of the witnesses, and then become tin-plate, those thin sheet-iron plates are produced in this country, in England, and in Germany indifferently; but it is the tin which we do not have in this country and for which we must rely upon foreign countries for a supply, if we go into this industry at all.

Mr. ALLISON. So far as that is concerned, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him for a moment more——

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no doubt that we have a larger supply of tin in the United States than in all the world besides. We have not yet utilized it. There is tin enough, I have no doubt, in the Territory of Dakota to supply the world with tin, if it can be utilized, and it will doubtless be utilized.

The Senator says what is true, I have no doubt, that the Cornwall mines furnish a mere infinitesimal part of the tin produced in the world. They are delving down there 3,000 feet to get tin, and they import largely from Malacca and from the Malayan Archipelago. But that is nothing. We are not talking about tin. We import tin free now into this country, and we can get tin here as cheap as anybody can get it elsewhere. Tin is worth $600 a ton. Only from 2 to 5 per cent. of a tin cup or a tin pail is tin; the rest of it is iron.

This whole thing of manufacturing tin-plate with this thin coating of tin is a question of labor. That is all it is. It is a question of labor in this country and abroad, and when we import our tin as free as Great Britain does, surely we can compete with her in the production of tin if we have the plant to do it, I mean when other things are made equal.

Mr. VEST. As to the production of tin in this country, the testimony taken before the Tariff Commission in 1882 was to the effect that there were immense deposits of tin in the Black Hills of Dakota. But I assert now, and my assertion is based upon the experience in this country since 1882, that unless the manufacture of tin-plate is developed by the imposition of this duty or by some other cause, those tin mines, if they exist, will not be developed, or they would have been developed before.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. I received this morning in my mail a paper from the Black Hills, sent to me for another purpose, in which there was a description of the tin mines of Dakota, represented to be perfectly inexhaustible, and an account of the tons of tin that had within a few days been shipped from those mines to Denver. The paper was not sent with any reference to this tariff, but was sent to me for the purpose of giving me information about Indian matters in that Territory. I left the paper at my room, but the description of those mines was perfectly marvelous. There was no occasion for them to misrepresent the statement in connection with this matter.

Mr. VEST. I shall make no issue with a newspaper account. I simply refer to sworn testimony taken in 1882, that these mines exist, with these deposits of tin, and they have not been developed. We are still importing large quantities of tin into this country.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly, but the raw material, tin, cuts no figure in this discussion, I repeat. That is worth $500 or $600 a ton in England, here, or wherever it is imported.

Mr. CHACE. Block-tin.

Mr. ALLISON. I mean the block, pig-tin. It is imported into this country and imported into England. There is only about 2 or 3 or at most 5 per cent. upon the weight of the best tin in it. So that question is of no moment. But I agree with the Senator that it would be an additional inducement to establish this industry if we could open up an immense tin industry in this country and develop thereby our tin mines in Dakota. I shall go hand in hand with him in aid of that great project, which I have no doubt will be accomplished in a very few years.

Mr. VEST. I was replying to the statement of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] upon yesterday, that as to the tin that was necessary, whether it be more or less, we could rely safely upon the foreign importation. Yet we are told in the next breath that this duty imposed will develop tin mines in the Black Hills of Dakota.

Mr. ALLISON. That was the Senator's own statement.

Mr. VEST. I did not make the statement. It was made yesterday in debate.

Mr. ALLISON. I understood the Senator to agree to it this morning, and I was rather congratulating him.

Mr. VEST. Not at all. I said the statement was made in 1882 before the Tariff Commission; and yet the singular fact remains that those mines have not been developed since.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him to make a suggestion?

Mr. VEST. Of course.

Mr. TELLER. There is not any question as to the great abundance of tin in Dakota. I have known something about the search for tin in the mining regions for a good many years, and I have seen a great many specimens of what was called tin from time to time in different sections of the country, both in my own State and in States and Territories farther west in which I have been. About 1881 or 1882 they discovered what was supposed to be tin in the Black Hills country. Specimens of that tin were taken to the Eastern States and to Europe, and it has been pronounced by experts everywhere to be the richest tin found in the world. I have seen myself a single piece of tin ore that weighed 7 or 8 tons in the city of New York. Twenty-eight tons in one piece were sent to Wales from Deadwood, and pronounced to be richer than any tin found in Wales.

The trouble is we have not yet discovered how to separate it. It has a different connection with the rock from the Wales tin. Tin ore can be worked in Wales that produces 4, 5, or 6 per cent. of tin. Much of the tin-ore found in this country produced 20, 25, and 30 per cent. of tin, it is said. If it will produce 6 or 8 per cent. it can be worked.

We had the same difficulty in working the rich gold rocks in Colorado. The system in vogue in other sections of the world would not release the gold from the rock. We discovered in a few years exactly how to do it. We shall discover exactly how to release this tin whenever there is a sufficient demand for it to make it worth while to do so. Mills are being put up now for the purpose of reducing the tin in the Black Hills, and I have no doubt we shall produce it, not perhaps as cheaply as they do abroad, because of the great price paid for labor in the Black Hills, which is infinitely higher than in any other part of the world almost, but we shall produce it, I have no doubt, in paying quantities.

Mr. VEST. We are then confronted with the very same obstacle that met the men who undertook to raise jute in this country. There is no climatic difficulty, no trouble as to soil; but when we came to the machinery necessary to defibricate the jute it could not be done.

Mr. BUTLER. Decorticate.

Mr. VEST. "Decorticate," my friend says. I call it "defibricate." It is to separate the fiber and make it suitable for manufacturing. The testimony before the Tariff Commission, in 1882, showed that for fifteen years prior to 1882 jute had been raised in this country, and yet with all the American talent for invention, which excels that of any people in the world, we had never been able to invent a machine for decorticating (I am advised that this is the proper term) the jute. We are told now that if we protect this tin-plate some sort of invention will be had to meet the difficulty suggested by the Senator from Colorado, and that tin will be separated from the rocks in proper fashion and made available.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to correct the Senator. There is nobody asking for any protection on tin. I have not any doubt that tin will be produced in this country in a few years in great quantities without any protection.

Mr. VEST. It is true we are not considering the duty upon tin per se, but we are considering the duty upon tin-plates, which are simply thin sheets of iron bathed in tin. That makes the tin-plate, and another process makes the terne-plate. But we are advised now by the Senator from Iowa that tin must be eliminated from this discussion, that that is not an element at all in this debate, and it now comes down to a simple question of protection upon the sheet-iron.

Mr. TELLER. That is all of it.

Mr. VEST. It is all of it, I am told.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course that is all of it.

Mr. VEST. I thought from the beginning that this was nothing else but a demand on the part of the manufacturers of sheet-iron in this country, the thin iron that is used for the covering of houses, in order to keep out the competition of tin-plate and terne-plate that is brought in from abroad. But I do not want to continue the debate. I am as anxious to get through with this bill as the Senators in charge of it. I wish to make one other remark, and I am done with it.

I have the highest respect for the opinion of the Senators in charge of the bill. I believe that they are sincere in their statement that the effect of this duty will be to originate this industry, that it may come into existence within the time which they name in this bill—the 1st of January, 1890. But now we are confronted with two possibilities, not to use the stronger word, probabilities. In the first place, if we originate it at all by reason of imposing this duty, there would still be a considerable, an indefinite time when the production in the United States would not supply the necessities of this country; and when that is the case it will simply, according to the statement of the Senator from Rhode Island yesterday, as to the average effect of a tariff duty, increase the price to the consumer in the United States.

But let us take the further proposition and probability in my judgment. Suppose that these industries do not spring up; suppose that this tax does not have the effect which is contemplated by the Senators who have introduced it, then what is the condition of the consumer in the United States? He has to pay this increased duty without bringing into existence the domestic industry, with the additional employment of labor in the United States, and the increase of the home market. It seems to me, sir, that it is dangerous legislation. It is exceptional legislation. It is carrying protection to an extreme never before contemplated by judicious minds. It is going into an unknown future and undertaking to construct out of nothing an industry that does not now exist.

Mr. ALDRICH. As I understand the position of the Senator from Missouri he is in favor of what is called sometimes a revenue duty for the purpose of raising the proper amount of money to carry on the Government. Now, upon his own theory, and upon the practical belief that I presume he has that this duty will be paid generally by the people of the United States, I do not see how he can object to it. If it is a revenue duty which bears equally upon the people of the United States, as the sugar duty does, in his opinion, and as is the duty upon straw braids which he sought to restore the other day, I do not see how he can object to this simply as a revenue duty.

Mr. VEST. If my friend will permit me I want to reduce the revenue. We do not need it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then why did the Senator vote the other day to restore the duty on straw braids?

Mr. VEST. I have explained to the Senator again and again that I voted upon the ground that a portion of those braids were simply articles of luxury, and my vote proves it; and the RECORD shows that I made a motion to strike out that portion of the item that embraces the articles for ornamentation alone.

Mr. ALDRICH. Perhaps the Senator did not vote with Senators on the other side generally.

Mr. VEST. I did not.

Mr. ALDRICH. But the Democratic Senators generally voted to restore the duties on those straw goods which are not a luxury.

Mr. VEST. The RECORD will show that I moved to strike out the words "for ornamentation."

Mr. VANCE. I question the wisdom of the course we are pursuing in regard to tin-plates in trying to get the duty reduced for the benefit of the poor people of the country. I think the first thing we know we shall have a duty on tin also, and then a duty raised still higher on tin-plates in order to compensate for the duty on the raw material. That is the tendency of everything here. Because some objection was made to the admission of free fish into the border States, where they could be obtained fresh from water without any preservative process, and because there was a movement made to extend that privilege to all the United States, the first thing we know fish were put upon the dutiable-list; and that was what was called a compromise. That is, it doubled the rate for everybody. A compromise always gives the benefit of the doubt to all persons who are protected.

I have been informed this morning by this debate that the richest deposits of tin to be found in the world at present are known to exist in Dakota. My observation of protective-tariff legislation is that there must be something always done by the ingenuity of man to counterbalance the gifts of nature, and the more lavish Providence has been to us in bestowing wealth of any kind upon us the higher the taxes have been elevated upon that article, so that really upon those very things which we have been furnished with more abundantly than any people upon the face of the earth we pay higher taxation than any other people upon the face of the earth. The time is not far distant when, if it be true that these great deposits of tin exist in Dakota and the proper methods of separating the tin from the ore have been discovered, instead of having what Providence manifestly designed, an abundance of tin cheaper and surpassing in quality any other people in the world, we shall have the highest taxation imposed upon that article, and the highest-priced tin-ware for the use of the common people of any nation of the world. That will be the result of it. That has been the result of all our efforts to reduce taxation upon the common necessaries of life. They have resulted in an increased duty. I fear it will be the same in this case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment having been modified since it was offered, it will be read as it now stands.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out paragraph 145, and insert in lieu thereof:

145. All iron and steel sheets or plates, and all hoop, band, or scroll iron or steel, excepting what are known commercially as tin-plates, terne-plates, and taggers' tin, and hereafter provided for, when galvanized or coated with zinc or spelter, or other metals, or any alloy of those metals, shall pay three-fourths of 1 cent per pound more duty than the rates imposed by the preceding paragraph upon the corresponding gauges of common or black sheet or taggers' iron or steel; and on and after January 1, 1890, all such iron or steel sheets when coated with tin, or lead, or with a mixture of which these metals, or either of them, is a component part, by the dipping or any other process, and commercially known as tin-plates, terne-plates, and taggers' tin, shall pay three-fourths of 1 cent per pound more duty than the rates imposed by the preceding paragraph upon the corresponding gauges of black sheet or taggers' iron or steel.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will suggest to strike out the word "such." It will be better to read "all steel or iron sheets, etc."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 24 of the amendment, before the word "iron," it is proposed to strike out "such;" so as to read:

And on and after January 1, 1890, all iron and steel sheets when coated with tin, or lead, or with a mixture of which these metals, or either of them, is a component part.

Mr. ALLISON. I accept that modification.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has just been read as modified. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes appear to have it.

Mr. VANCE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GORMAN. I only desire to enter my protest against this increase of duty upon an article of universal consumption. I have no idea of now entering into the general discussion, but I think it is perfectly plain that under the provisions of this amendment as proposed it will be impossible to manufacture this article in this country by 1890 to an extent that will begin to supply one-tenth of the demand, and the inevitable result will be an increase of revenue and an increase of taxes upon the people which neither the Government needs nor any interest in this country specially desires.

We have had one or two attempts to manufacture tin under a high rate of duty. In 1883, after very full and free discussion in this body, it being recognized on both sides of the Chamber that it was a tax that ought to be decreased, it was decreased to 1 cent a pound. If there was any pressing demand for it, if there was any special interest that was prepared to enter into the manufacture of this article, I could understand perfectly the desire of the committee to increase the duty.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to say to the Senator that more than forty manufacturers, or those who are prepared for the manufacture of these tin-plates, have stated that they will enter upon the necessary preparation immediately; and therefore, while I agree with the Senator from Maryland that it is not probable that there will be a plant on the 1st day of January, 1890, to supply the entire demand of this country, there will be such a plant as will greatly depress the price of tin-plate, in my belief.

Mr. PLUMB. Right there I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Maryland. The Senator started out with the proposition that this is an article of necessity, and of course, therefore, of great usefulness. The imposition of this tax, he said, was something that ought not to be interposed. Is that the test which the Senator proposes to apply to the discriminations of the tariff bill—to tax only those things which are not articles of necessity, and thereby promote the manufacture of such articles in this country, and not that of articles of necessity?

Mr. GORMAN. I do not intend to go into the general discussion of the question which the inquiry of the Senator from Kansas would necessarily bring forth; but I do make this assertion, that to-day there is no earthly necessity for the revenue that the increase of the tax proposed by the amendment which is now pending would necessarily produce, an increase of from $5,000,000 to $7,000,000; and therefore the revenue question does not enter into it. There is no necessity whatever for it.

I make the further assertion that notwithstanding the efforts which have been made to find tin in the Black Hills and in one county in Alabama, the deposit has not been found sufficient in this country to utilize it. The deposit does not begin to do it. We shall be compelled to import all the tin used in the manufacture of this article probably for the next ten or fifteen years. The possibilities are that we can not manufacture it successfully here because we have not the material. Therefore it is the imposition of a tax at this time which the Government does not require, and is directly against the interests of the people. If it could have been shown or should be shown, after the efforts made in Pittsburgh and made in my own State in the last fifteen years under a higher rate of duty than exists to-day, that it is possible to make this article in competition with the rest of the world, then the question which the Senator from Kansas puts would be applicable.

Mr. ALLISON. Let me interrupt the Senator a moment. He says we have not the material. We have precisely the same material that they have in England, barring the block-tin, which now comes in free of duty into this country, and can be imported from Australia or from the Malayan Archipelago, or from England herself. Therefore, with other conditions equal, we are upon a precise par with England.

Mr. MORGAN. What would be the condition of this country in the event that those producing countries should put an export duty upon it?

Mr. ALLISON. We should, of course, be in their power to the extent of the export duty.

Mr. MORGAN. Would they not be able, by putting an export duty upon tin, to manufacture every pound of tin that comes to this country?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think there is any danger of an export duty on tin.

Mr. MORGAN. They do not levy it now, but they have a right to do it, and they certainly would do it if they consulted their own interest.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is the Senator afraid they will manufacture tin or tin-plate?

Mr. MORGAN. They can do it just as well as we can. They have as much capital as we have, and they can import the iron ores if they have not got them, and we import coke now from Australasia to San Francisco.

Mr. GORMAN. The point I was making was that no matter what may come hereafter the time has not arrived when in my judgment it will be possible for our people to make this particular article with a reasonable rate of duty, which we might call a protection, and that there is no necessity for an increase. The steel industry or the iron industry is sufficiently protected under the existing law. We have not reached that degree of proficiency in the machinery for making tin-plate which enables us to manufacture it at a reasonable cost; and while we are engaged in reducing the revenues of the Government I think it is impolitic and unwise to go to the extreme of attempting to create this business before our people are prepared for it.

That is all I desire to say, except to add this: In 1883 when this question was before the Senate it was upon a motion of my own to reduce the tax, and there were various propositions pending in the Senate. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], it appears in the RECORD, wanted at that time to fix the rate at 2 cents a pound, and after a long discussion, in which the subject was very thoroughly gone over, the rate was reduced to 1 cent a pound, and I believe by general consent. I have before me the RECORD of January 26, 1883, and among others who took the position with us then was Senator John A. LOGAN, of Illinois. He said:

> The manufacturers of tin cans all over the country, in every city in the United States, for putting up meat, fruit, etc., have said to the committee here—I presume they have to the committee, and probably to nearly every Senator—that they were better satisfied with the rate of duty which was imposed before, and are satisfied with the rate proposed by the committee, but they are universally opposed to increasing the duty. I have had telegrams to this effect from different parts of the country, and especially from Chicago, where they manufacture more tin cans than in any other part of the country. The idea of increasing the rate of duty for the purpose of encouraging anybody to commence a manufacture when he has not commenced it, I think, is a new idea. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

In my State we have an immense industry in canning goods, canning meats, and everything that is consumed which makes living cheap. The canned goods are shipped not only to all parts of the Western country, but to all parts of the world, and I repeat what Senator LOGAN said, it is a new idea and I think a very unwise proposition at this time to increase the revenues of the Government and this tax when there is no probability of establishing the manufacture here within a reasonable time.

Mr. PLUMB. Does the Senator know how much this duty will add to the price of an ordinary 2-pound can, supposing the duty is to be added to the price?

Mr. GORMAN. No; I have no means of knowing the number of cans that are made in this country; but I do know that under the rate of duty at 1 cent a pound, if there is no larger consumption than there was in 1887, you would increase the taxes of the people in this country over $3,000,000, and you would increase the revenues of the Treasury to that extent, when the effort we are making is to reduce taxes.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not design now to controvert, I do not know that I ever shall, the general proposition of the Senator from Maryland that even with the imposition of this duty this article can not be made in this country; that I do not know about; but I was very much struck by his opening statement to the effect that this duty ought not to be imposed because the article upon which it is imposed is a necessary article.

I thought he thereby designed to say in substance that he was not in favor of imposing duties in order that necessary articles may be manufactured in this country, the opposite of which would be that he would be in favor of imposing duties upon articles to obtain revenue which were not necessary to the people of this country; and that is entirely a logical position, and one which I think his party generally assumes.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. PLUMB. I may be mistaken.

One other point in regard to this matter. I am informed on what I regard as good authority that the addition of this duty to the price of the ordinary 2-pound can would be about one-third of a cent. That is perhaps a large proportion, a considerable addition in proportion to the gross cost of the can; but I submit to the Senator that that imposition would not finally fall upon the consumer of the article covered by the can. There is no such nice adjustment of the prices of canned goods at retail as that the price shall be affected by the imposition of the duty of 30 per cent. It would fall upon the manufacturer and upon the wholesale dealer. I do not say they are not to be taken into account; but what I mean is that the persons who use the cans in putting up meats, vegetables, fruits, and so on, which are sold in the market, while I am perfectly willing to take them into account, are not the great mass of the people of the United States. The consumers, in my judgment, would not be affected by that.

I say nothing at all about the main proposition of the Senator from Maryland, that tin can not be produced in this country. That I do not know about. I have no doubt he is better qualified to speak of that than I.

Mr. GORMAN. I am satisfied the Senator from Kansas does not intend to do me any injustice. I think my position is perfectly well understood. If there was an industry in this country engaged in manufacturing tin-plate that had grown up under our tariff laws, and a proposition was made to reduce the tariff so as to destroy or impair it, I would be opposed to the proposition. But this is an entirely different proposition, and I ask the Senator from Kansas how he can maintain a proposition, with our financial condition, to impose an unnecessary tax for the purpose of establishing a business when it has yet to be demonstrated whether it can ever be successful in this country under any taxation?

Mr. PLUMB. If it be true that the imposition of this duty will result in the manufacture of tin-plate here, then I entirely agree with the Senator. We do not need the duty for revenue, and if we did need the revenue I think I could find plenty of other subjects from which I would rather obtain it than this; but it is a question about which I presume there is a controversy. If it should result in producing in this country very largely or entirely the tin-plates consumed by the American people, of course it could not result in an increase of revenue.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, this amendment is a very important one, not only because of the great amount involved, but also because the subject has been very fully considered, though I do not know that the debate here, so far as I have heard it, has thrown much light upon it. It seems to me a very simple proposition. The question is whether the 285,000 tons of tin-plate, or rather iron-plate covered with tin, consumed in this country shall be of American manufacture or of foreign manufacture, or I will say English manufacture. The 285,000 tons of imported tin-plate are really iron or steel plate covered with tin; and of those 285,000 tons 275,000 tons are iron or steel, and only the remainder is tin. Under existing law there is no duty upon tin, and no duty is levied upon tin in any form. When this article is spoken of as tin-plate it is a deceptive name. It is iron or steel plate covered with a mere coating of tin, a kind of chemical baptism, you may say, a mere coating of the iron or steel by a chemical process with tin. I have seen the process in the old country. It is not a difficult process at all. It can be performed in this country at once, and I am assured now, and we are assured by direct statements of gentlemen who have plants already engaged in rolling out iron and steel plates, that within a reasonable time they can apply the requisite methods. The mode of baptizing or covering this plate with tin is not a secret. There is no doubt about it, no question about it, and very little additional work will cover the iron and steel with tin to make tin-plate. But the real point is whether or not the 275,000 tons of iron or steel that is covered with tin shall be dug out of the earth here and passed through the furnace and rolled into plates ready to be covered with tin or whether all that shall be done abroad.

Mr. President, I have not seen any evidence that tin can be found in this country in sufficient quantities and under circumstances that will enable us profitably to get it out for awhile; but the time will come, I think, when tin will be found in this country, because it is now found to some extent in this country.

Mr. TELLER. I would like to inquire of the Senator if he has taken any pains to find the result of the explorations in the Black Hills country.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say there is no mode of procuring it in any amount.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator says there is no tin.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no tin that is available now for the purpose of use; and the tin-plates that will be covered under this amendment will be covered with Welsh tin.

Mr. TELLER. That is brought from the Straits of Malacca.

Mr. SHERMAN. Wherever it comes from; it comes from a very few places. It may be that the time will come when we shall get tin in this country, but I vote for this amendment on the ground that the tin is a mere incident, and I vote for it to protect the manufacturers of the plates covered by the tin, and that is the only ground upon which it can be based. We have the assurance that before the 1st day of January next some twenty or thirty different establishments will make arrangements to cover steel and iron plates with tin. Under those circumstances the relief asked ought to be granted. There is no more reason why the people who use iron in the form of tin-plates should be exempt from taxation than there is that any other class of people should be exempt. One thing or the other ought to be done: either this duty ought to be made to correspond with the duty on other iron plates, about 2 cents a pound or a little above, or the duty ought to be repealed. True, we do not want the revenue. That is conceded on all hands, and therefore, if this amendment is not adopted, we had better make this iron-plate covered with tin free of duty and abandon the enterprise at once. That is the logic of it.

It seems to me the true policy is to give to the American manufacturer of the 275,000 tons of iron and steel plates necessary in this industry the same degree of protection and the same degree of consideration that are given to the manufacturers of iron and steel plates in any form whatever. It strikes me, therefore, that now the time has come when we ought to give this industry protection. I thought so five or six years ago, as it seems the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] has reminded me. I then thought the time had come when this article should be put upon the same footing with terne-plates and other sheets of iron, and I believe if the proposition had been adopted then we should by this time have covered in this country all the iron which is necessary for tin-plate.

I shall vote for the amendment with great pleasure.

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa in charge of the bill a question. There is a difference of opinion here between experts. I ask what in the opinion of the Senator in charge of this bill is the duty proposed by the amendment? What is the ad valorem rate?

Mr. ALLISON. The ad valorem duty now on tin-plate is 33 per cent.

Mr. VEST. At 1 cent a pound?

Mr. ALLISON. One cent a pound. We now propose to increase it 1.15 cents, which would be between 66 and 70 per cent., not quite 70.

Mr. REAGAN. What is the duty on this iron?

Mr. ALLISON. The duty on this iron is a cent and a half a pound.

Mr. REAGAN. What is the proposed duty?

Mr. ALLISON. One and four-tenth cents a pound. We reduce the duty on the iron that enters into this production a tenth of a cent per pound; that is, all iron above 25 wire gauge.

Mr. REAGAN. And that would give a protection of 64.25 per cent., as proposed by the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I think, taking the ad valorem and assuming that prices are going to be in the future what they have been, the percentage would be about 66, although I look forward to a very marked depression in prices, which will reduce the ad valorem.

Mr. REAGAN. Is it proposed to increase that duty beyond 64 or 66 per cent. on sheet-iron?

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir.

Mr. REAGAN. I understand the Senator to say that as tin is free, and under all the circumstances we can make the sheet-iron about as cheap as it is made anywhere else, except for the condition of labor, it is simply a question of the duty upon sheet-iron?

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator misunderstood me. I said that the cost of making tin-plate from this class of iron is three-quarters of a cent a pound, or to be exactly accurate seventy-six hundredths of a cent in this country, as estimated, more than it is in England or Wales. Therefore we have added three-fourths of a cent a pound to the existing duty. We have supposed that the present rate of duty upon this sheet-iron would stand a reduction of one-tenth of 1 cent, and therefore we have so reduced it.

Mr. REAGAN. I understood the Senator to say that the cost of making the tin-plate is 76 per cent. higher in this country than in Great Britain. What enters into the elements of cost that makes it cost 76 per cent. more here than there?

Mr. ALLISON. I have every element of cost here. Our testimony shows every element of cost here, and every element of cost in Wales, so that there can be no question about the relation between the two countries.

Mr. REAGAN. I will not ask the Senator to show that, but it struck me as very remarkable that there should be 76 per cent. difference in the cost between the making of this material in England and here.

Mr. ALLISON. Seventy-six one-hundredths of a cent per pound, as I understand, is what it costs to tin in this country compared with Wales. On page 1048 of the testimony is a table going over all the details; for instance, the cost of making bars, billets, sheets, and then the pickling and cleaning with acids and the wages of the tin-men, and so on, including all the elements, showing that in Wales a box of 105 pounds would cost $3.37, while to produce the same quantity in the United States would cost $5.25, or a difference of $1.88 per box.

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator has examined the question and is satisfied that that difference exists?

Mr. ALLISON. I have no doubt of it. Here is what Mr. Cronemeyer, who is an expert in this matter, says:

Mr. CRONEMEYER. Of course tin costs there the same as here. From the black sheet, I said, it is $1.98. Over there it would be $1.25.
Senator ALDRICH. Then you want 0.73 of a cent protection?
Mr. CRONEMEYER. Yes; 0.73 more than we get on the black iron.
The CHAIRMAN. That would be 0.7 of a cent in round numbers?
Senator JONES. That is 0.7 of a cent per pound?
Mr. CRONEMEYER. Yes.
The CHAIRMAN. About 0.7 of a cent per pound; in other words, whatever duty we put on pickled and cold-rolled sheet iron or steel, then you want 0.7 of a cent a pound additional in order to enable you to make tin-plate here?

That is all there is in the statement.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I desire very much that we shall reach a vote on this subject, and yet I must ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few observations.

Of course the State that I represent, Connecticut, can not have any direct interest in the raising of this duty. We shall not manufacture tin-plate in Connecticut; we shall not manufacture it in New England; so that whatever we may do in this matter can not be attributed to any selfishness growing out of locality. It seems to me a simple question, and yet a very important one, and as the Senator from Ohio remarked a few moments ago, we either ought to put tin-plate on the free-list or we ought to impose a duty upon it which will try the experiment fairly of whether it can be manufactured in this country, because we do not want this revenue. We want to avoid the revenue; but it seems to me the time has come in the history of the country and in the history of the industry when if we refuse now to put on an increased duty which the people who know about this say will establish the industry of manufacturing tin-plate in this country, then we might as will forever abandon the idea of attempting to make tin-plate in this country. The Senator from Maryland says that if we had the industry in this country he would not vote to reduce the duty, provided the duty was only and necessarily a protective duty, but that he is unwilling to put a duty upon an article for the purpose of seeing whether it can be manufactured in this country.

Well, now, I submit that if that had been the policy of the Government from 1789 up to the present time, a period of one hundred years, we should not have had any manufacturing in this country. If protective duties had not been imposed upon branches of industry which were not carried on in the United States, we should not have had those industries established in this country. So, as it seems to me, it is no departure from the principle and the system which has been adopted from the first; and to my mind it is just this question: Shall we give up the attempt ever to produce tin-plate in this country?

Of course I do not know except by the statements which are made here whether this duty will establish the industry in this country; but I am assured by the committee that it will, and I confess that I want to vote for every duty which will establish a new industry in this country; that is to say, an industry which under any circumstances it can be supposed can be profitably carried on in this country. If employment can be found for 70,000 additional workmen in this country in the manufacture of the whole or a large portion of these 283,000 tons of tin-plate which we now pay our money to England for, I want that opportunity for the employment of labor to be satisfied; and I do not believe that this duty is going to result in any great increase of the price of tin-plate; I think it very doubtful whether it results in any if the usual course pursued by foreign manufacturers is adopted by them. When they see there is a probability that tin-plate factories will be established in this country they will put down the price quite equal to the amount that is added to the duty; and even if the price is temporarily raised all the experience of this country shows that it will immediately fall to or below its present price.

It is said that within six months or a year plants can be adapted towards the manufacture in this country of a large proportion, I think a half or a third, of all the tin-plate which we buy. What does that mean? Suppose we establish plants for the manufacture of one-half of the tin-plate which we consume and purchase from abroad. It is said that we use three-quarters of the entire consumption of the world, and that means if we establish plants to make half of it in this country, that we are going to add one-third to the capacity for producing tin-plate in the world. There is no Senator who does not know that that very act, adding one-third to the capacity of the world for the production of tin-plate, must inevitably reduce the price; and so, as it seems to me, we shall not have, we certainly shall not have this duty added to the price of tin-plate, to continue at any rate any length of time; nor do I believe that if there is an increase in price that will come out of the consumer of tin-plate.

Speaking of the consumer as the person who buys the articles which are made out of tin-plate, I bought a little while since, when I was out on a camping expedition, a pound of baking powder in a tin can for 55 cents. Now, the utmost that could be added if the duty were added to the price of that can would be a quarter or a half a cent. Does anybody suppose the retailer would have asked 55½ cents for that? Any increase of price is going to be distributed over and among a great many people and not fall upon the ultimate consumer, and, as I say, in a very short time it must be apparent that the price will be reduced.

If the duty is a tax which is paid by the consumer, as it will not in this case by the ultimate consumer, the consumer gets the benefit of it if he is going to continue to buy the article upon which the duty is laid in the reduction of price which inevitably must follow the establishment of such an industry as this and the increase of the capacity of production of an article like this. I agree, perhaps, that if a man is going to die within twenty-four hours and has to pay half a cent on a tin can or a cent on a dinner-pail more than he otherwise would except for the imposition of this duty, to use a common phrase he would be out just so much; but we do not expect to die just within twenty-four hours, and if a man is going to live until the inevitable law of political economy takes effect and the increase of the capacity for production diminishes the price of the article, then he is going to get the benefit of it and be better off at the end of a year, or two years, or five years, as the case may be, than he would if we had not established the industry in this country, if we had not added to the capacity of the world to produce this article and he had been still paying the price which the foreign manufacturers chose to impose upon this country.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I understand that this is a proposition to increase the duty upon tin-plate from an ad valorem of 33 per cent. to 70. This is an article that enters into the consumption of almost every family in the land. It is not confined simply to the canning industry, but it is an article which enters into every household. There is scarcely a single household in the land where there is not more or less to some extent, in some cases to a very considerable extent, the use of tin. It is used for the purpose of roofing, putting on roofs of dwellings, and for other purposes. It is an article which is used by the people generally throughout the country in some shape or other; and here is a proposition to increase the ad valorem duty upon that article from 33 per cent. to 70 per cent., according to the statement of the Senator from Iowa.

What is the reason for this? It is admitted on all sides of this Chamber that there is no necessity for it. The Treasury does not need the revenue from it. Why, therefore, should this duty be advanced? The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] and other Senators have said that it is in order that an industry may spring up in this country that can manufacture these goods, these tins. We are, then, for the purpose of experimenting, to increase the burden of every household in this country to a greater or less extent.

It is assumed on the other side of the Chamber that the consumers of this tin will not pay the duty. Why, such an idea certainly must be very erroneous. Take, for instance, a canning establishment where there are ten or twenty thousand dollars' worth of tin used. Does any person suppose it will not add that to the price of its goods when it puts them upon the market?

If it was confined simply to canned goods and the cans that are made for the purpose of canning fruits, vegetables, meats, fish, and other things, does any one suppose that persons engaged in that business, investing large amounts for the purpose of buying the tin with which to make the cans, will not add the duty to the price of the goods, and that they will not go into the hands of the consumers enhanced by reason of the cost of the cans in which they are incased? It illustrates, in my opinion, very clearly the position of the two parties in the Senate upon the question of taxing the people. Here where there is no industry in this country to be affected by this, no industry in this country that can be affected by it even if we were to put the article upon the free-list, for the purpose of experimenting to ascertain whether we can not develop a new industry of this kind we propose now to increase the burdens upon this class of goods from 33 to 70 per cent. ad valorem in cost.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that if there is any unwise legislation that has ever taken place, this must be an illustration of it. As I before remarked, there is scarcely a household in the land but what is interested in this very question. You can not go into any kitchen in this city but what you will find there these goods in the utensils necessary for the comfort of the families; you can not go into any canning establishment of the country but what you will find large amounts of money invested in buying tin-plates in order to preserve the goods and fit them for the market. The simple fact is that there is no industry in the United States to be injured by refusing this increase, no existing industry to be protected by an additional duty; and yet you propose deliberately to raise the ad valorem duty from 33 to 70 per cent.

Mr. President, I do not desire to enter into the discussion of the general subject of the tariff. I have abstained from that. At the last session of the Senate I delivered some views upon the general subject of the reform of our revenue laws, and I do not wish to trouble the Senate any further in that regard; but it seems to me that a proposition of this kind is so obviously unjust and wrong that it ought to receive the reprobation of every Senator on this floor. If there was any good to be served, any industry to be protected by it, it would be a different thing; but there is no industry whatever claiming that it will be benefited by this increased duty. It is simply a proposition to experiment and see whether by imposing an onerous burden upon a necessary of life we can not induce some persons to make an experiment to see whether this kind of goods may not be manufactured in this country.

It is very unwise legislation, in my opinion, and for one I can not vote for such a proposition.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, in 1883 this proposition was very fully discussed, as I before stated, and with the light that was thrown on it by the report of the Tariff Commission, who held that it would require a duty of 2.1 cents a pound to enable manufacturers to begin to make the article in this country. The proposition to fix that high duty came before this body—it was presented by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. Now it seems, if the statements of the Senators from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] and Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], in charge of this bill, be correct—and I have no doubt their statements are based upon the information given to them by manufacturers of iron—that a less rate or duty will enable them to manufacture this article. If I am correct in this, then the country has gained immensely by waiting from 1883 until now, and I have no doubt that if the committee would permit the present law to stand or make a reduction, by the time we come to consider this matter hereafter it will probably be found that 33 per cent. will be sufficient.

But I desire, Mr. President, to read what a distinguished member of this body said in reply to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who made at that time the same argument that he has made to-day, the same argument that is made substantially by my friend from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], that it was the duty of the Government not only to protect the existing manufacturing interests but to go on and by putting an increased tax upon various articles induce other manufacturing interests to be established. In reply to a proposition of that sort from the Senator from Ohio the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] who presides with so much ability over this body made a conclusive answer. I will read his answer to the Senate. It seemed to me it was conclusive then, and it is now. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] said—it will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 26, 1883:

> The Senator from Ohio states rather an advance opinion, I think, upon this subject. We have heard hitherto of the necessity of protecting infant industries; that it was necessary to impose additional burdens upon the people to prevent industries that were struggling for existence from being strangled. But he now assures us that the duties are essential to create industries, to institute and inaugurate manufactures here that do not exist, for the purpose of obtaining prospective profits that may be realized upon articles that are not and can not be manufactured here, and that are imported in vast quantities for the welfare of the people.
> Mr. President, if any argument has been adduced or can be adduced for the extraordinary motion of the Sentor from Ohio I should be very glad to hear it. He claims that this is something that is in the interest of American industry, but the industry does not exist. It is apparent that so far as tin-plate is concerned it is actually a raw material. It is in no sense whatever competitive with any American manufacture. The only reason why a duty should be imposed upon tin-plate is for the purpose of revenue. The tariff upon this article should be fiscal merely. It can not be fiscal and protective, because there is nothing to protect, and every dollar that is imposed upon this article that is in excess of what it ought to bear as a revenue proposition is so much that is directly taken from the industry, from the wages of this country, that have burdens upon them already which they are illy able to bear.

Now, sir, I adopt that statement of the Senator from Kansas. It is exactly true and can not be controverted. I think we are going to an extreme when we pass beyond the present rate of duty that is imposed on this article. My own belief is that this article should be placed on the free-list just as you have jute and other articles that can not be successfully manufactured in this country.

I was very much interested and instructed by the discussion between the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Texas a few days ago. The Senator from Ohio then took the broad ground, which is correct, that while we could produce jute in Texas, or in South Carolina, or in Louisiana, the time had not arrived when it was possible to manufacture in this country in competition with other peoples, and therefore we should place it on the free-list and let our countrymen have the benefit of the low-priced article from abroad, simply because we were not prepared to manufacture it here. The same rule should be adopted as to tin-plate.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GORMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does he think there is any obstacle or any reason why tin-plate should not be manufactured in this country except the greater cost of labor here?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes. I think there are additional reasons for it.

Mr. ALDRICH. What are they?

Mr. GORMAN. I think in the manufacture of steel and iron, as the Senator is perfectly well aware, in all the grades except the coarser textures, we have not yet reached that point in the manufacture where our people have become skilled so that we can make the finer grades at a reasonable cost. We are not prepared for it. We have not worked up to it yet, and the time has not arrived when it can be done. Now, that our manufactures are approaching it, and approaching it under the system upon which we are acting, is demonstrated by the fact that in 1882 the intelligent commission appointed to look into all these matters said that it was impossible to manufacture tin-plates in the United States unless you made the duty 2.1 cents a pound.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him how long he thinks it will take before we can develop the industry in this country sufficiently to make tin-plates, provided the present rate of 1½ cents a pound on steel sheets can be maintained and the duty on tin-plates from which they are made is maintained at 1 cent a pound? When does he think the time will arrive that we can manufacture tin-plates in this country?

Mr. GORMAN. I am not at all astonished at that question of the Senator from Rhode Island, for his whole proposition is a speculative one. The very proposition pending before the Senate is a mere matter of speculation whether tin-plates can be manufactured at a rate of duty of 70 per cent. I know that there are enthusiastic men who are engaged in the iron business who believe it can be done. I have read their statements with a great deal of interest, and I have no doubt the time will come when we shall be prepared to do it, and I have no question myself that if this duty remains at 1 cent a pound they will progress in the next six years precisely as they have in the past six years, when they said it would require 2.1 cents a pound to enable them to manufacture, and now, as I understand the proposition, they can do it for 1¾.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not understand that that is true. What rate does the Senator understand we propose to place upon this article?

Mr. GORMAN. I understood from the Senator from Iowa it was about 1¾ cents a pound.

Mr. ALDRICH. Two and fifteen hundredths cents.

Mr. GORMAN. Two and fifteen hundredths. Then I misunderstood the Senator from Iowa and did not catch the amendment as it was read. That is a greater tax than I supposed it was, and it only shows the enormity of the proposition.

I have nothing to add to what has been so well said by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], which I have read, except to enter my protest and to record my vote against this proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask the Senator from Rhode Island whether, as he understands it, this bill in any way interferes with the subject of drawbacks on tin-plates?

Mr. ALDRICH. It does not.

Mr. MITCHELL. What is meant by the provision in section 39 providing "that all articles exported manufactured of materials upon which duty has been paid" are "entitled to drawback?" That is on page 224, section 39 of the bill. I wish to know exactly what is meant or what is the effect of these words in that section, "and entitled to drawback under any provision of law."

Mr. ALDRICH. Various articles are entitled to drawback under various provisions of law when they are manufactured of imported material. For instance, tin-ware in the canning industries of the Columbia River is now entitled under the provisions of existing law to 90 per cent. drawback, and under the provisions of this bill they will be entitled to 100 per cent., the whole amount of duty paid.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understand that; but this bill does not undertake to prescribe in any of its provisions the articles that shall be subject to drawback. Is the Senator quite certain that there is provision in the existing law that covers what I am referring to?

Mr. ALDRICH. As I understand it, a drawback is now being paid under the prescribed conditions of 90 per cent. of the amount of the duties which have been collected.

Mr. MITCHELL. I notice that by the bill there are a great many of the existing sections of the Revised Statutes repealed. Is it not quite possible that the provisions of existing law prescribing on what articles there shall be a drawback are repealed?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think it is entirely safe to say that none of them is repealed. If any such action has been taken by the committee, it certainly has been through an inadvertence.

Mr. MITCHELL. That was not the intention?

Mr. ALDRICH. That was not the intention of the committee.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I do not wish to take part in this debate further than to state that the amendment which is now proposed is virtually the giving of nearly $6,000,000 for the purpose of encouraging the commencement of a new and untried business.

The people of the United States and the Government of the United States stand in relation to this question precisely in the position that an individual would do if he were to have before him the question of appropriating any portion of his revenues to the creation of a new employment.

Admitting the theory—and I see no well-founded distinction between an inducement to a new and the support of an established business—admitting the theory that the Government is by bounty or by Government support, by the collection of a tax and its appropriation, to create particular industries and employments for the benefit of the whole people upon the theory that diminishing the competition between a foreign and the home country, which has become an established proposition in this country, will ultimately produce a lower rate of value which the people will be required to pay for the newly created article—admitting that, which has become a settled policy in this Government, what is the next question? Five million seven hundred and sixty thousand dollars collected this year, probably $6,000,000 the next, an average likely with the increasing consumption of the country, appropriated to such persons as will develop this industry, upon the condition that they substitute their products for those that are imported.

The first question that an individual would reasonably ask would be as to the probability of effecting that purpose, as to the cost to the people of the country, whether $6,000,000 for an indefinite period of time is or is not an extravagant appropriation of money for that particular purpose. The direct way, as a matter of logic, evidently would be to prohibit the importation of tin-plates. This being a necessary article there would be, of course, an unlimited field of profit, of charge for the manufacture in the United States, subject only to the laws that create competition or that restrain competition confined to a particular locality; but the people would be relieved from the payment of the tax until the article had been produced and actually sold.

Now, if we are to reason upon this proposition, what argument can be given by any person to show why there should not be an absolute prohibition of the importation of this article if the object be to require its production in this country? If not, then you must consider carefully the question of how far the amount of $6,000,000 increasing year by year is or is not an unreasonable appropriation of money for this particular purpose.

Is it an established proposition that the Government is to create these industries by taxation upon the people and the appropriation of it? It does not matter whether it is done as was stated by Mr. Hamilton in his remarkable paper upon manufactures, whether the appropriation is made by a duty on imports or by a bounty, which, in his judgment, was preferable and the more direct and efficacious method, as it unquestionably is—the cheaper to the people at large, the more direct in its effect in encouragement. It does not matter which of these two methods is adopted.

It is not to be justified in any case, nor can there be any reason given by any one why it should be so, unless the demonstration is clear and evident that the industry can not only be created by the appropriation of money, and unless it can also be demonstrated that this new production can be made upon a basis equal in point of cheapness to the community of the manufactured product from abroad, because it is not proposed and can not be justified unless you are going to create a baronial order and make an aristocracy living upon the bounty and taxation. It can not be justified in reason upon any theory of encouragement or the creation of an industry that it shall continue to live by bounty forever.

It is a necessary portion of this argument that there shall be a period in which its development will be more beneficial to the people in point of cheapness of cost to them than the imported product. Therefore it is an essential part of this proposition upon the theory of protection, either in the creation of a new industry or the maintenance of an old and existing one, that the cost to the people shall be vindicated by evidence that it can be successfully carried on.

Now what is the evidence in this case? There is a positive, unquestioned, and admitted tax of $6,000,000 a year for the single purpose of creating a new employment of possibly beneficent effects in the country. Is there any reasonable evidence of the possibility or the probability or the certainty as ought to be required, of that result?

Mr. President, it can not be said that there is the slightest evidence of the certainty of this result. It can not be said that there is any great evidence of its probability, and we are reduced now to the proposition of the imposition of a tax and the appropriation of $6,000,000 annually, the tax being certain and the appropriation dependent upon possible and uncertain conditions.

That is the question. The tax is certain. The poor man must pay, the poor woman must pay; and now when you read the treatise of Mr. Atkinson, which is based upon mathematical propositions, upon ascertained facts, that the margin between want and abundance in this country is less than a cent a day upon its laboring people, when we see that a cent a day in the compensation paid to the laboring people of this country will produce upon the one hand want and upon the other hand abundance, and that is a fact, not speculation, but a fact based upon the statistics of the country, made by that very able and accurate man in his computations upon that subject—when we consider that fact are you willing now to impose this additional burden on that class of people to whom this cent a day is a matter of comfort or of discomfort, of abundance or of want.

When we impose that tax upon them upon no other ground than the bare possibility that these results may follow, it is an entirely indefensible proposition. We are showing the theory of protection even as maintained on the other side to a point not only dangerous to the perpetuity of our form of Government, but certain of abuse and oppressive use when we enter upon the region of possible speculative and conjectural enterprises wholly disconnected from all needs and purposes of revenue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL (when Mr. DANIEL'S name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. If he were here, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). My pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has been transferred to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES], and I vote "yea."

Mr. PLATT (when Mr. HAWLEY'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. HAWLEY] is paired for the day, I believe, with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]. My colleague is absent for the day.

Mr. VANCE. I will transfer the pair which I have with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER], and vote "nay."

Mr. ALLISON. I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], but I am authorized to vote in order to make a quorum.

Mr. COCKRELL (to Mr. ALLISON). Suppose we exchange pairs. I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], who is compelled to be absent to-day; and by agreement you and I can exchange the pairs.

Mr. ALLISON. I will exchange with pleasure with the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then I will announce that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON].

Mr. ALLISON. And I vote "yea."

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

Mr. BROWN. I beg leave to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] who has the bill in charge to paragraph 287, in relation to rice, and should be glad to have him indicate when he proposes to consider that.

Mr. ALLISON. I prefer to take up another matter first, and we can go to that hereafter.

In paragraph 147, on page 106, line 553, there is an amendment which I desire to have acted upon, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of paragraph 147, relating to sheets or plates of iron or steel, or taggers' iron, etc., it is proposed to add:

Until January 1, 1890.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I now ask for the consideration of the amendment submitted by me from the Finance Committee, to come in on page 86, line 57.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

Mr. ALLISON. That is an amendment relating to sugar. I send to the desk two or three modifications of the printed amendment, which I will ask to have read, and I presume there will be no objection to their being inserted in the amendment, because they do not change the sense.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can modify the amendment. It will be read as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 86, after line 57, it is proposed to insert as new sections the following:

SEC. —. That until April, 1900, there shall be paid to the producer of sugar testing not less than 80 degrees by the polariscope, from beets, sorghum, or sugar-cane grown within the United States, a bounty of 1 cent per pound, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe.

The producer of said sugar to be entitled to said bounty shall have first filled with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue a notice of the place of production, with a general description of the machinery and methods to be employed by him, with an estimate of the amount of sugar proposed to be produced in the next ensuing year and an application for a license to so produce, to be accompanied by a bond in a penalty, and with sureties to be approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, conditioned that he will faithfully observe all rules and regulations that shall be prescribed for such manufacture and production of sugar.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, upon receiving the application and bond hereinbefore provided for, shall issue to the applicant a license to produce sugar from sorghum, beets, or sugar-cane grown in the United States at the place and with the machinery and by the methods described in the application; but said license shall not extend beyond one year from the date thereof.

No bounty shall be paid to any person engaged in refining sugars which have been imported into the United States, or produced in the United States upon which the bounty herein provided for has already been paid or applied for, nor to any person unless he shall have first been licensed as herein provided, and only upon sugar produced by such person from sorghum, beets, or sugar-cane grown in the United States. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall from time to time make all needful rules and regulations for the manufacture of sugar from sorghum, beets, or sugar-cane grown in the United States, and shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, exercise supervision and inspection of the manufacture thereof.

The bounty herein provided for, including the expenses incident to the payment thereof, shall be paid from the duties collected and paid into the Treasury on sugars imported into the United States, and a sufficient sum for said purpose is hereby appropriated and shall be paid annually from the duties so collected, such appropriation and payment to continue until the 1st day of April, A. D. 1900, and no longer.

SEC. —. That any person who shall knowingly refine or aid in the refining of sugar imported into the United States or upon which the bounty herein provided for has already been paid or applied for, at the place described in the license issued by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and any person not entitled to the bounty herein provided for who shall apply for or receive the same, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall pay a fine not exceeding $5,000, or be imprisoned for a period not exceeding five years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. VANCE. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I have not been able to see that amendment in print and have not had time to examine it, but I understand that it has within it the provision for a bounty of 1 cent a pound upon all sugar produced in the United States. That I understand to be the meaning of it.

Now, I do not wish to enter into any extended discussion of this subject. I suppose that those who know my political opinions will take it for granted that I am opposed to this bounty; that I am opposed to all bounties; that they constitute the most objectionable form of protection per se; that in my judgment the system of giving bounties is antagonistic to the true theory of all free government. If this practice is indulged in by the legislative power of the Government, it simply amounts to this, that a private citizen is to be paid out of the general Treasury of the country for entering into some particular business or pursuit. The doctrine to which I am devoted and in which I expect to die is that this Government belongs to all the people; that its highest mission is to protect every man in life, liberty, and property, and after doing this that the citizen, under equal and just laws, shall be permitted to work out his own destiny, to achieve success or to fail; but this idea of the Government going into partnership with any individual or with any set of individuals in order to enable him or them to obtain peculiar advantages in order to enrich themselves at the expense of the large body of the people is a relic of absolute tyranny and utterly opposed to a free and popular government.

Not having the amendment before me, I have not been able to see exactly the provision in regard to this bounty, but I ask for a division of the question, if it is possible, my object being to take a vote by yeas and nays upon that provision which gives a bounty of 1 cent a pound to the producer of sugar in the United States. If it is possible under the terms of the amendment to bring about in a parliamentary way that division, I ask for it.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] or the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] to explain to the Senate why this amendment which they propose did not form part of the original bill, and why no recommendation of this bounty is contained in the report made by the majority of the Committee on Finance, which with this single exception has furnished such very valuable information upon the tariff question.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I can only answer for myself, though I presume I can answer in the same sense for every gentleman on the committee, that it was not incorporated in the report on the bill as originally reported, because it was not then agreed upon, and I will say to the Senator that it has only been agreed to within a very short time; in fact, about the time that it was originally presented by me to the Senate as an original amendment. I do not know what further answer I can give than that.

I will say further, however, that we have been told with great emphasis by the Senators from Louisiana and their friends that the protection which we give in this bill to the sugar producers in this country is not a sufficient protection, and I confess that suggestion made some impression upon me. Now, inasmuch as we give them a bounty equivalent to the protection of the existing law, I supposed they would be satisfied, especially as the result of this mode of giving them protection will be to enable the people of my State and the other States of this Union who do not produce sugar to obtain sugar at 1 cent less per pound than they pay now.

I say with frankness that the object I have and I believe the committee has in the insertion of this amendment, is to induce the production of sugar in this country from beets, from sorghum, and from sugar-cane. It is for the purpose of encouraging that industry that I have consented to this great benefaction or bounty to those who produce sugar from cane and sorghum and beets.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield the floor?

Mr. VEST. Yes; I will yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. EUSTIS. Then I would ask the Senator from Iowa to state whether this proffered bounty of 1 cent a pound on sugar produced in this country is not a direct contradiction of the ground taken by the committee for the large reduction of the import duty. As I remember the report of that committee, the specific ground is taken that the cause of this radical reduction of the duty on sugar is on account of the known and ascertained limited sugar capacity of this country.

Mr. ALDRICH. Cane-producing.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not consider this in any sense a change of the position originally taken by the committee. I will say frankly to the Senator from Louisiana that, judging from a century of experiment and experience, the sugar produced from cane in this country has not kept pace with the increase of the population of the country, and I do not believe now that unless we can make sugar successfully from beets or from sorghum that we shall be enabled in this country to produce a sufficient amount of sugar for our own consumption. I will not go further in the expression of belief at this time, but the object, I will say, of this amendment was a yielding, if I may so speak, to those who believe that with proper encouragement sugar can be produced successfully in this country from beets and sorghum.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President, I would ask the Senator from Iowa whether at the time that the Senate committee substitute was reported, and at the time that the report accompanying that bill was submitted to the Senate, the majority of the Finance Committee were not as well informed as to the capacity of the sugar-producing industry of the United States as they were at the date when they agreed to propose this bounty system?

Mr. ALLISON. Why, Mr. President, I do not know exactly what the Senator means by that kind of interrogatory. I do not think I knew quite as much on the 5th of October, when this bill was reported, as I did on the 7th of November, nor do I believe I knew quite as much about the sugar question then as I do now. I confess that I have received some valuable information from a witness who appeared before the committee only a few days ago. Our committee has not shut itself up like an oyster with the idea that we knew everything, when this bill was reported. We have kept our committee-room open every day and nearly every night since this session began, gathering information and correcting ourselves where we had made a mistake. We have received no added information as to the probable production of sugar from sugar-cane in the United States; but rather we have received confirmation of the opinions that we previously had, that confirmation being imparted by the gentlemen from Louisiana who appeared before the committee only a few days ago. If there was anything lacking in my absolute opinion that sugar-cane would not be the method or means whereby we could supply our sugar, that information was supplied to me by the gentlemen from Louisiana who appeared before our committee.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to ask a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GIBSON. Did the Senator not receive information from the planters of Louisiana that the production of sugar per acre had increased nearly 25 per cent. in the last five or six years, and that the output of sugar per ton of cane by the application of the diffusion process had increased nearly 100 per cent. the yield of sugar-cane? In other words, that under the old milling process in Louisiana from 1864 when they made 5,000 tons of sugar until last year when they made 200,000 tons of sugar, if they should to-day apply the diffusion process they would, instead of making 200,000 tons of sugar out of the cane raised by them, make nearly 400,000 tons of sugar, judging the yield of cane in pounds of sugar per ton of cane by the application of a new process.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, we had some testimony in the line suggested by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], and we had also the testimony that there was no diffusion plant in the State of Louisiana except that erected by the Government of the United States, and that of all the sugar-planters in the State of Louisiana not one had even suggested that he would create a diffusion plant of his own in that State. But even with this diffusion process as applied to sugar-cane, Mr. Spreckels disclosed very clearly that he can beat that product by the manufacture of sugar from beets.

Another thing was disclosed by the gentlemen who appeared before the committee, and that is that more than two-thirds of the sugar produced in the State of Louisiana is now produced by the open-kettle process, a process a century old. So, while I agree with the Senator from Louisiana that they are taking some recent steps to largely improve the processes of producing sugar, it must be borne in mind that the increase of population in the United States and the increase of consumption of sugar per capita is so great in this country that you must add 100,000,000 pounds or 150,000,000 pounds of sugar every year to the consumption of this country in order to meet the demands of the growing population. If Louisiana was increasing her production of sugar at a ratio far beyond anything she proposes she would not then even be able to produce sugar enough to supply the increasing consumption in the United States, saying nothing of the 3,000,000,000 pounds of sugar that are now imported from foreign countries.

Mr. ALDRICH. I wish to supplement the statement of the Senator from Iowa by one other statement. If the use of the diffusion process in Louisiana should result in doubling the yield of the sugar from the cane, it would have the same effect in the tropical islands and other sugar-producing countries of the world and would maintain the disparity of the value which now exists between those tropical producing countries and the United States. It would increase, certainly it would not diminish it.

Mr. EUSTIS. I ask the Senator from Iowa whether those gentlemen who represented the sugar-planters of Louisiana did not inform the committee that they did not desire a bounty?

Mr. ALLISON. Of course the testimony taken before us was printed. I have not a copy of it before me, and therefore can only state my recollection. They stated that the existing protection to their industry was absolutely necessary to enable them to carry it on now, namely, the protection practically of 2 cents a pound for sugar. I think I asked them specifically if they would not be content with having one-half of that protection in the form of a bounty of a cent a pound and the other half in the duty as proposed by this bill, and they stated that if our methods could be as enduring as the method in existence now they would be content with it, but they said they were afraid that somebody would come along in the Senate or House of Representatives and insist after a while that Louisiana was receiving too much in this form, and that it could be concealed (was the inferential argument) if we put it all in the shape of a tariff duty rather than part of it as a bounty.

Mr. GIBSON. Did they not express a preference for the protection feature of the tariff rather than the bounty?

Mr. ALLISON. My recollection would be from looking at the faces and hearing their statements that if they had a preference for any particular mode, it was not expressed. What they wanted was that they should have another cent a pound added to the duty in our bill. They may have believed that if they could get the protection needed in the concealed method of a tariff duty on sugar they would prefer it. But as I understood them, the main thing they wanted was this additional cent a pound in order to enable them to continue the industry successfully. As I understood them, after explaining to them what we proposed, to allow this to last until 1900, which would enable them to go on certainly for a number of years, they would be satisfied with that.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, the question before the Senate, as I understand it, is as to this proposed legislatiou giving a bounty of 1 cent a pound upon sugar produced in the United States. That is the precise question.

Mr. ALLISON. That is it.

Mr. VEST. There is no division, as I find upon examination, possible of this amendment, as in its web and woof, every letter, line, and section, it means bounty.

Now, if I understand the Senator from Iowa and his colleague upon the committee, the Senator from Rhode Island, they say that some new light has dawned upon them since they prepared their report in regard to the Senate substitute now pending. They made a report then substantially as to sugar—and I want to call their attention to it—a very deliberate report and very exhaustive report, after long delay, much testimony, great examination of witnesses and parties, and here it is:

> The excessive duty of from 2 to 3½ cents per pound now imposed upon sugar adds a considerable sum to the daily cost of living of every family in the United States, where in most cases the cost of sugar is greater than the cost of bread.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator deny that statement?

Mr. VEST. That is not the point which I have now under discussion. I do not deny that, and I was glad to hear my friend from Rhode Island graduate on that subject yesterday by saying that the average effect of the tariff was to increase the price to the consumer.

If this debate has done nothing else, it has brought about that admission, and the time has not been wasted.

The high rates of duty which have been levied upon this important article of food have not successfully developed the sugar-producing industry of the United States. The great natural advantages which the producers of cane sugars in the tropical islands have over those of the United States preclude domestic competition upon equal terms.

Now, here is the point to which I ask the serious consideration of our friends on the opposite side, and which I think will require some explanation:

If it were not for the fact that parties interested in the production of sugar from sorghum or beets are confident of the rapid development of these industries in the United States, the committee would recommend a still greater reduction in the rate of duty upon sugar, as the advantages of this reduction would be felt through a larger circle than any other which could be made in our tariff schedules.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator want an explanation of that statement?

Mr. VEST. Of course; that is what I want.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. You want me to answer it?

Mr. VEST. At any time.

Mr. ALLISON. I believe every line and syllable of that statement.

Mr. ALDRICH. So do I.

Mr. ALLISON. Does anybody believe that we can produce sugar enough in this country from sugar-cane to supply one-tenth and as population increases one-fifteenth of the sugar consumed here? Does anybody believe that? It is therefore a direct tax upon consumption and is in direct conflict with everything there is contained in that report. Does the Senator from Missouri suppose that we have changed our views as respects that? Certainly I have not. I have no doubt that we can increase by the stimulation of a bounty somewhat, and perhaps considerably, the production of sugar from sugar-cane; but I ask the Senator from Missouri if he believes that we can from sugar-cane alone produce one-half—I will say one-third—of the consumption of sugar in this country in the next twenty-five years? That report is based upon that idea, and I adhere to it. If the Senator wants me to state further, I will say that in my judgment it is extremely doubtful whether we can within twenty-five years make the production of sugar from beets and sorghum such a success as will enable us to produce all we consume.

Mr. EUSTIS. Why not?

Mr. ALLISON. It will be a gradual growth, and it will take some years. It may not take twenty-five years; I hope it will only take ten. I hope by 1900 we can do it. But it will require a large amount of money for the plant. It will require a great change in the agricultural industries of several States. Everybody knows that that is not going to be done in one year or two years or three years. I hope it will be done in ten years, but I am not sanguine that it will be done in less than twenty or twenty-five years.

Mr. VEST. With entire respect to my friend from Iowa, that is not the question. We are talking now about bounties. We are talking about the proposed bounty of 1 cent a pound; and we want the new light that has come to the majority of the Committee on Finance, because the report shows that they considered the question of the manufacture of sugar from beets and sorghum, and they said if it had not been for the assurance which they believed that a large amount of sugar would be produced from those two sources they would have reduced the duty upon imported sugar more than they did. Now, what light has come to them since?

Mr. ALDRICH. We did not say we believed it, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. VEST. Here is the language, and I leave fair-minded men to construe it:

If it were not for the fact that parties interested in the production of sugar from sorghum or beets are confident of the rapid development of these industries in the United States the committee would recommend a still greater reduction.

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes, that is it.

Mr. VEST. Then the confidence must have been transferred from the witness to the committee, for they acted upon it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Sufficient confidence had been transferred to the committee to warrant them in recommending Congress to try the experiment, I am free to say.

Mr. VEST. I want to know what new light and new facts have come that induce them now to offer a bounty of 1 cent a pound on sugar when they had this whole question before them and never thought of it, or if they did, rejected the idea when they made this report and brought in this bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator from Missouri or either of the Senators from Louisiana expect the members of the committee to detail verbatim the conversations or the evidence which they have received upon the subject of sugar-producing in the last three or four months?

Mr. VEST. Oh, no.

Mr. ALDRICH. It would certainly take a member of the committee three or four days to do that. I will say very frankly to the Senator from Missouri, if it is any satisfaction to him, that the information which we have received from parties whose testimony we believed to be entitled to credit satisfied the committee that it is for the interest of the people of this country that we should try to produce sugar here, and so develop the agricultural industries of the country.

Mr. VEST. I might inquire why, if the majority of the Finance Committee propose to rely upon the bounty, they did not let the duty stand upon sugar as it is. We ought to be entirely frank with each other about this great economic question. This is a most serious part of the bill. The Senators ought to admit that political exigencies brought about this bounty clause. ["Oh!"] That is it. Now I have struck the core of this whole matter.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that no political exigency controlled my judgment or my mind in reporting this bounty. So, if he has been fishing with his bait for an admission of that sort from me, he has made a great mistake. I am perfectly willing to make an experiment of this bounty. I look upon it as an experiment. I was willing to do it at several stages of the debate last summer, but other people were not then ready to do it.

Mr. VEST. I am not engaged in any piscatorial exercises that I know of, and I am certainly not going into any debate upon an issue of veracity with the Senator from Iowa. I say to him that that is not a fair way to discuss this question, but he should state on his personal responsibility——

Mr. FRYE. I wish to say to the Senator from Missouri, whom I recognize as a fisherman, that it is fortunate for him that he is not engaged in piscatorial pursuits at present, for this old trout is altogether too slow to rise to any fly the Senator carries. [Laughter.]

Mr. VEST. That may be. I have had some experience in that line myself.

Mr. ALLISON. I want the Senator to understand first and always that so far as I am concerned—of course I can not go into the motives, or arrangements, or possibilities of other people, but I have no doubt in this, I speak for the entire committee—when I found the delegation coming here from Louisiana, and the Senators from Louisiana pressing upon us the absolute necessity of this protection to their industry (and we have letters before our committee in which they say 500,000 people would be thrown out of employment by this device of the committee), when a gentleman of the prominence of Mr. Spreckels came to us and showed us that he had produced 220 pounds of sugar from 1 ton of beets, and that these beets were grown upon idle acres that could produce from 20 to 40 tons an acre, and that that experiment could be carried on successfully in the State of California if this cent a pound was granted, I was willing for one, believing that it was an object to secure the production of sugar in this country, if we can do it, to make this experiment; and I regard it only as an experiment. I confess I came reluctantly to it. I consented to the reduction of duty on sugar in the bill last year because we had had high duties on sugar for a century and the people of Louisiana had not developed any marked degree of improvement in the production of sugar from sugar-cane.

Mr. VEST. I repeat that I do not propose to make any issues as to motives or reasons which are not susceptible of being met with anything except suspicion or absolute contradiction. I do not choose to go into that sort of discussion. But it has been an open secret for weeks that there was trouble in the Republican camp as to the schedules on sugar and lumber, and that the Senators from Kansas and the Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD] were not disposed to take the provisions of the bill as to sugar. There is a large sorghum interest springing up in the Western States, in Missouri and Kansas. I have received a great many letters from Western Missouri in regard to the provisions as to sugar in this bill and with reference to the cultivation of sorghum. Experiments have been carried on with great success by the Agricultural Department under a new process, which have been eminently successful at Fort Scott and other points in the State of Kansas, until at last it has come to the question, as I am informed, simply whether the money can be raised in the respective localities for the purchase of the requisite machinery, there being no difficulty whatever in regard to the raising of sorghum, as there is no difficulty in regard to raising jute.

But there has been difficulty in the councils of our friends upon the other side in regard to sugar and lumber, and it has resulted, for it is an open secret, in the putting of a bounty of 1 cent a pound upon sugar produced in the United States, so as to conciliate the Senators from Kansas and from California; and when the lumber schedule is reached I undertake, without being gifted with prophecy, to say now that we shall find another modification to meet the views of the Senators from the great lumber States in the Northwest, Michigan and Wisconsin.

Mr. ALLISON. What of it?

Mr. VEST. My remarks are certainly without point unless they go to this extent, that both this bounty system and the lumber modifications, which I shall discuss hereafter, are based upon political exigencies and not upon any real substantial reason which affects the public good for the benefit of the entire country.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to state that the Senator is mistaken in supposing that this is a sudden resolution by the Committee on Finance. Before I was compelled to leave here last summer I drew up a scheme and a plan with several sections for the purpose of putting a bounty upon sugar. I did not understand that there was any opposition in the committee to it. When I returned here at the present session I found that that was not in the bill, and upon inquiry I was told that it was a complicated subject and required study, and they intended to look into it further during the pendency of the bill in the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. This particular plan was presented a year and a half ago and published as a proposition to be inserted in the bill, in hæc verba.

Mr. VEST. I thank the Senators from Vermont and Massachusetts for reinforcing my opinion in regard to this matter, because it shows that this question of a bounty is not a new one. It shows that it was presented directly by the highest tariff authority in this country, the father of the protective system, the distinguished Senator from Vermont, and was before the committee and was rejected.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no; it was never rejected.

Mr. VEST. It was not adopted, and the Senator from Vermont says he put it before the committee.

Mr. ALDRICH. He gave the reason why it was not. The committee had not time to consider it.

Mr. VEST. Because it was a complicated question. Is there a schedule here that is not complicated? The whole tariff business is complicated.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Missouri permit me one moment?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire of the two Senators who have special charge of the bill if this identical proposition was not made in another branch of Congress during the discussion of the tariff there?

Mr. ALLISON. Not bounties.

Mr. ALDRICH. Not in this form.

Mr. BUTLER. But was it not presented?

Mr. ALLISON. In a form it was presented; certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely; in another branch of Congress?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. How many votes did that proposition receive?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that is not a proper inquiry.

Mr. BUTLER. May I not inquire if there has not been a vote somewhere else? I will not say in the other branch of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hopes the Senator will not by indirection express what he would not be willing to state directly.

Mr. VEST. All the facts in the case——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina had not concluded.

Mr. BUTLER. I wanted to see if I could not come entirely within parliamentary propriety and the rule.

Mr. VEST. If it is a question of parliamentary law, I shall have to yield.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not pretend to be an adept or expert in parliamentary law, but I think I may inquire of the Senator from Iowa, without violating the rules of the Senate, whether a vote has been taken upon that question elsewhere.

Mr. ALLISON. I think very likely. It has been a matter of discussion in a great many places. We voted on it several times in the Committee on Finance, and it has been a subject of debate and consideration. My friend on my left [Mr. DAWES] handed me the other day a speech made by him in Massachusetts two years ago, of great elaboration, in which this exact provision was suggested. There have been a great many votes about it, and under a great many different conditions and circumstances and situations. I have understood that there have been votes where it was put in as an alternative proposition, and where people wanted something different and expected and hoped to get it, which probably made them vote against a bounty.

Mr. BUTLER. Elsewhere?

Mr. ALLISON. Possibly. I do not know of any place where the bounty question has been absolutely suggested and put to the test. The nearest that I know of its being put to the test has been in my conversation with the Louisiana people, in which they said if they could get the measure of protection they wanted in the form of a bounty they would be glad to receive it.

Mr. BUTLER. I suppose it would be entirely competent to read from the RECORD of the last Congress, would it not, as to any proceedings taken elsewhere?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would be historical, and the Chair thinks it would be in order.

Mr. BUTLER. I will then suspend my inquiry for the present until I can get the RECORD.

Mr. VEST. I simply wish to make one additional statement and conclude. I want no better argument as to the correctness of my opinion in regard to this matter than the report of the committee themselves. If they have not in that report announced as the result of all their examinations and deliberations that a rate of 50 per cent. of the present tariff duty was sufficient upon all the sugar brought into this country, then I do not understand the English language at all; and what new light, what new exigency has brought about this creation of a bounty of 1 cent a pound remains unexplained, and I rather take it unexplainable.

Mr. ALLISON. Therefore, the argument is, we should have no bounty because the Committee on Finance did not bring it in four months ago!

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] is mistaken in supposing that this is a new question. It has been proposed and debated at different times. But there is a strong feeling in this country against a direct bounty for the production of anything. Such bounties have existed since the beginning of the Government, especially on salt and on fish. In other cases bounties have been proposed and have existed under our laws, and were voted for by the most eminent men in the history of our country.

When it is proposed now as a separate proposition, for the encouragement of particular industries, it ought to be distinguished and separated, I think, entirely from the tariff question. I believe in it, and I have believed in it for many years. I proposed, myself, a direct bounty on the production of sugar, not so much to stimulate the production of sugar in Louisiana as to induce the production of sugar from beets and sorghum in all parts of the United States. Years ago I remember, in a speech made by me before an agricultural society, in the presence of the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], I made this very proposition to maintain the rates of duty on sugar at about the average rates of other agricultural products, and in order to induce the manufacture of sugar from other things than sugar-cane I proposed a bounty and suggested it as a proper expedient before a great mass of farmers in the State of New York, and, as far as I know, it was approved.

Since that time the development has grown stronger. It has been proven by the experience of Germany, Austria, Italy, France, and Belgium that sugar can be produced from the beet cheaper than from sugar-cane. That is manifest. There is now more sugar produced for the markets of the world from beets than from sugar-cane. The last statement I saw of any acknowledged authority—I think it was in the London Economist—showed that there were 2,400,000 tons of sugar produced from beets, an amount so enormous that it almost staggers one. The amount produced from sugar-cane was only about 2,200,000 tons in any year within the last few years. So already, by the experience of other nations, the production of sugar has been induced from this new article of beets, and all within sixty or seventy years, the first proposition having been made during the time of the Napoleonic wars, when a large bounty was offered by France for the production of sugar, and that was extended to other countries. From time to time those countries, not wishing to depend upon the tropical islands, the West India Islands, and Asia, resorted to this expedient to insure the production of an ample supply of domestic sugar.

We can learn something from the experience of European nations. Although we may not copy their institutions and do not believe in their forms of government, yet on industrial questions we can derive a great deal of information from the experience of other nations. It is now established as a fact that in France they produce 9 per cent. of the weight of a given amount of beets in sugar of the finest quality, equal in every respect to the finest sugar that can be made in the West India Islands. In Germany the average has risen until 13 and 14 per cent. of the amount of the weight of beets is now produced in sugar; and by the new process that has been discovered and is being applied in this country it is shown that the quantity of sugar which can be extracted from beets is 50 per cent. greater than could be produced under the old process of extracting the juice and reducing it by fire. Now, by the process of diffusion or by the use of water, etc., they can produce 50 per cent. more sugar.

I believe, therefore, as a mere question of political economy, following the example and experience of all the European nations in moderate climates, that we can in this country produce in ten years enough sugar to supply the domestic market. I am more hopeful about it than my friend from Iowa. There is not a county in the State of Ohio where sugar can not be produced. Sugar is probably the most universal element in vegetable substances of any in the world. There is scarcely any article that does not contain sugar. It is now developed from beets to such an extent that one-sixth of the entire weight of the beet can be produced in sugar.

Is it not an object of desire in this country to make this industry a success here? We can raise it cheaper than anywhere else. Our lands are not so valuable in this country as they are in any portion of Europe. Yet they have diverted more than a million acres of land in each of those countries from the ordinary productions of agriculture to the production of sugar, and now all the sugar of France is made from beets, all the sugar of Germany is made from beets, and they export sugar from those countries, and from Belgium and from Italy. If they can do it can we not do it? We have cheaper lands, we have a more boundless surface, and greater variety of soil. Certainly this is an object of desire.

The Committee on Finance are naturally reluctant to make any new proposition of this kind, and they would naturally hesitate about it until sure of their footing. But now they have become sure. They feel now that if this experiment, the same experiment that has been tried in other countries, is resorted to here we can have sugar independent of the tropical countries.

This is not proposed with a view of injuring the sugar of Louisiana, because Louisiana never can compete with Cuba and the islands of the West Indies, for the simple reason that the plant has to be restored every one or two years in Louisiana and they have to plant anew. In Cuba the sugar-plant is perennial. It grows from the same stalk year after year, sometimes for thirteen and fourteen years in succession, without replanting. Then they have cheaper forms of labor there. So we never can compete with them in producing sugar from sugar-cane. But that can be done if we extend the production of sugar to every part of the country, and there is not a county, as I said before, in the United States that can not produce beet sugar.

Besides that, this new discovery about sorghum-cane has come in. For years we have produced in Ohio and nearly all of the Western States more or less sugar and molasses from sorghum, and it has entered into the common use of great masses of our people. In almost every county in Ohio they raise sorghum, and they have evaporators which produce a very fair quality of molasses. They extract from the sorghum all the taste of the cane, and it is now a very palatable article, and is used largely by the farmers of Ohio. So from sorghum and from beets we have ample facilities and means of producing all the sugar used in the country.

Now, is it not wise to do it? It is not a question of politics; it is a question of political economy. It is not a question that affects any particular region of the country, because it affects all. The recent experiments in California show a remarkable success, and a man of the capital and influence and power of Mr. Spreckels has embarked in this enterprise. Although he has been engaged for years in the production of sugar from sugar-cane in the Sandwich Islands, and has built up great industries in California, he now proposes to turn from the sugar-cane of tropical regions to the sugar beet, and is establishing industries in Philadelphia and in different parts of the country.

The great difficulty in the way is to get the farmers to grow this article. It must be grown in such great quantities that it requires probably one hundred farmers cultivating 10 or 20 acres each to produce enough beets to run a single sugar factory, as they call it. There is the difficulty. Sugar-beets can be raised in Ohio, in Indiana, in Illinois, in Missouri, everywhere in the country in any quantity. The only element of the problem is whether we can give the people such an inducement, either in the form of a duty or a bounty, as will encouruge them in sufficient numbers at a particular place to supply beets for the factory. It will be established, no doubt, but that is the problem.

The Committee on Finance were rather reluctant to propose this. As a matter of course, they are conservative. They did not propose it until it was found to meet the general sentiment of the people of the country. I believe the time has now arrived when this experiment ought to be made, and I am willing for one to vote for it, notwithstanding the prejudice that exists against a bounty given to any particular production.

The only question there has been is whether this encouragement to the growth of beet and sorghum sugar shall be extended by a bounty or by a duty. The objection to the present duty on sugar is that it is so enormous, amounting to 82 or 83 per cent. That is a larger duty than is imposed on any agricultural product whatever except rice. No agricultural product in the Northern States now receives a protection of more than 40 or 50 per cent.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator in that connection if there is any agricultural product in any of the Northern States, except Irish potatoes, that come in competition with any agricultural product abroad?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, with Canada mainly. As a matter of course we are separated by the sea from European countries, and our competition is mainly with Canada, but to protect our products against Canada it is necessary to maintain a reasonable duty. But what is the rate of duty? On wheat the equivalent of 20 cents a bushel is 20 per cent., assuming that the nominal value of wheat is about a dollar; and so with barley, so with hops, and so with other articles.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it not a fact that there is a surplus of those products in this country? Is there not a surplus of wheat in this country? What would be the object of bringing wheat into the country where there is a surplus?

Mr. SHERMAN. Wheat is brought in from Canada in great quantities, and barley and all those things are brought in.

The argument in favor of bounties is a practical one. A bounty paid goes directly to the producer. He sees it; he feels it. The bounty paid to him adds to his income. It will add to the income of more than a million people who will be engaged speedily in this production. That bounty is seen, it is felt, while the nature of a duty is indirect. Therefore a bounty is, I think, more of an inducement than is a duty.

Mr. GIBSON. If the Senator will allow me I should like to ask him if he does not think that bounties should be created for the domestic industries which come in competition with foreign industries, and whether agricultural industries ought not to receive this benefit under the protective system as well as manufacturing industries?

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly. I stand with the Senator in that.

Mr. GIBSON. The Northern manufacturing industries receive a bounty. The ad valorem rate on flannel goods, for instance, is in some cases 80, 90, or 100 per cent., in some cases 133 per cent. Salt is 79 per cent. in bulk; balmorals 138 per cent.; some flannels 148 per cent.; blankets for ordinary consumption are 79 per cent. and 80 per cent. I submit to the Senator from Ohio that if the protective system really creates bounties or benefits for the persons engaged and the capital engaged in particular industries, would it not be wise statesmanship to distribute these bounties between the three great pursuits of industry in our country, commerce, manufactures, and agriculture, and between the different sections of the country. The benefits of the tariff system being uniform, these bounties ought to be distributed.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator has made quite a long speech involving a great many questions. His premise, though, I agree with entirely, that not always the same protection but necessary protection should be extended to all producers alike. The industries of the farm, and of the mine, and of the workshop stand on precisely the same footing. Certain industries may need more and certain industries less. We ask nothing for the farmers but what is necessary to meet competition with Canada. We do not go beyond that and we do not ask for any more.

In regard to sugar, the experience of nearly a hundred years has shown that a duty will not bring about the production of the article in this country. To-day the relative proportion of sugar produced in the United States to that consumed is less than it was twenty years ago. Before the war the production of sugar in Louisiana rose to from 16 to 20 per cent. of the amount consumed.

Mr. GIBSON. Fifty per cent.

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps 50 per cent. That makes the argument still stronger.

Mr. GIBSON. Yes; it was 50 per cent. in 1860.

Mr. SHERMAN. Experience has shown, therefore, that the system of a duty will not bring about the object we seek to accomplish, that is, the diversity of production.

Mr. GIBSON. I do not like to interrupt the Senator, but if he will pardon me I will make a suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. GIBSON. Since the war the duties on sugar have steadily decreased, while the bounties afforded by the Governments of Germany and France have been steadily increased, so that the American market has been absolutely taken possession of, not by Cuba, but by the bounty-fed sugars of Europe. I would ask the Senator, as he is an ardent protectionist, why he should isolate this particular industry that he admits is substantially established in one State of the Union and is spreading out its plants into other States in the Union; if the theory of protection be any groundwork to rest upon, why would he exclude the people of these several States from its benefits and have them stand apart and isolated so that they shall appear here in formâ pauperis to receive bounties from the people of the other States of the Union?

Mr. SHERMAN. The first part of the Senator's statement answers his second part. He says that the price of sugar has declined. The duty has not declined.

Mr. GIBSON. The duty has declined. The duty in this country has declined steadily.

Mr. SHERMAN. The duty has been steadily increased, not by the number of cents a pound, but by the ad valorem. The reason is that the production of sugar from beets, produced by bounties only and caused only by bounties, has brought into competition with the sugar of the tropics new forms of sugar, and that has reduced the price. I say myself that the effect of the production of sugar in this country will be still more to reduce the value of sugar after a period of time.

The Senator from Missouri makes a great deal of outcry about a declaration made by the Senator from Rhode Island, that the imposition of a duty increases the price. So it does in the first instance, and therefore to that extent I admit it, but the inevitable effect of protection or bounty in any form is eventually to reduce prices, and that is shown in every article of industry on our tariff list. There is not a single article which is now produced in America but what is at a less price and less value in the markets of the world than it was before a protective duty was put upon it. That has been the way with beet sugar. It is beet sugar that has reduced the price. It is the bounty given in European nations for the production of beet sugar that has reduced the price, and we only follow the example of other nations when we pursue this course. They could not have reduced the price, they could not have induced the production of beet sugar in France and Germany except by a bounty. No duty would have induced the people of France or the people of Germany to engage in the production of sugar because it was new, but it was the direct bounty paid to each individual family that produced the sugar, a bounty that was brought home to the household, that aided in carrying on the expenses of the household. That is the form of protection that was deemed wisest in regard to sugar. It is an exceptional article.

Mr. GIBSON. If the Senator from Ohio will allow me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. GIBSON. He states only half the case. It is true that originally bounties were paid to the farmers in Germany and in France, and to chemists who might improve the methods of extracting sugar from the beet-root. But the sugar industry in Germany and France was not built up by bounties alone, as is proposed here. It was built up under the protective system, and the rate of tariff on imported sugars in Germany, France, Austria, and Italy has never been less than 4 cents a pound. If France adopted the policy of offering bounties for the production of sugar and Germany had not excluded the French sugars from the German markets, France would have taken possession of the German markets. So Germany erected a barrier as high as that with which France has surrounded herself. The average rate of tariff tax on sugar in Europe, one country against the other, is 4 cents a pound.

Mr. SHERMAN. In other words——

Mr. GIBSON. Now look at the bill under consideration, if the Senator from Ohio will permit it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me go on awhile. The Senator is answered by the weight of his argument. For instance, he shows that in France and Germany, where they have established this great industry, they reduced the price of sugar 3 and 4 cents a pound. He shows that in those countries they had a compound mode of protecting their sugar industry; that is, they maintained a tariff duty and a pretty high tariff duty on the production of sugar, putting sometimes 4 cents a pound when sugar was worth 10 cents a pound. But they superadded to that the bounty system that brought out the protected industry. It is this compound protection given to the article of sugar that, in my judgment, will bring down the price of sugar in this country in ten years.

The committee thought it would not be worth while simply to put on this bounty, leaving it dependent upon the changes of opinion from time to time and the prejudice against a bounty, and therefore they proposed as a part of the scheme, without which it would not be successful and ought not to pass, to give assurance to the producers of this country that if they will embark in raising beets and sorghum we will give them for ten or eleven years this steady bounty, doing in this respect precisely what these other countries have done. This is but a copy of the laws made in those countries. We still retain a protective duty on sugar of 50 per cent.

Mr. GIBSON. No, sir; only about seventy-one one-hundredths of 1 cent. You have reduced the tariff on sugar 50 per cent. in this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am talking about the ad valorem. The duty proposed by this bill on sugar is from 42 to 50 per cent., and that is higher than upon any other article of agriculture except rice. Even now it is one-half of the cost. That duty is left there, applying to all sugars that come into this country. We propose to superadd to that a bounty paid directly to the producer. Without that, in my judgment, the experiment of making sugar from beets will not succeed, but with a bounty coming home to every farmer, to the owner of every establishment in the neighborhood that produces sugar as the result of his handiwork, we believe, following the example of other nations, that this mode of protection is more efficient.

They ought to be separated from each other. One is a direct bounty administered by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; the other is a duty collected by collectors of import duties at the seacoast. If you make this bounty come home, as I say, to the farmer, you superadd to him the strongest possible inducement to produce sugar.

I say it is an exceptional case. I would not like to extend such a bounty to anything else that I know of. I do not like to propose it in regard to sugar except that it can be put on exceptional grounds, and I think the grounds are solid on which you can stand, and although our people enter upon it and Senators and Members of Congress enter upon it with some doubt and reluctance, yet I believe that if the experiment is fairly made the same results will come here that came in Germany and in other European countries. The result will be the reduction of the price of this most important and essential element of human life and comfort, and that will be brought about in a plain and simple way in accordance with the experience of other nations.

I beg Senators not to look upon this in a sectional point of view or in a party point of view, because there is no politics in it so far as I can see. The question is not how it would affect political parties or political ends, but if we could agree now, without respect to parties or sections, to try this experiment for ten years, if it does not produce the same results here that it has done in the countries of Europe, then the laws of political economy work according to continents and not according to natural effects. The same results will be produced here by the bounty that have been produced in other countries. This compound system is simple and easily enforced. There is no difficulty in its practical application. The duty will be still collected as before, and the bounty will be easily administered.

There are some difficulties in regard to the machinery of this matter, but it is no more difficult than the collection of the whisky tax, the collection of the tax on beer, or any other domestic tax. It is a bounty paid out of a specific fund to be administered by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to be paid directly to the producer; and no man, and no section, and no party has a right to complain of it. It operates in favor of Democrats as well as Republicans. It will be beneficial in States largely Democratic, as it will be beneficial in States largely Republican. It will induce the production in this country of an essential want of human life. It is an experiment that I wish to see tried, not in the interest of any party, or any section, or any State, or any community, but in the interest of the whole country; and I believe the experiment will be successful if Congress has the courage to enter upon it.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President, I have tried to be an attentive listener to this very prolonged debate on the tariff question, because I wanted to learn something about it. It seems to me that the Senator from Ohio has taken very extreme ground with reference to the sugar question. I agree with him that the sugar-beet industry of this country, which is now in its infancy, is capable of great development. I do not know much about the sugar-beet industry, but I know of no reason why that industry should not be developed to its fullest extent in this country. We certainly have every variety of climate and every variety of soil. It is now simply a question of mechanically handling the beet, which has been reduced by great improvements recently to a very simple process.

But what I do not understand is this: If it be true that this can become a great domestic industry in the supply of sugar for domestic consumption, what becomes of all the arguments which we have heard in this Chamber repeated every day by Senators from the East and Senators from the West, that this bill is framed upon the theory, and I use a favorite expression of the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], that regardless of the needs of the Government, regardless of the condition of the tax-payer, it is the duty of the Government of the United States by its protective legislation to develop every American industry possible, whether it be in existence as a full-fledged industry, whether it be an industry in its infancy, whether it be an industry which is in the womb, or whether it be an industry which has never been in existence in this country? It excites my suspicion, for without intending any disrespect to the members of the Finance Committee, it strikes me that with reference to this single industry there is attempted something of the mysterious, if not of the "heathen Chinee" species of legislation. Why do you not give this industry the same encouragement that you give to other industries? Why do you hesitate?

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator want a reply?

Mr. EUSTIS. I know my friends on the other side are loaded with ingenious replies. I ask why do you hesitate if you want to develop and encourage and foster, not only this existing industry, but this promising industry?

The Senator from Ohio allowed his lips to utter a phrase which has not been used before on the other side in this tariff debate. He said the duty on sugar was already enormously high. I have understood the protective theory to mean, as we have been educated and instructed to understand it, that no matter how high the duty on imports, if it was 100 per cent., that was not considered an obstacle to its increase, as was illustrated in the case of cotton-ties, when the duty was raised with reference to an industry which has no existence whatever in this country, and the guaranty you have that it will exist in futuro is simply the declaration of some party who has gone before the Finance Committee and said if you raise the duty 200 or 300 per cent. he thought then that he would go into the business of making cotton-ties. So I do not understand how the gentlemen on the other side propose to reconcile their former arguments with the arguments which they make to-day with reference to this sugar duty.

I do not ask as a representative of my State for any undue or special protection from the Government of the United States to that industry based upon favoritism. We have strong ground to stand upon with reference to the sugar duty. From the foundation of the Government to the present time the duty upon the imported article has been exceedingly high. Long before there was a sugar plantation within the limits of the United States, the duty was exorbitantly high, and why? Because it was for the interest of the fisc, of the Treasury of the United States, of the people of the United States, that the Government of the United States should derive a large revenue from that single imported article.

Mr. ALDRICH. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. EUSTIS. In one moment. Of course I do not deny that the sugar planter of Louisiana received incidental protection from the legislation, but that was a mere incident of the legislation, for the planters of Louisiana have never been strong enough to control or influence the legislation of this country upon the question of taxation.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the Senator yield to a question?

Mr. EUSTIS. In one moment, if you please.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana declines to yield.

Mr. EUSTIS. I will ask Senators not to request me to yield.

If you protect this industry, if you believe it be an American industry which ought to be protected as such, if you allow that industry to receive the same shelter and protection which you extend to other industries because it would be an advantage that we should make and manufacture in this country the sugar to be consumed in this country, and, to use a favorite argument, that you do not intend that foreign labor upon a foreign soil shall make for American citizens what American citizens have a right to consume—if you will have that article protected in the future as it has been in the past, then it remains under the shelter of the opinions and convictions of the great Republican party. Then you are carrying out to its logical results the theory upon which you claim that this bill is framed and upon which you claim that the financial affairs of this Government should be administered. But if you propose to kick it out of your household like a bastard and let it come to your kitchen for crumbs of bread, the only thing that I can say is that you have abandoned the ground upon which you boasted that you stood, and that you carried the last Presidential election upon false pretenses.

I do not believe that the opinion is seriously entertained in this Chamber that this proposed bounty will ever culminate in Congressional legislation. You may succeed under trying and difficult circumstances in maintaining the discipline in your ranks upon this tariff question; you may succeed in classifying in the high-priesthood of the Republican party Republican Senators who are representing agricultural and non-manufacturing States and who vote according to this new theory of government, for it has never been heard of until this substitute was brought into the Senate, that whatever can be manufactured, made, or produced in this country it is the duty of the Government to protect, regardless of the constitutional question of revenue, regardless of the economic question of the demands and needs of the Government itself, regardless of the question of justice to the tax-payer and to the consumer.

But, Mr. President, there may be a time when we shall see that there is a limit to popular delusion and popular deception. Who discovered that new system of government? You have made a disciple of the venerable Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] in your new school of political economy. He was once a great teacher, he was once a great authority, a great light upon the important questions affecting the finances of the Government and the interests and relations of the people to the Government.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say a single word.

Mr. EUSTIS. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MORRILL. In 1861, when the tariff was established, I had the cordial support of Louisianians in the other House to obtain a specific duty of three-fourths of a cent per pound on sugar. The duty had been an ad valorem prior to that; under the tariff of 1846 of 30 per cent., and under the tariff of 1857 of 24 per cent. During the war the tariff was raised to 2 or 3 cents a pound, and it has remained at that rate ever since, except for the reduction that was made in the tariff of 1883.

I have understood that the Democratic party were very desirous to get rid of the war tariff. If we allow the duty to remain as the Finance Committee have reported their bill, it will be 33⅓ per cent. more than it was prior to the war, and the object of protection is amply secured by the new proposition, that is, to give an equivalent for the reduction and yet that the consumer shall receive his sugar for 1 cent less per pound.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EUSTIS. If the Senator will allow me, I prefer to proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana declines to be interrupted.

Mr. EUSTIS. I do not want to be discourteous to Senators, but I prefer to go on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. EUSTIS. I prefer to yield a little later, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. CHANDLER. I only wished the Senator to say——

Mr. EUSTIS. A little later. What I was referring to was that the tariffs advocated by the Senator from Vermont were tariffs made with reference to the needs of the Government, and this is an entirely new feature, a newly discovered theory, that you are to frame a tariff law regardless of the question of the needs and wants of the Government and of the justice due to tax-payers. When this is denounced as robbery, when this is denounced as spoliation, when this is denounced as legislative appropriation of the earnings and profits and property of one individual in favor of another, I will tell the Senate what I understand by these terms, which were not invented by Confederate brigadiers, but are to be found in the oldest text-books upon political economy.

You ask us to adore Chinese civilization as contrasted with American civilization; you ask us to subscribe to the Chinese system of government as contrasted with the American system of government, for if I understand the declarations made by Senators on the other side of this Chamber, interpreting the character and scope and purpose of this proposed law, it is not a question of protection; it is a question of absolute prohibition and commercial non-intercourse, so far as importable articles are concerned which can be manufactured or produced in this country. There is no other step for you to take, unless you can discover what other articles can be manufactured or produced in this country, for your declarations have been frank, open, bold, and emphatic that, with reference to any article, no matter what it be, that can be produced in this country, no matter what may be the rate of taxation necessary to force the manufacture or production of that article, the only thing that a person has to do is to make that information known to the majority of the Finance Committee, and the item will be inserted in this bill. Is that protection? You use a soft, smooth, melodious, emollient word, "protection," which you say represents patriotism, which you say represents the sum of human happiness, the sum of human contentment, the sum of human prosperity, and if we do not agree with you in the new signification which you have given to that single word, we are to incur the obloquy of being free-traders and British sympathizers!

The most amusing illustration that I have seen with reference to this new theory is that furnished by the case of the American actors and actresses. They use precisely the same arguments which have been used in this Chamber. They tell you the number of American actors employed, those out of employment, the salaries that they receive, the salaries that British actors and actresses receive, and demand that you shall protect them against British competition. They argue, as you do, that it is the duty of the Government of the United States to protect the American legs of American ballet dancers against British competition. But even their argument contains a fallacy which I have no doubt would be corrected by the Senator from Rhode Island. They say that while they want protection they do not think stars ought to be protected. Why not? Would not the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Rhode Island say that you are mistaken, according to the theory of protection, for it is the duty of the Government of the United States to protect and foster, ay, and breed, American Coquelins and American Sara Bernhardts?

Where is to be the limit of this legislation, and what is it? You secure to the manufacturer by positive enactment, you secure to the manufacturer by textual provision of your law, by the absolute terms of your law, the profits which he desires to make from that business. That he can read plainly in the language of statute. But what do you give the consumer? What do you give the tax-payer? You give him only the prophetic assurances, which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] gives us so often and so eloquently, that the operation of the law will inure to his benefit.

Mr. President, in making these few remarks I simply wanted to define my position, that if I understand properly the true protection system I am not in a frame of mind, owing to serious reverses in the indigo trade last November, to make a very fierce assault upon that system. I do not consider that one's convictions as to an original proposition of protection or free trade have any pertinency or application to any question which we have been considering under this bill. But so far as this protection system is now exhibited, it is to destroy the individual right of the citizen of the United States, his freedom and liberty of private selection, that he shall buy nothing except what is made by American labor and American industry; that he shall drink nothing but American beer; that from the Bible to the playing-card, from a steam-engine to a jack-knife, from a pulpit to a wooden pipe, the Government shall command him from whom he shall buy, to whom he shall pay that money, at what price he shall buy. If we are to have that system of government, I say that that is a government of oppression, of extortion, and of tyranny, and that you, by this measure, have converted this Government into a huge trust, for what you have said with reference to this bill and what the bill itself contains corresponds exactly with the definition of a trust given by Judge Barrett in his late opinion with reference to trusts. He says that it is a combination to prohibit competition (which you say is the intended purpose and effect of this bill) and intended to control the price of commodities (which you say is to be the result of this legislation). You promise us cheaper articles of consumption. Strike down the sugar industry and you promise the people cheaper sugar!

But, Mr. President, I have no serious apprehensions with reference to the results, from the very fact that such a sudden and radical change in this proposed legislation was made upon the sugar question by the majority of the Finance Committee. Although I deprecate the character of the remedy which they propose, the mere fact that they have found it necessary to announce to the country that the sugar industry should be protected by a bounty is a guaranty that they will receive further light upon the subject, and place the sugar industry of Louisiana under the shelter and protection of this great American system.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I have listened with interest to the suggestions made by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS], especially that portion of his remarks which denounced the American system of the tariff for protection to American industry. I wanted, if I could, to glean from his remarks whether he was in favor of or against this proposition which the Finance Committee makes now to the Senate.

Mr. EUSTIS. I am against it.

Mr. ALLISON. I wanted to glean from him whether he thinks that this necessary article of consumption in the United States should bear the highest rate of duty of any article to-day in the tariff schedules, brandy, wines, and liquors not excepted, and then stand in his place as a Senator representing the only State in this Union that practically derives benefit from this taxation, and denounce the whole system.

The duties upon sugar to-day are 82 per cent. That is a higher rate of duty than is found in any schedule in the existing tariff. It is a prime necessity of life, used by every civilized people on the globe. It has been produced for some years in the State of Louisiana. The sugar-producers there have grown strong and vigorous under this system of protection, and have stood in with it and abided by it for sugar and sugar alone. Now, when we come to suggest in this bill a proposition which will reduce to the consumer of sugar at least 1 cent a pound in the cost of it, the Senator answers by a denunciation of our whole system.

The Senator sat up an imaginary system and then pulled it down. No Senator on this side of the Chamber, no person I know of who speaks upon these topics, has defined the protective principle as the Senator from Louisiana defines it. We define the protective principle to mean that we shall reserve for our own citizens and our own people the production of such articles as we can produce here in sufficient quantities for consumption, where climatic or other natural conditions do not intervene. That is the position of the Republican party as I understand it. It is certainly the position of this bill, and it is the position of this side of the Chamber, that we extend the principle of protection to those industries which can be carried on here successfully in competition with other countries, having the necessary opportunities to produce them, climatic or other natural conditions excepted.

I submit to the Senator from Louisiana that for one hundred years in this country sugar has not come within that category, and but for the fact that the recent developments of chemistry and science and machinery have disclosed that we can produce sugar from sorghum and from beets that condition of things would exist to-day.

Mr. EUSTIS. Does the Senator say that the duty on sugar has not been high until lately?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not say that. I say that under the definition of protection to American industries which I have given, and which I understand to be the true definition, sugar does not come within its range until we have been able to develop the industry of producing sugar from sorghum and from beets. Here is a high duty upon sugar from the very foundation of the Government, except for the intervening period between 1846 and 1861. Except for that intervening period there has always been a high specific rate upon sugar. Unless we except the production of this year in the South from sugar-cane, the production is less now than it was thirty or forty years ago. So the effect of a large duty upon sugar has not been to induce its production here in sufficient quantities for our consumption. In 1858–'59 there were 414,000,000 pounds produced; in 1861–'62, 528,000,000 pounds; in 1878–'79 there were 239,000,000 pounds produced. That was ten years ago. In 1886–'87 there were only 181,000,000 pounds produced.

I say, with all respect to the Senator from Louisiana, that if we do not take into account the new conditions which I have described, it would be better for this people, so far as they are concerned, to buy the entire sugar crop of the State of Louisiana and dump it into the Gulf of Mexico.

Why have we reduced the duty upon sugar? We have reduced it because we do not need the revenue and because sugar is a prime necessity of life, and practically for no other reason. That is the reason why we reduced it in the bill originally, and we propose to reduce it one-half.

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire of the Senator, if that be true, why he has increased the tariff on cotton-ties about 100 per cent.?

Mr. ALLISON. We increased the duty on cotton-ties in order to make a symmetrical iron and steel schedule, not exempting from duty an article which is a refined article practically of manufacture, when we place a high duty upon the raw material.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator in all kindness that I am not going to be diverted now from what I am about to say on sugar to all these other things, but I give that as the reason for the duty on cotton-ties. We have reduced the duty on sugar for the purpose of reducing the price of sugar to the consumer. That is what we have done, and I want Senators to understand that that is the object. We have reduced the duty on sugar so as to reduce the price of sugar to the consumers. And who are they? They are every man, woman, and child in the United States, a consumption extending to the amount of 55 pounds per annum per capita to every person in the United States.

I want to ask the Senators on the other side of the Chamber who made an argument here about tin cups a few moments ago, what answer they have to make when we propose here a system which will reduce the price of an absolute necessity of life 1 cent per pound?

The Senator from Louisiana wants to know why we have made this departure as respects sugar. The sugar duty is a duty that comes out of the pockets of the consumer for the reason that we do not produce enough sugar in this country to become a competitor in its production. Sugar is an exceptional article, as the Senator said. I shall be glad to yield to a Senator who will tell me another article in this tariff that is protected which stands in the same relation that sugar does to our home production and our home consumption. It was for that reason that we proposed the reduction.

We have reduced to the consumers of this country a tax amounting to $28,000,000, and we have imposed upon them by this system of a bounty of a cent a pound four and a half million dollars. Now, the Senator from Louisiana, if I understand him, still insists that we shall continue to take $28,000,000 out of the pockets of the consumers in order that the producers of sugar in the State of Louisiana may receive 1 cent a pound more for the minimum, infinitesimal amount of sugar they produce as compared with the amount of sugar used in this country. If Senators can stand upon such an argument as that I am willing to allow them to vote against this bounty. We propose by this provision to save from the sugar duties a sum equal to about twenty-two or twenty-three millions of dollars to the consumers of this country after we have paid the bounty. So our plan, as compared with the plan of Senators who oppose this bounty, is that they proposed to take out of the pockets of the people money that is not needed in order that the sugar-growers of Louisiana may have a cent a pound more for sugar. We reduce the price of sugar a cent a pound and give the people of Louisiana all to which they are entitled, namely, a cent a pound, in order to enable them to compete in the production of sugar with all the world beside.

I confess to absolute amazement at the position of the Senator from Louisiana, representing a constituency interested chiefly in this amendment, because so far as we know now there is comparatively a small amount of sugar produced from either sorghum or beets. We believe there will be a rapid increase of that production. But I want to call the attention of Senators to the fact that we not only need a diversion of our agricultural industries to create this production, but we need also the establishment of local factories which will require the investment of considerable amounts of capital. So far as I am concerned, I believe that this increased production will be more gradual than most Senators on this side believe, and it being more gradual the bounty paid annually will be less than they suppose. But in the mean time we shall have saved at the rate of $22,000,000 per annum to the consumers of sugar in this country as compared with the existing law.

That is all there is in this amendment, and the "leather and prunella" argument of the Senator from Missouri that this amendment should have been brought in last October instead of now has no weight with me. We brought it in here believing it to be a wise, just, and fair solution of this great question to the sugar producers of Louisiana and those who are expecting to embark in the production of sugar from beets and from sorghum; and that is all there is in it.

Mr. PLUMB reserves his speech for revision. [See Appendix.]

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I suppose it will be conceded that there is no one article so universally used as sugar and which is so essential to the comfort of the people, and there is no one article which every one of them desires to cheapen as much as this for the reason that it is so universally used.

Mr. VOORHEES. I would except salt. We can live without sugar, but we can not live without salt.

Mr. STEWART. Salt we find everywhere.

Mr. VOORHEES. You keep a tax on it, though.

Mr. STEWART. What salt costs is nothing but a mere bagatelle.

Mr. VOORHEES. Not by any means.

Mr. STEWART. I do not propose to discuss salt.

Mr. VOORHEES. I know you do not.

Mr. STEWART. I suppose that there is no one article that the people of the United States are so anxious to cultivate and produce in this country and cheapen the price of as sugar. I suppose we can take those propositions for granted.

That being so, it seems to me that the committee have done wisely to devise a scheme whereby the production of this article can be encouraged, and that there shall be no opportunity lost to make the production sufficient to supply the demand and at the same time relieve the people from a burden that has been very onerous and to them seems very unjust. To impose upon this article of universal consumption 80 per cent. duty, higher than the duties in any other schedule, has long been felt to be a great oppression.

Twenty-two years ago when this question was before the Senate we had hopes of manufacturing sugar from beets, and a little experiment was then being tried in California. I advocated then the continuance of the tariff in order that that industry might be developed and with the hope that we could supply ourselves with sugar. We have gone on twenty-two years without any material increase notwithstanding this high war tariff upon sugar; and the people have a just right to complain.

It is now again stated, and I believe with a great deal of authority and assurance, that we can produce sugar from beets and from sorghum, particularly from beets, and that it is no longer an experiment, as it was twenty-two years ago. Continental Europe has done it, by what system? The same system devised by the Finance Committee. Each one of the continental powers has in the last twenty years adopted the tariff system in its fullest extent. They have followed us in adopting tariffs, our tariff having produced such good results, and in their arguments in favor of establishing tariffs they have alluded to the success of the tariff policy in this country. They did not apply a protective tariff to the production of sugar from beets, but in order to encourage that production they adopted the system of paying bounties. Germany has paid as high as 2½ cents a pound bounty, and here are France and the other continental powers following suit, and now sugar bounties prevail on the Continent, the annual average in France being about $3,000,000 on 600,000,000 pounds. One hundred and seventy million pounds are produced in little Belgium, and 150,000,000 in Holland. The result has been that they produce their own sugar and are able to export it.

I think that system is better than a tariff, because while this industry is growing we can relieve the people of a large portion of their burdens and at the same time cultivate and encourage the industry. It is more direct, and has been effective in other countries.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Nevada whether or not Germany pays a bounty on the sugar now produced in Germany?

Mr. STEWART. They have reduced it somewhat because they have developed the industry so that it is not required.

Mr. BUTLER. They have abolished it entirely.

Mr. STEWART. They retain it on sugar exported.

Mr. BUTLER. The bounty now paid in Germany is upon the export, the surplus which the German people export. There is not a cent paid now on sugar that is consumed in Germany.

Mr. ALLISON. But they paid a bounty in order to produce the exportation of sugar. They produce now a very large surplus.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand 4 cents a pound is what they pay on sugar exported from Germany, but not one cent is paid on sugar consumed in Germany.

Mr. STEWART. They did pay a bounty for a long time until they developed the industry.

Mr. BUTLER. They have not in a good many years.

Mr. STEWART. But they did until they developed the industry. They paid it when they were in the condition in which we are to-day and developed the industry so that they could export sugar, and in order that they may export and compete with the world they pay a bounty on the export, showing that they have cultivated this particular article.

I am thoroughly convinced that we can produce in a few years all the sugar we want in this country, all that will be consumed, if we do not neglect the industry; but believing that, I am not willing to impose this extra burden on all the people longer for the purpose of accomplishing that object when it can be accomplished in a more direct, business-like way by a bounty.

When it is said that the bounty is in conflict with the tariff system, that is a great mistake. In the very first Congress this principle was involved in aiding our ship-building by a differential duty, and it has been involved in much legislation encouraging the fisheries, etc. There is nothing new in it. It is right in the line of protection. It was one of the first things considered when the matter of protecting our industries and our commerce was discussed in the First Congress. It was proposed to give a bounty to our shipping to put it on a basis so that it could exist, and our fisheries have been nurtured in that way and for the same reason by means of the diffusion of the bounties of this Government.

Here we have an industry that will be of slow growth perhaps. If we can maintain it and demonstrate that it will be a success, and we can raise sugar anywhere in the United States, we shall have plenty of competition, and then you will have sugar cheaper than you can have it in any other way. But we have gone on now with this war tariff, which has been so much complained of, because it was a war tariff to raise as much money out of the necessaries of life, or in any other way, as possible to carry on the war, and we have allowed it to remain on sugar, with very little reduction, up to the present time. We do not need the revenue, but we do need the development of that industry in order to produce sugar at home, where we buy the sugar and pay the money for it. We have very little trade with any country from which we buy sugar, and it does not increase our trade. It simply takes our money. If we can do as France and Germany and Belgium and Holland have done, produce our own sugar, we can save nearly $100,000,000 of money at home among the people, and give them additional employment, and if we do not succeed in developing this industry the amount paid out will be small.

I do not see anything wrong in the principle. I like it better than the tariff as it formerly stood. I think it better for the development of the interest, and it is certainly better for the consumer, if we do not need the money, to give him cheaper sugar by 1 cent a pound. So I think the committee have acted very wisely. We do not know everything, but we find that this same class of legislation has produced grand results in other countries, and has enabled them to develop this industry so that they can export sugar to the people of the world. I do not know why we may not adopt the same policy and follow their example. Every one of the continental powers followed our example in putting up their tariffs and establishing their home manufactures. I can show they have done so one after another, and they have held up our tariff as an example. Why can we not follow their example in developing this great industry, a successful example to enable us to do likewise, which, if we can accomplish, will be accomplishing more good than any other legislation, or any one matter of legislation, that has been had in this country for half a century.

We are sending out a regular drain of $100,000,000 or more for sugar every year. I do not know the exact figures, but that drain is enormous, and we have no return, for the countries which produce sugar buy very little of us. Why not, I say, encourage this industry when there is a hope, and, as we now think, a demonstration that we can produce it from beets and from sorghum—from beets I am certain.

Mr. EUSTIS. If we buy Cuba we can.

Mr. STEWART. Well, when we have bought Cuba it will be time enough to attend to that. We have country enough now. There is a large portion of this country, and chemists who have examined this subject inform me that there is hardly a State in the Union where sugar-beets may not be raised as well as in any part of Europe.

It would be a great industry at home and keep our money at home. If the encouragement that is furnished by this bounty can accomplish the purpose, who would want to vote against it, particularly when we can spare it from the revenue? It seems to me the object to be sought and the little risk in the outlay are such as to induce every man who wants to benefit the country by legislation to vote for this amendment. It is unlike anything else. There is no other industry in the country that can compare with it in its condition. So it appeared to every one who had taken this into consideration, so it appeared to the Finance Committee, and I think that they have done wisely in proposing to relieve the people of this burden and at the same time not destroy the prospect we have of producing our own sugar.

I am astonished to see the representatives from Louisiana, who have been protected by a war tariff for a quarter of a century and have failed to increase the amount of sugar produced so that it is competitive or so as to reduce its price to the consumer, oppose the only practicable method that the people of the United States can now adopt to develop this industry and protect them.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was going to move an adjournment.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to say a word.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to get an order to print.

Mr. SHERMAN. I withhold the motion.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say just one word respecting the laws and manipulations of Germany on the question of sugar. Germany now taxes beets that are produced in Germany for sugar-making 80 pfennigs per double centner or 200 pounds, and from that tax they realize an enormous revenue. Then they allow a drawback on the exportation of sugar upon a certain amount of supposed saccharine strength in a ton of beets, which operates as a great incentive to the exportation of sugar from Germany. They do this first for the purpose of securing a large revenue, which is absolutely necessary under the German taxing system, and they do it also for the purpose of employing their agriculturists in the production of beets. So, whilst their system is a little different from ours, it reaches the same purpose, at the same time securing an enormous revenue.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the Senator state what the export bounty is?

Mr. ALLISON. I have not the data before me.

Mr. GIBSON. I will state that it is 2 cents a pound.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it is a little more than that.

Mr. GIBSON. It averages about 2 cents a pound.

Mr. ALLISON. It depends on the saccharine strength of the beets, and as they increase the saccharine strength of the raw beet they increase the bounty on the manufactured sugar exported. Therefore they accomplish the double purpose of securing a large inducement for the production of beets and the manufacture of sugar, and at the same time realize a large revenue to support the government. I wanted to state that in order that there might be no misapprehension.

Mr. GIBSON. The Senator from Iowa will observe that if the bounty or drawback on German sugar is 2 cents a pound and our bounty is 1 cent a pound, it will enable the German producer with his export bounty to bring his sugar here and undersell our own sugar with the bounty and tariff.

Mr. ALLISON. That may be a good argument for increasing the bounty, but I do not think that will be the effect of it. I merely desired to make this statement as respects the situation in Germany, that there might not be misapprehension.

Now, unless some Senator desires otherwise, I will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. REAGAN. I should like to take the floor on this question for to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas will be recognized on the pending question in the morning.

PRINTING OF SUNDAY-REST HEARING.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to obtain an order of the Senate to print, if the Senator from Iowa will give way to me for a moment. I have here the notes of the hearing before the Committee on Education and Labor upon what is known as the Sunday-rest bill, for which there has been a great call in the country. I ask that it be printed as a document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As a miscellaneous document?

Mr. BUTLER. Are all those petitions to be printed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Only the testimony taken before the committee, the Chair understands.

Mr. BLAIR. That is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Very respectfully,

ISAAC P. GRAY.

Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 154) for the erection of a public building at Milwaukee, Wis.;

A bill (S. 2726) granting an increase of pension to Margaret S. Heintzelman;

A bill (S. 182) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon, at Omaha, Nebr.; and

A bill (S. 1931) to increase the appropriation for the purchase of a site for a building for a post-office, court-house, and other offices in San Francisco, Cal.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL EYRE.

Mr. MCKENNA. In behalf of my colleague, Mr. FELTON, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk (H. R. 3106) for the relief of Lieutenant-Colonel Eyre.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Lieut. Col. Edward E. Eyre, late lieutenant-colonel of the First California Cavalry, be released from all further liability on account of his receipts and disbursements of funds as acting quartermaster, and the proper officers of the United States Treasury are authorized and directed to cancel said liability, whether the same be pending in court or has become a judgment, and to close the accounts of said Col. Edward E. Eyre.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the report be read.

Mr. MCKENNA. The report has been read. I can make a simple statement of the case; and then, if there is any objection, I will withdraw the bill. Lieutenant-Colonel Eyre while performing duty was commanded by his commanding officer to supersede a quartermaster; which he did under protest. From that quartermaster he received certain funds. He performed the duties of quartermaster for a few months on the march, disbursed certain sums, then turned over the balance of his funds and the vouchers for his disbursements to his successor, and assumed that they had been transmitted to the Department. Thirteen years afterwards he was notified that the vouchers had not been presented, and that he was apparently in default some three thousand and odd dollars. These are the facts. If he had been notified in time of his seeming default he could have taken advantage of an act which was on the statute-book providing for the settlement of just such accounts.

Mr. HOLMAN. What became of the vouchers?

Mr. MCKENNA. They were turned over to his successor and were lost.

Mr. HOLMAN. What evidence is there that the vouchers ever existed?

Mr. MCKENNA. The evidence of General Eyre himself, who I will state is a very respectable gentleman, one whose word no person who knows him would hesitate to take for anything, and to whom might be safely intrusted any amount of money.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Does the proof show conclusively that the vouchers did exist?

Mr. MCKENNA. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And that the money was paid out in good faith?

Mr. MCKENNA. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCKENNA moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I rise to a matter of personal privilege, and ask the Clerk to read the newspaper extract which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A VOTE TO BE HAD ON "NAT" M'KAY'S CLAIM.

[Special.]

WASHINGTON, January 15.

At the last session of Congress President Cleveland vetoed a bill providing for a reference to the Court of Claims of the claim of "Nat" McKay. The veto message was referred to the House Committee on War Claims, which recommended its passage. At a meeting of the committee to-day, by a vote of 7 to 5, it was decided to recommend the passage of the bill over the veto, whereupon Mr. STOCKDALE, of Mississippi, became much excited and declared that the bill should never pass the House, no never, as long as he [STOCKDALE] could prevent it. His chief reason was that in the recent Presidential campaign Mr. McKay had been guilty of "pernicious activity," had actually ridiculed and insulted the great reformer whose name stood at the head of the losing ticket. Mr. STOCKDALE's cogent and pertinent arguments failed to sway the committee, which declined to reconsider its decision in favor of the claimant.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I will not detain the House——

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, how does that present a question of privilege?

Mr. REED. I am afraid that it would take too long if we were all to explain our positions under newspaper criticism.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that this is a question of privilege at all, but the gentleman from Mississippi stated that he rose to a question of privilege.

Mr. REED. Well, if he wishes to explain——

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be no objection to the gentleman making a statement.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman may proceed for five minutes.

Mr. BAYNE. I object unless the explanation is limited to five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has asked for only five minutes.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to occupy the attention of the House upon the facetiousness of this article—only upon its falseness. In the committee, when the question came up I stated that it seemed to be admitted on all hands that the bill could not pass at this session——

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman has no right to state what occurred in the committee.

The SPEAKER. He has a right to state what he said himself, but he has no right to disclose the proceedings of the committee or the position taken by other members. If the gentleman thinks proper to disclose what he said himself, the Chair sees no objection.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I stated, as a reason, that I had voted for this bill in the committee and in the House, but that Mr. McKay had made a personal attack on the Executive because he had failed to sign the bill——

Mr. DUNHAM. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not take a member off the floor with a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. DUNHAM. Then I make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUNHAM. I make the point that the gentleman has no right to state how he voted in the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he has. [Laughter.] In other words, the Chair supposes that whenever the minority of a committee present their views to the House, the fact is disclosed that they were against the proposition in the committee. The gentleman has a right to state what his own action was in the committee. The gentleman from Mississippi will proceed.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Mr. Speaker, I was saying I do not desire to detain the House to notice the oppressive facetiousness of this article—only its falseness. A misrepresentation in a paper of the standing of the Tribune, even expressed in this silly way, may injure a member so humble as myself. What I resent in the article is that I am represented as acting unbecomingly in presence of the committee of which I am a member.

There were but eight members of the committee present, and as the vote on the McKay bill was taken the committee rose and dispersed, and I said not a word of what the Tribune represents me as saying.

I did not use any of the language nor assume the manner attributed to me in the Tribune. What I said on the subject was said in a respectful way to the committee and before the vote was taken, to the effect that while I had voted in committee to report the McKay bill favorably and voted in the House for its passage, I was opposed to the committee reporting the bill back now with the recommendation that it pass over the veto of the President, and in explanation of that position I said that it seemed to be conceded on all hands that the bill could not pass over the veto at this session; that I did not believe that Mr. McKay expected it to pass, but that Mr. McKay had made a bitter attack on the President, which reflected on his integrity, on account of his veto of this bill, and was still pursuing that course, and that he sought to procure a report from the War Claims Committee recommending its passage over the veto to emphasize and strengthen his criticism; that I regarded it as improper that the War Claims Committee in its official capacity should re-enforce a citizen in his attack on the Executive of the United States, which seemed to be the main object; that so far as I was concerned I did not propose to be mustered into that column; that I wanted the committee to understand that my action did not indicate that I would oppose the passage of the bill in the next Congress; that I had nothing to do with Mr. McKay's quarrel. I simply on my own account declined to be used in it. I stated that I would do the same thing were the Executive a Republican.

I have examined and reported as a subcommittee a number of cases in this Congress, some of them large and laborious, and I do not believe I know the politics of any claimant whose case I examined, unless I knew him personally beforehand. I did not know that Mr. McKay was a Republican until he told me yesterday, when I gave him my reasons for making a minority report. Mr. McKay did not send this report to the Tribune. He is a gentleman, and could not descend to misrepresentations. I do not suppose the Tribune desires to do so. Whatever in this article differs from what I have said is false.

H. CLAY WOOD.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7301) for the relief of H. Clay Wood, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $296.10 be paid, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to H. Clay Wood, in full satisfaction and discharge of any and all claims against the United States for the loss of property by said H. Clay Wood at the evacuation of Fort Cobb, Indian Territory, in May, 1861, and at Indianola, Tex., in the autumn of 1861, in consequence of the surrender of the military department of Texas by General Twiggs.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be some explanation given of this bill, or that the report will be read.

Mr. REED. I can put the explanation of the bill into a very few words.

Lieut. Henry Clay Wood was one of two officers who lost personal property on account of the surrender of General Twiggs in the military department of Texas. The other officer was Capt. Joseph B. Plummer. His loss, that of Captain Plummer, has been paid by an act of Congress, and this bill is to reimburse Lieutenant Wood on the same account.

It has been customary under such circumstances to reimburse officers for losses that have been plainly proved, as in the case of shipwreck.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much was paid to the other officer mentioned?

Mr. REED. About a thousand dollars.

Mr. HOLMAN. This was personal effects?

Mr. REED. This was for personal effects, and the report of the Committee on War Claims is made in favor of it.

There being no objection, the bill was considered and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REED moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TERM OF COURT, QUINCY, ILL.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the House Calendar from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11638) and put it upon its passage. This is a bill to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for a term of court at Quincy, Ill.," approved August 8, 1888.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to provide for a term of court at Quincy, Ill." approved August 8, 1888, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out, in lines 4 and 5 in section 3, the following words "for the disposal of the unfinished business thereof."

There being no objection, the bill was considered and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

A bill (S. 1931) to increase the appropriation for the purchase of a site for a building for the post-office, court-house, and other offices in San Francisco, Cal.; and

A bill (S. 182) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Omaha, Nebr.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the further consideration of the bill for the admission of Dakota.

Mr. CRISP. In pursuance of the notice given last week, I desire to call up to-day the contested-election case of Smalls vs. Elliott. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that I would not do so if there was any assurance or I had any idea that the pending proposition would be disposed of within a reasonable period, say within an hour or two. But I have no such idea and no such assurance; therefore I ask the House to permit me to call up the contested-election case now.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have conferred with several gentlemen on the other side who wish to speak on this question, and they have agreed that they will be satisfied with an extension of the time for general debate amounting in all to one hour and ten minutes, and I desire to submit a motion that all general debate be closed in an hour and ten minutes, and then we can proceed under the five-minute rule. We wish to dispose of this proposition as soon as possible under the rules of the House, and I ask every gentleman present to assist us in bringing it to a speedy conclusion, so that other matters may go on. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will not insist upon calling up the election case to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia calls up a privileged matter, the contested-election case from the State of South Carolina.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I must raise the question of consideration against it.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will couple with his motion a request for unanimous consent that all gentlemen who desire to do so may have leave to print upon this question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that that leave be given.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent can not be asked now until the other matter is disposed of, unless the gentleman from Georgia waives it for the present.

Mr. CRISP. I call up the contested-election case.

Mr. SPRINGER. And against that I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House proceed to consider the election case?

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 48, noes 74.

So the House refused to consider the election case.

ADMISSION OF DAKOTA.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I move now that all general debate upon the pending bill be closed in one hour and ten minutes. Pending that I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who wish to do so may have leave to print remarks in the RECORD on this question.

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. How is the time that the gentleman from Illinois proposes to allow for general debate to be divided?

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Colorado will occupy one hour and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] ten minutes of the time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The time so far having been occupied mainly by the Delegates from the Territories and the members of the Committee on the Territories, it seems hardly fair to now limit the time to an hour and ten minutes and give one hour of that to a member of the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. SPRINGER. But that is to be divided amongst a number of gentlemen. I will see that the gentleman from Ohio shall have a part of the time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I stated very respectfully yesterday that I would like to have ten minutes in which to express my views upon this question, and I do not propose to consent to any disposition of the time which will not permit me to do so.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentlemen present any amendment?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask to do that.

Mr. SPRINGER. When the bill is under discussion under the five-minute rule the gentleman will be enabled to express his views upon the measure.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not want to speak on the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will make it one hour and twenty minutes and give the gentleman ten minutes' time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois then moves that general debate be limited to one hour and twenty minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SYMES. Mr. Speaker, I yield fifteen minutes of my time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD].

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I will require all that time, because I do not wish to speak on the general principles of admission to any great extent. That has been covered by the general debate which has preceded me. I am prompted in speaking at all upon this subject by the same motives that prompted me to introduce the amendment which I have submitted to the substitute proposed by the chairman of the committee [Mr. SPRINGER], and that is to secure action upon the proposition to admit all the Territories named in his substitute as proposed States, and to secure such action as will be satisfactory to the people thereof, and which will at the same time be satisfactory, I believe, to the majority of this House.

Now, I know personally that the Territory of Dakota is ready for admission as two States, and that what we understand to be South Dakota and North Dakota are each of them separately anxious to be admitted as free and independent States, and are each in favor of division almost (if not actually) unanimously. I believe that all the proposed States mentioned in the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois are entitled to admission, and supposed it would be conceded, until I heard the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE] yesterday, that New Mexico, as well as the others named, would be admitted by this act without objection; and I must say that I have heard nothing said by the gentleman from Iowa that I regard as a valid objection to the admission of the Territory of New Mexico as a State. It has the requisite population, having 175,000 at least, and compares favorably in that respect with the Territory of Montana and other Territories which that gentleman does not object to have admitted, and in its productions it is considerably in advance of these and much superior in the possession of the elements necessary to make a great State to some States of this Union. But, sir, as I said before, I am desirous to have action taken by this Congress, and especially of seeing Dakota admitted soon as two States. A great injustice has been done the people of Dakota by their admission being delayed so long. It would do no good to discuss the causes of this delay. I hold that it has been because other measures were given preference, to its exclusion, and not because of political bias, as has been claimed. But let that pass. Let us act, and by respecting each other aim to secure the passage of a bill as the majority desire.

Recognizing the fact that there are a larger number of gentlemen on this floor who are in favor of admitting South Dakota under the constitution presented here, and being one of those in favor of admitting South Dakota under that constitution, I have prepared an amendment to the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois which ought to be acceptable to him, because it relates only to the proposed States of North and South Dakota and does not interfere with the omnibus character of his substitute or the provisions thereof relating to Montana, Washington, or New Mexico.

Now, South Dakota is ready to be admitted. The constitution that was submitted to us for consideration here has been subjected to as severe a criticism by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] as he evidently was capable of.

After listening to those criticisms and all that has been said of the proposed constitution of the new State of South Dakota by the gentleman from Illinois and others, I am fully satisfied that if the Territory of South Dakota should hold another constitutional convention the chances are more than even that they can not improve on the document they have already submitted to us; and, with all due respect to the gentleman from Illinois, I must say that his criticism of that document, taken as a whole, is a high compliment to it, as I believe he himself, on reflection, will admit, he being unable to point out more serious objections.

Now, what are the alleged defects? The first criticism that he made was shown in the debate to be a mere typographical error. The next was on the provision limiting the sessions of the Legislature to sixty days.

In respect to that I need only say that that provision has existed in the constitution of our State for over fifteen years. And it was not adopted hastily, but was adopted as a separate and distinct proposition after we had become a State, and was submitted by the Legislature of the State, and the same clause is in the constitution of many other States. As I understand the clause giving women the right to vote, it simply confers upon them a right similar that which women have in our State, to vote for school officers and at school meetings. His criticism in reference to the provision giving the Legislature the power to repeal certain charters is shown by the wording thereof to be a mistake. It is clearly intended to include municipal corporations. It is a manifest misprint by omitting the word "municipal," and we have the right and it is our duty to presume that in the original constitution it is correct. But no court would say that it was not intended to mean municipal corporations. Upon its face it wasclearly the intention of the framers of this constitution that this legislative power was confined to municipal corporations, for in the copy before us the word "cities" is used, and thus places this beyond doubt. I do not hesitate to say that this constitution is creditable to its framers, and will compare favorably with that of any other State in this Union.

Entertaining these views and believing that that constitution is as good a consitution as South Dakota could adopt if the question was resubmitted, and knowing it to be, if anything, more carefully drawn than the constitution of the State that I in part represent here, I feel that it would be a great wrong to require the people of South Dakota, upon a mere sentimental consideration, to go to the trouble and engage in the turmoil of holding another State convention. I know that there are gentlemen upon this side of the House, if not upon the other, who in the face of the election held in Dakota upon the question of division, in which North Dakota decided against division by a majority of 10,000 votes, believe that the question ought to be resubmitted. Now, I am satisfied that the sentiment of the people of North Dakota is entirely different at the present time; but to meet the objection based upon that ground I have incorporated in my amendment (which is in part the Senate bill with some slight changes) a provision submitting the question of division to the people of North and South Dakota, and making the admission of both or either contingent upon that vote. Before incorporating that provision in my amendment I submitted it (as also the other one which I shall presently mention) to gentlemen here representing both North and South Dakota, gentlemen belonging to both political parties—I refer to Chief-Justice Tripp, Judge Spencer, Judge Moody, and Mr. Stevens, a gentleman who has been sent here as a delegate to represent North Dakota by the recent convention of North Dakota held at Jamestown—and they all agreed that this provision should be inserted, being entirely satisfied that both sections are now in favor of division, and are therefore perfectly willing that the question shall be submitted at the same time as the other questions are submitted, as provided in the bill.

Mr. WARNER. Your amendment would admit South Dakota without further Congressional action.

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes, sir, without further Congressional action. In addition to this, there is also a further provision (which is also satisfactory to the gentlemen I have named and to other gentlemen who represent the Territory here) requiring a new election for Representatives in Congress, and State officers. These are the changes which I propose to make in what relates to Dakota from the Senate bill. So far as the amendment that I propose is concerned, it differs from the amendment or substitute proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] only in the fact that under my amendment South Dakota can come in under the Sioux Falls constitution. I believe that it is unnecessary to resubmit the question, and that they could not improve the constitution if another convention were held. Following what I have referred to are provisions which are in effect an enabling act for North Dakota after its organization as a Territory. So far as my amendment relates to Montana, Idaho, and New Mexico, it is the same as the gentleman's substitute. That is all I have to say on that point.

Being a Western Representative, I have two or three serious objections to raise to certain provisions contained in the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois. Section 12 of that substitute contains a provision which certainly ought not to be included in this act. If gentlemen will refer to that section of the substitute they will find that it provides for the disposal of the school lands to purchasers at a price not less than $10 an acre; but, in a provision, beginning in line 9 of that section, the substitute provides that in all cases where settlers shall have located upon such school lands prior to the 1st day of January, 1890, with the intention, in good faith, of purchasing the lands, they can procure them at $6 per acre. Now, I do not believe there is a Western gentleman here or others who have had such experience as we have had—indeed it does not require that a man should have had any experience in the West for him to know, in view of the weaknesses of human nature, that, before January, 1890, with that clause in this act, there would not be a valuable school section in either North or South Dakota that would not be "settled upon" and taken at $6 an acre, by parties who would go and locate upon them between now and that date.

My friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] also criticises the provision in the Senate bill for a division of the property and of the indebtedness of the Territory. I insist that the provisions of my amendments, or of the Senate bill (which is the same thing upon this point), clearly prescribing how the division shall be made, are infinitely superior to his proposed plan of leaving the question to three gentlemen to be appointed, who would be liable to disagree, and to leave the whole matter in an unsettled and chaotic condition. Therefore I am in favor of the provisions of my amendment (or bill) as to this also.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MACDONALD. One word more and I have done. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois further that his bill donates to the Territories of Dakota a much larger amount of the public lands than is given to these Territories by my bill, and I do not believe that he intends that. He proposes to give more than the friends of Dakota ask.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman is led into error from the fact that the bill changes the existing laws which carry with them these donations without any acts of legislation, namely, 500,000 acres for internal improvements and swamp and overflowed lands. Those have been repealed as to this act; and in lieu of them such donations are given as are expressed in the bill, and which represent the unanimous judgment of the Committee on Territories.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARNER. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD] be extended ten minutes, as I understand the time of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] has been parceled out.

Mr. SPRINGER. I believe the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD] asks only five minutes; and to that I make no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY). Is there objection to extending the time of the gentleman from Minnesota five minutes, not to come out of the time allotted to general debate? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MACDONALD. My amendment, which is in this respect substantially the same as the bill introduced in the Senate by Senator PLATT, provides for 30 sections for capitol buildings, aggregating 19,200 acres; for universities, 72 sections, aggregating 46,080 acres; for agricultural college, 90 sections, aggregating 57,600 acres; for penitentiary, exclusive of the 20 sections, 12,800 acres; making an aggregate of 135,680 in addition to the 500,000 acres mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois. The amount of lands provided in the act of March 2, 1881, I have not had time to ascertain; but for capitol buildings, penitentiary, agricultural college, universities, schools, reform schools, and deaf and dumb asylum the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois gives to these Territories an aggregate of 373,680 acres.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to say anything more upon this subject, except to appeal to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to yield the point I have suggested, and not insist that this constitution shall be submitted to the people of South Dakota. I believe that South Dakota ought to be admitted, and should have been before this; but it is an open secret that gentlemen on this side of the House—and I concur in their view—believe that these several Territories ought to be admitted in the form of an "omnibus bill." They fear that if this is not done all of them will not be dealt fairly with. I have therefore retained that feature intact; and I simply differ with the gentleman from Illinois in this, that I propose that South Dakota shall not be subjected to the annoyance and expense of another constitutional convention—this, and nothing more. In every other respect my proposition corresponds with his. Certainly he ought to agree to this suggestion; and I trust that gentlemen on the other side will agree to this and cease to press the Senate bill. In making this appeal I am simply striving to bring about results that I know the people of North and South Dakota are anxiously hoping for.

I hope gentlemen on this side will take this view also of this question. It seems to me it must be recognized that it would be an act of injustice to require the people of South Dakota to do over again what they have already done and done so well.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will ask to have printed in the RECORD, in answer to the remarks just made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD], the proceedings of a meeting, composed of both political parties, held in Minnehaha County a few days ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to print in the RECORD what he has indicated? The Chair hears no objection.

The publication referred to by Mr. SPRINGER is as follows:

[From the Sioux Falls Press, January 13, 1889.]

THE COUNTY CONVENTION—THE DELEGATES TO HURON—RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED.

In pursuance of the joint call of the chairman of the Republican and Democratic county central committee, a mass convention met at Germania Hall at 2 o'clock yesterday to choose delegates to the Huron convention, which has been called for Wednesday, January 16. A. B. Kittredge was elected chairman and C. O. Bailey, secretary. The following delegates were chosen: J. M. Bailey, jr., D. R. Bailey, C. E. McKinney, Cyrus Walts, Mark Bridge, W. E. Wiley, B. F. Campbell, J. W. Boyce, W. H. Lyon, C. S. Palmer, W. R. Burkholder, E. J. Elliott, E. G. Wright, M. Kaufman, J. T. McCarrier, J. B. Cloudas, J. J. Murry, D. S. Gilden, V. Wuest.

After a spirited debate the following resolutions were adopted:

"Whereas the people of South Dakota are urgent and unanimous in their desire for admission into the Union at the earliest moment that admission can properly be secured; and

"Whereas it is uncertain whether anything looking toward admission will be done by the present Congress, and equally uncertain whether there will be an extra session of the Fifty-first Congress; and

"Whereas serious defects exist in the Sioux Falls constitution, notably that limiting the State indebtedness to $500,000, when the bonded debt made on behalf of the public institutions located in South Dakota already exceeds $667,000, while from present prospects the State of South Dakota is liable to begin business without a dollar in the treasury; and

"Whereas certain changes required by the Platt bill, which is now before the lower House of Congress, provide for the resubmission of parts of the constitution to popular vote; and

"Whereas the tenure of office of the various officials elected under the Sioux Falls constitution is indefinite and uncertain; and

"Whereas certain counties in South Dakota did not send delegates to the Sioux Falls constitutional convention, some delegates have died, and some have left the Territory; and

"Whereas the population of South Dakota since the choice of these delegates in June, 1885, has increased from 263,000 to over 375,000, nearly one-third of the present electors having had no voice in what was then done; and

"Whereas admission into the Union can be secured under an entirely new constitution practically as soon as under one which must again be submitted to popular vote, and which confessedly will even then need amending in other important respects: Therefore,

"Be it resolved by the electors of Minnehaha County in mass convention assembled, That the interests of all classes will be best subserved by admission into the Union under a constitution which does not contain the objectionable features found in the Sioux Falls constitution, and which will give every legal voter now in South Dakota an equal voice in determining certain disputed provisions of the constitution, the choice of temporary State capital, and the selection of State officers, members of the Legislature, and Congressmen.

"Resolved, That we, electors of Minnehaha County, firm in the belief that the quickest, best, and most satisfactory way of getting into the Union will be under a new constitution, favor the calling of a new constitutional convention for the making of a new fundamental law for the State of South Dakota.

"Resolved, That the delegates chosen by this convention to represent Minnehaha County in the statehood convention at Huron, on Wednesday, January 16, be instructed to urge that convention to ask the Legislative Assembly of Dakota, which is now in session at Bismarck, to pass a law providing for a new constitutional convention for South Dakota, whose delegates shall be apportioned upon the total vote polled at the late election for delegate."

On the call for a division of the house it developed that of the one hundred and fifty persons, more or less, who were present, all but twelve or fifteen favored the resolutions.

Mr. SYMES. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I wonder how many members of this House there are who have so profound a contempt for the intelligence of the people of the Territories as to suppose that they can be imposed upon by this transparent subterfuge known as the "omnibus" substitute for the Senate South Dakota bill. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] delivered the other day a eulogy on the intelligence and progressive spirit of the people of the West. It was deserved by them, and it was creditable to him. But how can he imagine that they will fail to see what he evidently does not fail to see, that under this proposed omnibus bill the people of Washington and Montana and every other Territory do not obtain a single substantial advantage which they can not obtain without the passage of the bill, while the passage of this bill and the consequent defeat of the Senate bill will have the practical effect of continuing for one year longer the outrage on the people of South Dakota which they have already suffered for about a year at the hands of this House?

Now, I do not choose to argue the question of the propriety of admitting the Territories as new States as soon as they are fit. We are all agreed as to that. And on the point of the division of the Territory of Dakota (in which I believe the gentleman from New York agrees with me) it is not fit that I should detain this House long. But as in this substitute bill there is a provision that that question shall be voted on again, and as in the otherwise much less objectionable omnibus bill of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD] there is a similar provision, I want to say simply this: The question whether Dakota shall be admitted as two States or as one is not a question for the people of Dakota alone. It is a question which interests us as the representatives of the entire American people; and if a large majority of the people of that Territory, north and south, should vote in favor of the admission of the Territory as one State, it would still be our duty to insist on its division into two States.

We ought to see to it in admitting States hereafter that no new State shall be exceptionally large or exceptionally small in population. As Dakota is a level and fertile Territory its vast area will maintain in the years to come a vast population. It is in the interest of the United States that the vast population which is destined to fill that area shall be represented by four Senators at the other end of the Capitol instead of by two.

The unequal representation of the people of the United States which prevails in the other House of Congress is an evil. It has no justification whatever, except a historical justification. It is a part of the original compact, and that is all. We may not be able to do away with that evil so far as existing States are concerned, but it is our duty to see to it as far as we can that all States which shall hereafter come into the Union shall be, when fully developed, average States in population and area.

The average area of the thirty-eight States of the Union is about 55,000 square miles, I think, or in that neighborhood.

Mr. COX. Much less than that.

Mr. ADAMS. Very well. If Dakota is admitted and divided equally the area of each of those two States will be over 70,000 square miles.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Seventy-five thousand.

Mr. ADAMS. Not quite, I think; but call it 75,000. More than half as large again as New York or Pennsylvania or Ohio; nearly half as large again as Illinois, which has but 56,000. These two new States will be large enough; and they will be populous enough, if the fertility of the soil and the enterprise and intelligence of their present population give any indication of their future growth. I think there is little doubt, either in Congress or out of Congress, that the people of Dakota, North and South, would vote by a large majority to divide the Territory and admit it as two States.

But I say again that the question of the proper size and boundaries of new States is one in which the people of the other States have the right to exercise their judgment, as well as the people of the proposed new States, and that it would be our duty to divide Dakota even if the people now residing in the Territory preferred to be admitted to the Union as one State. What, then, is our present duty toward South Dakota, with a South Dakota bill pending before us which has already passed the Senate? Our duty is to admit her at once.

The Senate bill will need amendment. It is necessary because of the inexcusable delay of the House in acting on the bill, which passed the Senate in April, 1888, nearly a year ago. Now, we ought to amend the bill by providing for an election of State officers and of members of Congress at the earliest practicable day. I have prepared an amendment fixing the date of the election on April 9, 1889. The resubmission of the question of the name and boundaries of the State can take place at the same time. I take this date from the proposed substitute bill of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD], and I wish to say of that bill that if any omnibus bill ought to pass that is the bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out, first, the practical effect of passing the Senate bill with the amendment I propose and the amendments sent up yesterday by the gentleman from Dakota; secondly, the practical effect of passing the Senate bill without these amendments; and thirdly, the effect of adopting the omnibus bill of my colleague [Mr. SPRINGER] and passing it as a substitute for the Senate bill. In the first case the members of Congress from Dakota will be elected early in next April. They will receive their certificates of election within a few weeks thereafter. They can take their seats early in the first session of the Fifty-first Congress, even if it should be a special session called by the next President of the United States.

In the second case named, South Dakota would become a State at some rather indefinite time next summer or autumn, and the Senators and Representatives of that State would take their seats at the regular December session of the next Congress. In the third case named, that is, in case the substitute of my colleague becomes law, South Dakota would not become a State until the Fifty-first Congress could pass an act for that purpose. A bill would have to be introduced. It would be referred to a committee. It would be reported and go on the Calendar. It would have to take its chances with election cases, and perhaps with a tariff bill. It might not become a law till late in the first session or even till the second session of the next Congress. That is the practical effect of passing the substitute bill.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Does the gentleman refer to the substitute bill of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], or the substitute bill of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD]?

Mr. ADAMS. I do not refer to the bill of the gentleman from Minnesota, as it is not open to the objection I have named. Let me say of that bill, Mr. Speaker, I mean the bill of the gentleman from Minnesota, that although it is a long bill as it appears in the RECORD, it is easily understood by those who have examined the other bills pending before us. It is the Senate bill, so far as it relates to South Dakota, while it is substantially the Springer omnibus bill as far as it relates to all the other Territories. There may be some variations, but that is the substance of it. It contains enabling acts for all the Territories named in the bill of my colleague, excepting of course South Dakota.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to passing enabling acts for these Territories, except for New Mexico. With that one exception, I believe the next Congress will be ready to admit them all. As to New Mexico, I have some doubt, and I believe that in the country at large and in the next Congress there will be some question raised whether the time for the admission of New Mexico has arrived. In a case of doubt like this I think a Congress ought not, in its last session, to pass an enabling act which will have to be ratified by a succeeding Congress.

It is in the legislative discretion of the Fifty-first Congress to determine whether to admit New Mexico or not. If we now pass an enabling act for New Mexico, and the people of that Territory act on it, and frame a constitution and submit it to the next Congress, it will still be the duty of that Congress, if it deemed it unwise, to admit New Mexico, so to declare, and to refuse admission, notwithstanding the enabling act and all that has been done under it. If on the other hand we refuse to pass the enabling act and the people of New Mexico go on notwithstanding and frame a constitution and submit it to the next Congress and that Congress deems it wise to admit New Mexico as a State at that time, it will be their bounden duty to do so.

With regard to New Mexico we all know that there is a difference of opinion on this floor and among the people at large, and perhaps even among the people of the Territory, as to whether it should be admitted or not. I do not intend to discuss the merits of that question. I do not say, indeed I can not say, how I shall vote on that question in the next Congress if I live to take my seat there. I do say that my duty in voting on that question in the next Congress will depend on my conviction as to the wisdom of the measure when it is presented for my vote.

It will not depend on what this Congress shall have done. Therefore, I think that in a case of doubt such as the case of New Mexico is it would be unfair to the people at large, and unfair to the next Congress, and unfair to the people of the Territory of New Mexico to pass an enabling act in the last session of this Congress, when we have no strong assurance, as we have in the case of the other Territories named in the bill, that what we do and what is done under our act will be ratified by the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. GROSVENOR was recognized.

Mr. SYMES. Mr. Speaker, the ten minutes to which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] is entitled are not to be taken out of the time allotted to me in this discussion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY). The Chair so understands.

Mr. GROSVENOR withholds his remarks for revision. [See Appendix.]

Mr. SYMES withholds his remarks for revision. [See Appendix.]

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, of course I do not propose to discuss the proprieties one by one of the admission of the large number of Territories which are embraced in what is generally called the "omnibus bill." I desire at the threshold of my remarks to protest against this perpetuation of a system of grouping the Territories together, a system which prevailed and had its sole excuse under the divided system of freedom and slavery in which this country used to live. There is no sense and no occasion for employing that system to-day. There can be no relation between the situations of the different Territories which will justify the party in power in attempting to force a multitude of States in or out without giving to each proposed State an opportunity to be heard upon its individual merits.

The Territory of South Dakota, everybody knows, ought to be admitted at once, promptly, without any delay. Everybody knows that the effect of this omnibus amendment which is proposed by the chairman of the Committee on the Territories will be inevitably to delay the admission of that Territory. Everybody knows, further, that the region called "North Dakota" ought to be put in train for admission in due form into the Union. This bill has a tendency to delay that, and ought not to have been presented, and would not have been presented if the object and design had been to relieve certain communities from the oppression under which they have suffered for reasons that are purely political. Six hundred thousand people have been practically disfranchised from the last Presidential election by this maneuver in Dakota alone, and it is proposed still by the same men to throw other obstacles in the way.

Everybody knows likewise, Mr. Speaker, that the admission of each Territory is a question that ought to be taken up and considered on its individual merits, and there is no reason for tying up the undisputed cases with those that are disputed. It may be possible that the Territory of New Mexico has very nearly reached a position and condition under which it ought to be admitted into the Union, but no one who has listened to this debate can say that it is an undisputed question. We all know that it is not. This dispute about the condition of New Mexico is by no means necessarily a reproach upon its inhabitants. This Union ought to be homogeneous within certain limits. It ought to be alike from one end of it to the other; and each new State, when admitted into the Union, ought to be composed of a population which can from its nature act in harmony with the rest of the States of the Union. That is the ground obviously upon which everybody puts the non-admission, and even the non-presentation for admission, of the Territory of Utah.

There is no doubt that the improvements which have been going on in the condition of New Mexico, if continued, will in time remove any doubts which exist to-day, and will give her a population the average of which will be in accord with the sentiments and feelings of the people of the United States. And I say it is a wrong, here attempted to be committed upon these Territories about which there is no doubt, to thrust upon Congress needlessly a question about which there is doubt—grave doubt—and about which there is dispute. It can arise from nothing except a disposition to get into this Union a State the situation of which is doubtful, at the expense of those Territories with regard to which every one is agreed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, why should this be done? Why should we submit to it? What reason is underlying it? It has the appearance—although I do not charge it, for the chairman of the Committee on the Territories would hardly be guilty of it—it has the appearance of a political maneuver. [Laughter.] It has the appearance of an attempt to put somebody in the wrong, by saying to us on this side of the House, "Vote for the admission of that Territory here and now, or else you have got to vote against the admission of all of them, and that puts you in an unfortunate position, a position which you have got to explain, and a position which you have got to excuse." But I think it will be discovered that the people of the United States are too wise and too sensible to be deceived by such an obvious position of affairs. When this bill goes over to the Senate, if this attempt to foist this omnibus bill upon the pending bill is persisted in—if this goes to the Senate, it seems to me that it should go with the moral force of opposition to some parts of it, so that finally, when we get the results of the conference committee, we may be able to admit that Territory which the Senate have already voted to admit, and which ought to be admitted instantly, and which will enable us to do justice to the other Territories about which there is no question of dispute.

Mr. WARNER. It is not my purpose to make an extended argument upon this question. I said in substance all that I desired to say on this question at the first session of this Congress. Yet it may be well, sir, to recur to the history of these Territorial bills. It is well known that South Dakota in the fall of 1885 called a constitutional convention, adopted a constitution that no member upon this floor contends is not republican in form. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Territories may differ with the good people of Dakota as to some of the provisions of that constitution; but that is simply a difference of opinion between a citizen of the State of Illinois and the citizens of the Territory of Dakota, and upon a question of that kind the citizens of Dakota should be permitted to control.

Now, sir, in February, I think, 1886, three years ago, the Senate passed a bill to admit South Dakota upon the constitution thus adopted, and carving out the Territory of North Dakota. That came over to this House. With this bill this House did nothing. At an early day of this Congress the Senate passes again a bill for the admission of South Dakota, and carving out the Territory of North Dakota. The Senate furthermore passes a bill to enable Washington Territory to come into the sisterhood of States by an enabling act.

It is a well-known fact from the proceedings upon this floor, without disclosing the secrets of the committee, that there was no difference of opinion between the Democratic members of the committee and the Republican members that Dakota should be admitted into the Union.

The only question of dispute as to Dakota was whether South Dakota should come in as a State under the constitution adopted in 1885, and that North Dakota be given an enabling act to enable it at some future time to come in as a State, or whether Dakota should be admitted as one State—a proposition which it would seem that people who were anxious or were willing to have action upon that question would have brought squarely before Congress and submitted it without any entangling alliances to the judgment of their fellow-members, whether this Territory, an empire, should be admitted as one State or whether it should be carved into two States. There was never any question of dispute as to Washington Territory between the members of the committee. There was no dispute as to Montana. We all agreed that these Territories should be admitted as States. Why is it, I ask the chairman of the committee; why, I ask my friends upon the other side, is it that we have had no legislation for these Territories? Is it not a fair proposition I submit? Is it not treating the members of this House fairly, saying nothing about the rights of the Territories, that members should have an opportunity to vote upon Dakota without having it linked with any other Territory? That we should have a right to vote upon Washington, Montana, Utah, or any other Territory as a separate and distinct proposition none will question. Why link the fortunes of one Territory to those of any other? Is this fair; is it honest? The claims of no Territory should be advanced or retarded by being placed in an omnibus bill with any other Territory.

Why should the destinies of the people of Washington Territory be arbitrarily linked and tied with those of New Mexico? Why should we be asked to do this with the great empire of Dakota, that to-day has all that goes to make a people great and prosperous, with a population equal to any in intelligence? It is fully abreast of any State in the Union in its industries, its agriculture, its educational institutions, from the common school to the university. Why has this been done? I will leave that for the chairman of the committee to answer.

Members of this House have contended—and I class myself among that number—that the people of New Mexico, at the last session of Congress, when this matter was brought forward, were not—at least it was not shown to the committee—fitted for the duties, rights, and privileges of statehood.

Now, if you ask me for one of these reasons I say, in addition to what was said by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE], that on the 3d day of March last the learned gentleman who so ably represents the Territory of New Mexico made a report; reciting what? The gentleman, among other things, said in that report that, "from 1860 to 1880," a period of twenty years marked with unparalleled growth in this country; twenty years in which the great West had almost become the controlling factor in the United States, an era of unprecedented prosperity; yet amid all this prosperity, amid all this growth, according to the gentleman's report—and he cites the census of the United States to support him—

There were fewer acres of land tilled in the Territory of New Mexico in 1880 than in 1860, the number of farms in 1880 being actually less than in 1860.

I believe, sir, that upon the educational growth and development of a community largely depends the future welfare and greatness of a people. In the language of General Grant, I believe that—

In a Republic like ours, where the citizen is sovereign and the official the servant; where no power is exercised except by the will of the people, it is important that the sovereign—the people—should possess intelligence, and that the free school is the promoter of that intelligence which is to preserve us a free nation.

Sir, take two of the Territories that are linked together in the substitute, New Mexico and Dakota if you please. The learned gentleman, the Delegate from New Mexico [Mr. JOSEPH], at the first session of this Congress cited, as something of which his people should be proud, that in the years 1886 and 1887 they had expended for the payment of teachers in their public schools in that Territory—the schools where the future citizens of the State, the legislators, the men who are to control and govern the destinies of that State hereafter, are to be educated—that they had expended for the maintenance of those schools the munificent sum of $33,000; while, sir, in the same period the great empire in the Northwest, upon which the sun does not shine so favorably as it shines upon New Mexico, had expended, instead of the paltry sum of $33,000, the munificent sum of $2,600,000, without a cent of it coming from the public lands—the benefits of these you have deprived the Territory of—all paid from a tax levied upon the people; yet you persist in keeping from them the school lands to which they were entitled.

Mr. JOSEPH. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him on that point?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly.

Mr. JOSEPH. I stated in my speech in May last that the sum of $53,000 was being expended during the then current year, and that up to the time when I was speaking $33,000 had been expended.

Mr. WARNER. I have the extract from the gentleman's remarks here, but I will not take time to read it. The gentleman spoke also yesterday of the number of school-houses in his Territory. Why, sir, the valleys and hilltops in every neighborhood of Dakota are dotted with school-houses, while the report on New Mexico, which the gentleman cited, shows there were forty-one public schools, being one public school to each 3,000 miles of her territory! It is true New Mexico levied a tax of 3 mills upon the dollar of assessed value of the property of New Mexico, which amounted in round numbers, if collected, to $178,000 for school purposes.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WARNER. I wish a few minutes more.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. WARNER. But, Mr. Speaker, either through the inefficiency of the law, the inattention of the people, or the corruption of the officials, I care not which, only $45,000, in round numbers, of that tax ever found its way into the school fund. Sir, I believe that New Mexico in the last few years has been advancing. I believe that she is touching elbows with her sister Territories. I believe that the construction of railroads has infused new life, new energy, a new and a higher civilization into the old citizens. There is a breaking away from the past. I know there are men there of equal intelligence with those found in any other part of the Union—men of energy, men of enterprise. I have nothing to say against the morals of her people. I take it that they are as high as those of any community, and God knows that upon her religion I have never either publicly or privately commented. Nor do I concur in any statements that reflect either upon the religion or morals of her people. It is true that in years past she has been a laggard among the Territories. Let her show that she is in the highway of enterprise with her sister Territories. I say to my friend from New Mexico that while as a proposition to-day I doubt—I honestly doubt—the propriety of admitting New Mexico as a State, yet if I am driven to vote for New Mexico in order to get in the Dakotas, Montana, and Washington, I would rather err on the side of favoritism to the people of New Mexico than to longer continue this burning outrage upon the people of the other Territories. [Applause.] One word more. The people of the Territories, as was said by the eloquent representative from Washington yesterday [Mr. VOORHEES], understand this question full well. We must do something more than weave choice garlands of rhetoric, let me say to my friend from New York [Mr. COX]; we must show our faith by our deeds, by doing something. The gentleman from Washington gave you yesterday the pathetic story of his struggles and his defeat. A man equal in intelligence and energy with any upon this floor, elected to this Congress by nearly 2,000 majority, laboring here, in season and out of season, in the interest of his people, yet defeated in the last election by your wrongs to the Territories. He can justly charge his defeat at the doors of his own party. He can charge it to your inattention, to your lack of sympathy with the interests and the aspirations of his people. He was slain in the house of his friends. So in Montana, the Delegate from that Territory came up with nearly 4,000 majority; his successor, a Republican, is elected by a majority of five or six thousand. The people of the Territories do not take part or interest in these petty differences which show themselves here. They do not sympathize with these attempts to get party advantages. Let us treat Dakota fairly. Pass the Senate bill, gentlemen on the other side, who cheered when I said I would vote for the admission of New Mexico rather than keep out the other Territories; but I beseech of you, do something that will yield good to the people of Dakota.

Pass a bill here that shall enable the people of Dakota to become a State within the next few months; pass your enabling acts for Washington, North Dakota, and Montana. Then, if you wish, bring us to a vote on New Mexico; and I do not say now that I would vote even against New Mexico, though I do not believe that she is entitled to statehood. But let this question be so presented that we may vote upon the rights of each of these prospective States. You should learn wisdom on the Territorial question by the blunders of the past.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for general debate has expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may announce the numbers of the sections of the South Dakota bill, without reading them at length; and that as each section is announced any member may offer an amendment to that section. I make this request for the purpose of saving time.

Mr. BURROWS. You do not mean the "South Dakota bill;" you mean the Senate bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, that the sections of the bill be read only by their numbers, and that as the number of any section is announced members be permitted to offer amendments to that section. The Chair hears no objection.

The Clerk proceeded to read the sections of the bill by their numbers. When section 2 was reached,

Mr. SYMES said: My colleague, the chairman of the committee [Mr. SPRINGER], will remember that there was an amendment providing for boundaries, which I believe is applicable to this second section.

Mr. GIFFORD. That is all provided for in the Senate bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. The boundary question is covered in the Senate bill.

Mr. SYMES. Then this section does not need amendment?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir.

Sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 were read by their numbers, and no amendments were offered.

When section 9 was reached,

The SPEAKER said: The gentleman from Dakota [Mr. GIFFORD] has pending an amendment to this section, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 9 by striking out the words "ninety sections of," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "one hundred and twenty thousand acres."

Mr. SPRINGER. That is in accordance with the act of Congress. There is no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Sections 10, 11, 12, and 13 were read by their numbers, no amendment being offered.

When section 14 was reached,

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR said: I move to amend by striking out, in line 3 of section 14, the word "five" and inserting the word "ten."

Mr. SPRINGER. There will be no objection to that, I presume.

Mr. GIFFORD. There is no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk announced section 15.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I move to amend by striking out, in lines 5 and 6 of section 15, the words "five thousand dollars" and inserting "$3,500."

Mr. Speaker, in the bill before the House the salary of the district judge is fixed at $5,000 per annum, whereas in the various States of the Union, with very rare exceptions, the salary of the district judges is $3,500. And I may say that in the State of Dakota the business of the district judge of the United States will be very small compared with that of such judges in the other States. It is therefore absurd to say that we must give in this new State a salary of $5,000 while in other States, where the business is ten times as great, the United States district judges are receiving only $3,500. I have therefore moved this amendment.

Mr. SYMES. Mr. Speaker, I think that a salary of $5,000 is not too much for this district judge. A bill proposing to fix this amount as the salary of the various district judges has on numerous occasions been presented in Congress, and has been passed by the Senate; and it is generally understood that if a vote were taken in this House on the subject the salary of every district judge of the United States would be fixed at $5,000. I think that this salary is not too large for a United States district judge at this day, because during the last fifteen years the salaries of the district and circuit judges of the various States have been continually increased until now many of these officers are receiving $5,000 a year. I say that any active lawyer who has not passed the days when he can earn a proper reward for his abilities by his practice, and who proposes as a United States district judge to do his duty, will not accept the position unless the salary be $5,000. I think that the worst economy the Government of the United States has ever indulged in is the payment of cheap salaries to cheap judges.

It puts second and third rate men on the bench instead of first-rate men. Where you give a district judge $1,500 more per annum, the difference between $3,500 and $5,000, he will save the United States in the mode in which he will administer justice in that court $10,000 a year as a rule.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] who has just taken his seat, either has said or assumed that the salary of State judges is as high as $5,000 a year ordinarily.

Mr. SYMES. In some States.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. In some States I admit it to be true, but in the majority of States it is not true. Take for instance the State of Minnesota, adjoining the Territory of Dakota.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Is the gentleman opposed to the general increase of the salaries of these judges?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I am in favor of a proper increase in the salaries of United States judges, but it is absurd to say we should give a judge in the State of Dakota $5,000 per annum when we are giving a United States district judge in the State of Minnesota, in the State of Iowa, in the State of Wisconsin, in the State of New Jersey, and in the State of Ohio, and many other States only $3,500, when in those States the judges are required to do five or ten times the business which will be required of any judge in Dakota. [Cries of "Vote!"] Dakota should be the last State and not the first in which the salary should be increased.

The raising of the salaries of judges is not a guaranty that we will get better men for judges. Experience disproves the claim, and gentlemen may be assured that there will not be the least difficulty in filling the office by one of the best lawyers in Dakota.

Mr. BAYNE. Let me inquire of the gentleman from Minnesota whether the absurdity is not in the fact that the United States district judges get only $3,500 a year when they should get $5,000 a year?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I did not hear the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BAYNE. My question was whether the absurdity is not in the fact that the United States district judges get only $3,500 a year instead of $5,000?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. That is not the question I am discussing now. I am discussing the question of raising the character of judges by raising their salaries. Common observation shows it does not have that effect. I am speaking of the absurdity of giving a salary of $5,000 to a judge in Dakota when in the States where the salary is but $3,500 the judge has to perform from five to ten times as much business as will be required of the Dakota judge.

Mr. RANDALL. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] that we have two United States judges in Pennsylvania who, I believe, receive $4,500 a year, and there has never been a time in my experience when we have had a bad judge at that salary.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, whether it is fair in this way to raise to $5,000 a year the salary of a judge in the proposed State of Dakota when at the lower rate of pay the Government secures the services of as acceptable judges as there are in the United States? All the salaries should pass in review and no unfair discrimination made as proposed. The Pennsylvania judges do many times the work as is probable in Dakota.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to make a single remark on this subject. Take, for example, the State of Indiana. It pays $4,000 a year to its supreme judges. The salary of the district judge is $3,500. The present district judge of Indiana is one of the ablest lawyers in the State and was transferred from the supreme bench of Indiana to that position. He cheerfully left the bench of Indiana to take the lower salary on the district bench.

Mr. RYAN. What was the term on the supreme bench of Indiana?

Mr. HOLMAN. The term was six years.

Mr. RYAN. He left it, then, to take a life position on the United States bench.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, here is a life position, and the salary of $3,500 a year is worth more than the higher salary where there is a limitation of the term.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope we will have the previous question.

Mr. BAYNE. I move to strike out the last word. My colleague is mistaken, I think, about the judges in Pennsylvania getting $4,500 a year.

Mr. RANDALL. That only shows a greater disparity.

Mr. BAYNE. In some of the States they get $3,500.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. In the bulk of them.

Mr. BAYNE. While in some they get $5,000.

I introduced a bill in the Congress before the last, and also in the last one, increasing the salaries of the district judges throughout the country to $5,000 a year, and the circuit judges to $6,000. In the last Congress the Senate passed a bill increasing the judicial salaries to $5,000 per year, and I had hoped the House would favorably consider and adopt that proposition. I hope that this measure will pass, giving the judge of Dakota and the other new States $5,000 a year, because I wish to emphasize the injustice done to the judiciary throughout the country by paying them but $3,500 or $4,000 a year for the service they render the people. I think this Government can afford to pay its judicial officers a reasonable and fitting compensation, and when the State of New York pays its State judiciary and even its local judiciary sums ranging from $8,000 to $12,000 and $15,000, I think the United States Government can well afford to deal justly at least, if not liberally, with its judiciary and pay its judges the small sum of $5,000 a year. In Pennsylvania they get $4,000 instead of $4,500, as suggested by my colleague. I think we ought to give this new judge, whoever he may be, $5,000, and increase the salaries of all the other judges to the same sum.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, the proposition now pending, I believe, is to reduce the amount proposed by this bill as compensation to this judge to $3,500 a year. I believe that is the proposition of the gentleman.

I do not think there is any difficulty in getting the very best kind of material for the bench at that price throughout this country, and I have no sympathy with the constant efforts which are being made by some men on this side of the House to increase these judicial salaries throughout the country.

The most eminent men who ever sat on the bench in some of the Western States, including a man who has not a peer within the last twenty-four years, Judge Breese, who sat upon the bench of Illinois, received but $1,000. In my own State we pay only from $1,900 to $2,500 a year, and men of good ability can always be found who are thoroughly competent and qualified to occupy these positions at that price. For that reason I am convinced that $3,500 for the judge in this Territory, as proposed by the amendment, is ample. We have too much need for money in other directions in this country to be applying this constant pressure to increase the salaries of men who want to occupy high social positions with large salaries, and therefore I hope the amendment in this case will be adopted.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand the previous question on the amendment to this section.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I want to move a further amendment——

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. What is the pending question?

The SPEAKER. On the amendment to strike out "5,000," and insert "3,500."

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 78, noes 59.

So the amendment was adopted.

The next amendment was offered to section 26 by Mr. GIFFORD, of Dakota.

The SPEAKER. This amendment has already been printed in the RECORD.

Mr. DINGLEY. Let it be again read.

Mr. GIFFORD. It relates to the date.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 26 by striking out the words "28th day of August, 1888," and insert in lieu thereof "the first Monday in June, 1889."

Mr. ADAMS. My proposed amendment would come in there and would strike out the same words, but would insert in lieu of "June 1st" the "9th day of April, 1889."

Mr. GIFFORD. I will say to the gentleman that that is entirely acceptable to us.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I hope it will be adopted in that form.

Mr. ADAMS. I desire simply to say that I took that from the bill of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD], who told me it was suggested to him by the gentlemen from Dakota here.

Mr. GIFFORD. I accept that.

The amendment of Mr. ADAMS was adopted.

Mr. GIFFORD. There is also an amendment of mine to section 27.

The SPEAKER. If there be no other amendment to section 26, section 27 will be now considered, and the Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Dakota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 27 by adding thereto the following: "And at said election there shall be elected the State, judicial, and other officers and members of the Legislature of the said State of South Dakota provided for in the constitution of said State, and also two Representatives in the House of Representatives of the United States Congress; and if a majority of the votes cast at said election, upon the acceptance of both change of name and boundaries and of said constitution, shall be in the affirmative, as hereinafter provided, the governor, judicial and State officers thus elected shall have power to at once qualify and enter upon the duties of their respective offices, and they and the members of the Legislature thus elected shall hold their offices until the next general election, in November, 1890, unless otherwise provided by the laws of said State, and until their successors are duly elected and qualified. The governor shall have authority to at once convene said Legislature, and said Legislature thus elected may, in the manner provided for by law, elect for said State two Senators to serve in the Senate of the United States Congress, and the Representatives duly elected at said election provided for in this section, and the United States Senators thus chosen, if otherwise legally qualified, shall be admitted to represent said State of South Dakota in the Congress of the United States."

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I desire simply to say this, Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that this amendment ought not to be adopted now. If before this State is admitted these further questions are to be decided, suppose on the question of accepting the name of "South Dakota" the State would vote "no," or in regard to the boundaries that the State should vote "no." Where is the necessity for the election? Shall it all go by default? What would be the result? It seems to me that the first thing is to let the election herein provided for take place; let the election be held and the question determined first whether or not the State shall be admitted, and then after the admission of the State, and as a consequence, South Dakota can take care of herself. It seems to me that this bill as reported would be better without the amendment.

Mr. GIFFORD. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state to him that this is the usual proceeding; that it has been done in many prior instances, and there are a great many precedents for it. Of course if the constitution fails to receive a majority of the votes of the people, the whole proceedings fail. But this is the usual mode of electing the officers—all the State officers—so that the whole machinery of the State government can go into operation whenever the constitution takes effect. This is the usual manner of proceeding in these cases. Our people are united on this. It is agreeable to the Senate, and was agreed to by them.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Why did not the committee report that upon the bill?

Mr. GIFFORD. This bill was not reported by the committee.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Has the committee passed upon that question?

Mr. GIFFORD. This amendment was agreed upon by the committee.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Then, if the committee has agreed to it, I withdraw my objection.

The amendment was adopted.

The reading of the bill was continued and concluded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk has completed the reading of the Senate bill by sections.

Mr. BAYNE. I demand the previous question on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have the floor, I think.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause of this bill, and insert the following.

Mr. BURROWS. What is the offer of the gentleman?

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill and insert the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk. It is the substitute.

Mr. BURROWS. I make a point of order against the substitute. Let it be read subject to objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent, so as to save time, to omit the reading of this substitute from the fact that it is precisely——

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to have it read.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is precisely in the words printed in the RECORD yesterday morning, and has been before the House, and every gentleman knows what is in it, and if I can have——

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to have the substitute read, or a portion of it until I can see what it is.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the substitute.

Mr. BAYNE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BAYNE. No one arose in his place to offer this substitute, and I arose and demanded the previous question on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope my friend from Pennsylvania will not assume that he has the right to take this bill out of the hands of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised by the gentleman who occupied the chair at the time, that the gentleman from Illinois was recognized. Besides, the order on which the House is proceeding expressly provides that the gentleman from Illinois shall have leave to offer that substitute. The Chair will cause the order of the House to be read.

Mr. BAYNE. If the gentleman will admit his laches I will not insist.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will not admit any laches in the matter.

Mr. BAYNE. He sat perfectly still.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the substitute. [After a pause.] The gentleman from Illinois asked unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the substitute.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have asked unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the substitute, but the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] objects.

Mr. BURROWS. I stated when the substitute was offered that I desired to make a point of order against it.

The SPEAKER. It has not yet been read.

Mr. BURROWS. Let it be read subject to the point of order. I desire to have that paper read, or a portion of it, until I can see what it is.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read it.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is precisely the text printed in the RECORD yesterday morning.

The Clerk proceeded to read the substitute, and read down to the proviso in line 40 of section 2.

Mr. BURROWS. The Clerk has read sufficient for my purpose. So far as I am concerned I will not ask for the further reading of the substitute.

The SPEAKER. Is there further demand for the reading of the substitute?

There was none.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the point of order against the substitute that it is not in order under Rule XVI, clause 7.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he has examined the order of the House as carefully as his opportunities would permit, and as far as possible has examined other orders made by the House heretofore setting bills for consideration on particular days and prescribing the method of proceeding, and has been unable to come to any satisfactory conclusion as to what was the real intention of the House in this case. Under these circumstances the Chair has thought it proper to submit the question to the House, so that it may decide for itself just what it meant by this order; and inasmuch as he has determined to submit the question to the House, the Chair desires to call the attention of members to that fact, in order that they may give attention to the argument as it proceeds.

Mr. BURROWS. I think the Chair does not apprehend the point of order that I intend to make. In Rule XVI, clause 7, the latter portion of the clause, there is this provision:

And no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

The substitute now submitted is offered, not under the order of the House but under the rule, for this reason: The order of the House specifies that the gentleman shall have leave to offer House bill No. 8466, but instead of offering that bill we have offered a substitute, every page of which is different from the bill specified in the order. Therefore, the gentleman can take nothing by the order, and as this substitute (which I understand is the caucus substitute) is offered under the rules of the House, and not under the special order, and is on a different subject from the bill we are now considering, the language of the order will not help the gentleman, but the substitute must stand or fall under the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed that it was the substitute mentioned in the order of the House.

Mr. BURROWS. It is not. Now, Mr. Speaker, upon this question I desire to be heard.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me to explain?

Mr. BURROWS. Not now. I desire to make my point of order without interruption.

Mr. REED. I think the gentleman from Illinois ought to have a chance to explain. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important question. We must now proceed under the rule of the House and not under this special order. The only question presented is whether this substitute, which provides for the admission of Montana, Washington, and New Mexico, is a subject different from the one under consideration. If it is a different subject, then the rule says that it must be rejected. If it is on the same subject, then it is admissible. It is true the substitute contains, in one portion of it, a provision in regard to Dakota which is the subject of the Senate bill, but if there is any provision of the substitute which is not germane, or which is out of order under the rule, of course the Chair is aware that that disposes of the entire amendment and it must all fall.

So in arguing the question it may be presented in this way: Is a proposition to admit New Mexico on a bill to admit Dakota the same subject or a different subject? That is the only question. Now I affirm, Mr. Speaker, that to hold that this substitute, which provides for the admission of New Mexico and other Territories, is in order would be to reverse the decisions of the House of Representatives for three-quarters of a century and throw us back to the confusion of the Congress of the Confederation. In that Congress it was the universal practice to load a bill with all sorts of amendments, so that a proposition which arrested the attention of the House in the beginning was completely changed. Public bills were changed to private ones, and private bills into public bills; and such was the confused state of parliamentary practice that in 1781 that Congress found it necessary to adopt a rule on amendments to which I desire to call the attention of the Chair. That rule was as follows:

No new proposition or motion shall be admitted, under color of amendment, as a substitute for the question or proposition under consideration.

The First Congress in 1789 adopted the same rule. Mark its language: "No new proposition or motion shall be admitted under color of amendment to any proposition." Now, under that rule it was held both in the First Congress and in subsequent Congresses that it only excluded the "new proposition" when it was offered as a substitute. A new proposition could be offered as an amendment, and would be in order whether germane or not; but a new proposition, even if germane, could not be offered as a substitute. So the practice under the foregoing rule did not relieve the difficulty. This condition continued until 1822, when the present rule was adopted, which has remained in force without modification ever since.

Let me repeat its language:

No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be offered by way of amendment.

Is a proposition to admit New Mexico the same proposition as to admit Dakota? Is it the same subject, or is it a different subject? It can not be said that it is the same subject, because it relates in a generic way to the Territories. That would be opening a door so wide that everything relating to the Territories could be admitted under color of amendment, and it would run counter to the whole current of the rulings of presiding officers of the House of Representatives.

A few citations will serve to elucidate the point and establish the practice.

This question was first presented in the Twentieth Congress. A resolution was introduced instructing the Committee on Manufactures to send for persons and papers and to inquire into a certain subject pending before that committee. An amendment was offered to that resolution, authorizing the committee in their inquiry to examine the question of the tariff and make a report on a certain matter connected therewith. A point of order was raised under this rule that this amendment presented a different subject, and was therefore not in order. Mr. Stevenson, then the Speaker of the House, ruled it out of order under the rule which I have read.

In the Twenty-seventh Congress a bill was being considered making appropriations for fortifications and ordnance, and for the suppression of Indian hostilities, appropriating a certain sum therefor. A member offered an amendment that the funds received from the sale of public lands should be dedicated to the satisfaction of the terms of this appropriation bill, devoting these moneys to meet the amount appropriated by the bill. A point of order was made that this was not germane; and Speaker White promptly sustained the point, holding that the proposition was on a different subject; and upon an appeal being taken to the House the Speaker was sustained and the amendment was ruled out of order.

In the Thirtieth Congress a bill was pending to extend the time for locating military land warrants in the State of Virginia. An amendment was proposed to that bill providing that these land warrants might be located on any public lands subject to entry. A point of order was made that the amendment was not germane; and Speaker Winthrop under this rule promptly held the amendment out of order, deciding that it was not germane to the bill. So the amendment was excluded.

Again, in the same Congress, a resolution was pending to instruct a certain committee to ascertain the salaries paid to United States district judges throughout the United States, and providing that wherever the salaries were less than $2,000 they should be equalized and all the salaries placed at that amount. The general subject under consideration was the salaries of officers of United States district courts. So an amendment was offered that this same committee should inquire into the salaries paid to United States district attorneys and marshals, and where they fell below a certain amount that those salaries should be equalized.

A point of order was made that this proposition was not on the same subject-matter; that the subject under consideration was the salaries of United States district judges, and that the proposed amendment relating to the salaries of United States marshals and district attorneys, although they were officers of the same courts, would not be germane. Speaker Winthrop promptly excluded the amendment, citing this very rule and declaring the amendment out of order because it was on a different subject. Upon an appeal the decision of the Chair was sustained. That, as a gentleman near me suggests, is "on all fours" with the case presented here.

In the Thirty-first Congress another case involving this question arose, though perhaps not so pointed as those to which I have referred. A proposition was pending fixing the amount of stationery to be allowed each member of the House; and it was proposed as an amendment to incorporate a provision to regulate the salaries of the employés of the House. Speaker Cobb, of Georgia, promptly ruled this amendment out of order, as not being germane and in violation of the rule I have cited.

In the Thirty-first Congress a bill was pending pensioning a widow of a soldier of the Mexican war. An amendment was offered providing that the pensions of widows of soldiers in the Mexican war should commence from the date of the death of the soldier and continue through the life of the beneficiary. A point of order was made that the amendment proposed a different subject from the one under consideration, and Speaker Cobb promptly excluded the amendment as not being germane.

I have found but one decision which even points toward the idea that this substitute could be in order under this rule, and that case is this: A bill was pending fixing the western and northwestern boundary of the State of Texas, and it provided that the State should relinquish all territory exterior to this line, and also all claims against the United States. To this bill an amendment was offered, proposing to organize the Territories of Utah and New Mexico, giving them a Territorial government; and that amendment was held in order by Speaker Cobb. But he expressly stated that it was so held because the proposition pending related to the territory acquired from Mexico, and as the amendment proposed a disposition of the same territory—to wit, Utah and New Mexico—he would hold that it related to the same subject. He held, therefore, the amendment in order because it related to a part of the territory which we had acquired from Mexico; and, strange to say, the decision of the Chair was sustained on an appeal.

But in the same Congress, and in less than two months afterward, another proposition was pending—a proposition to admit California—and an amendment was proposed to such bill to organize a Territorial government for Utah. Speaker Cobb then held, in accordance with his previous decision, that this amendment was in order, because Utah was a part of the territory acquired from Mexico. An appeal was taken from that decision, and the House reversed it by a vote of 115 to 87. The reference to this decision in Cushing's Manual is misleading, for upon an examination of the Journal I find that in this case the decision of the Chair was overruled by the House, and thus the proposition for the organization of the Territory of Utah was held to be out of order under this rule as an amendment to that bill.

And in the Thirty-fifth Congress (and I will cite but two or three cases more) a bill was pending to amend the various acts granting the right of pre-emption to settlers. An amendment was offered giving to settlers 160 acres of land. The bill related to the public domain, but a point of order was made against this amendment donating 160 acres of land. The point of order was made that it was in violation of this rule, and Speaker Orr in that case excluded the amendment under the rules. An appeal was taken from the decision, and the House sustained the Speaker and rejected the amendment.

In the Thirty-sixth Congress a bill was pending to establish a Territorial government for the Territory of Idaho. An amendment was offered establishing land offices in that Territory. The bill pending was in reference to the government of the Territory of Idaho. A point of order was made against the amendment that it was not in order under the rules because it was on a different subject, and Speaker Pennington promptly rejected the amendment. An appeal being taken, he was sustained by the House.

One more citation from the Thirty-fifth Congress which appears to me bears pretty directly on this question. It was when Speaker Orr occupied the chair. The bill pending was for the admission of Oregon into the Union, and the amendment offered was an amendment authorizing the people of Kansas to organize a Territorial government. That would seem quite like this case. Let me read the case:

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill of the Senate (S. 239) for the admission of Oregon into the Union, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. Alexander H. Stephens to commit the same to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

After debate,

Mr. Alexander H. Stephens withdrew his said motion to commit.

The question then being on the third reading of the bill,

Mr. Grow proposed to submit an amendment, in the nature of a substitute; the said amendment being, in substance, an enabling act for the Territories of Oregon and Kansas.

Not to admit Oregon as Senate bill proposed, but pass an enabling act for Oregon and Kansas much like the condition presented now.

Mr. Sandidge made the point of order that the said amendment was not in order, on the ground that it was not germane to the bill.

The Speaker—

Speaker Orr—

decided that the amendment was out of order under the fifty-fifth rule, which declares that "no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment."

From this decision of the Chair Mr. Grow appealed.

Pending which,

Mr. Alexander H. Stephens moved that the appeal be laid upon the table.

And the question being put,

It was decided in the affirmative—yeas 126, nays 92.

Why, only in the Forty-eighth Congress there was a bill pending in the House to change the eastern and northern judicial districts of Texas and attaching parts of the Indian Territory for judicial purposes to this district. An amendment was offered creating a new district in the Indian Territory, courts to be held in the Indian Territory, and the present occupant of the chair promptly rejected the amendment on the ground that it was not germane; that it was on a different subject from the one under consideration; holding that the bill under consideration provided only for the change of boundaries of a district already established, and although it took in a part of the Indian Territory an amendment to establish another district embracing the Indian Territory was not germane to the bill, being a subject different from the one under consideration.

It has frequently been held that no public bill can be changed into a private bill and no private bill into a public bill.

I submit, therefore, in the light of these authorities and rulings that this amendment is not in order.

Bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, we are not considering this point of order under the special order of the House, but under the rules of this body. If it should be held that this substitute is in order, then the opportunity of my friend from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] has come, and his Oklahoma bill can be attached to this Senate bill as an amendment in order. So you may admit Alaska; and the very purpose of the rule, which was that the House should know in advance what it would be called upon to consider, what it would be called upon to vote on, would be nullified, and we would be brought to the consideration of propositions about which we had not the slightest intimation in the beginning.

I wish to say in conclusion that I make this point of order not for the purpose of hindering the admission of these Territories, but, on the contrary, for the purpose of facilitating their admission. I am glad this order provides that even if the substitute should be excluded it is still within the power of the gentleman from Illinois to proceed at once to the consideration of the bills for the admission of Washington, Montana, and New Mexico. This will be in order, and this being a continuing order, the only effect of the rejection of the substitute, or if the Chair shall rule it out of order, will be that we will be brought to a direct vote on the Senate bill as amended, which can be concluded this afternoon, and we can then proceed to the consideration of the other bills.

The SPEAKER. When the gentleman from Michigan made the point of order the Chair supposed that the gentleman from Illinois had offered as a substitute the bill H. R. 8466, which is the bill mentioned in the order made by the House. Of course, if the gentleman has not offered that bill, the question which the Chair proposed to submit to the House has not yet arisen. The Chair supposes that a mere technical difference between the two bills would not be material. For instance, a correction of a mere clerical error, or something of that sort. But it seems that the proposed substitute now offered by the gentleman from Illinois contains provisions of a substantial character and not contained in the original House bill. The Chair thinks, therefore, that the order does not apply to it, and believes that in accordance with the practice of the House and its rules, ever since the House overruled its own decision in the case of California, that this substitute is not in order under the rules. The Chair holds, therefore, that the substitute sent to the desk by the gentleman from Illinois does not come within the terms of the order made by the House; and hence is not in order under the rules and practice of the House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I offer——

Mr. REED. I hope the decision of the Chair will not deprive us of the proposed explanation of the gentleman from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I now offer this as a substitute, and will then make the explanation which the gentleman from Maine seems to desire.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois now offers the substitute mentioned in the order of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. No, not at this time.

I desire to submit first a parliamentary inquiry, whether I have the right to offer it as I now propose——

Mr. BURROWS. I make the point of order against it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Wait until it has been read.

Mr. BURROWS. I would like to hear it read, if it is not the House bill referred to in the order.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is substantially that bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman, of course, has the right to have it read and offer it as a substitute, but still it would be subject to the point of order. The Chair, however, prefers not to decide a question of order until the question arises.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I ask that the proposition be read.

The SPEAKER. It will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof House bill 8466 with certain amendments thereto; so that the same shall read as follows:

Mr. BURROWS. That will not do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that all the gentleman has the right to do under the order of the House, made on motion of the gentleman from Illinois, is to offer as a substitute for this bill House bill 8466. After that has been offered, if the House should entertain and consider it, the Chair has heretofore stated, in response to a question propounded by the gentleman from Maine, that the substitute would be subject to amendment in a proper way under the rules and practice of the House. That is as far as the Chair can go.

Mr. SPRINGER. I offer to strike out, then, all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof House bill 8466.

Mr. REED. When are we to have the explanation?

Mr. SPRINGER. When this question is stated.

Mr. BURROWS. Against the substitute now proposed I desire to make a point of order. Let it be read, subject to objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that on this point of order the Chair proposes to take, under the circumstances, the judgment of the House itself. The order made by the House provides—

That the Committee on the Territories be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill numbered 185—

Then describing the bill—and that it shall be considered from day to day, etc., with leave to offer as a substitute therefor House bill 8466.

The Chair has examined the orders heretofore made, as stated a few minutes ago upon similar subjects, and from the interpretation put upon them has been unable to come to a satisfactory conclusion as to whether or not it was the intention of the House that the gentleman from Illinois should not be cut off by the previous question, or should have the right to present it subject to a point of order, or whether the House should proceed to entertain and vote upon it. The order does not so specify. It only provides that it shall be in order to offer it. It does not say that he shall be allowed to offer it and have a vote upon it, but simply the right of offering. He has offered it, notwithstanding the fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania attempted to move the previous question.

Mr. MILLS. What is the precise question?

The SPEAKER. The question will be, Shall the proposed substitute be entertained and considered by the House? That is the question which the House will determine.

Mr. BURROWS. Upon that I desire to be heard.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think I may be permitted to make the statement that the gentleman from Maine has asked me to make.

Mr. REED. I have repeatedly asked.

Mr. WARNER. Will the chairman of the committee [Mr. SPRINGER] permit me to make this suggestion, as a member of the committee, for the purpose of taking the House out of the difficulty that we are now in? I would suggest, in good faith, to the chairman of the committee, that we go to work and admit Dakota under the Senate bill, and immediately take up Washington, Montana, and the others. That would get us out of this trouble. [Derisive jeers on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard on this point. The first substitute which the gentleman presented having been held properly to be out of order under the rules, he now offers as a second substitute the bill numbered in the special order, and will claim, I suppose, that by virtue of that order the point of order was waived, and that we are estopped from making any point of order against it.

I wish to call the attention of the House to the language of that order. After providing that the Senate bill shall be taken up at a certain time, the order continues:

And with leave to offer as a substitute therefor House bill 8466.

Mark the language:

With leave to offer as a substitute therefor House bill 8466.

I affirm that it has never yet been held by any presiding officer, and has never been determined by this House on a vote, that such an order as that waives all points of order upon a bill authorized to be presented. Under that order the House simply gives leave to offer a sustitute; that is all. And what is the meaning of the term "to offer?" "To bring before;" "to bring about;" "to hold out;" "to present;" "to exhibit;" "to proffer;" "to tender." That is the meaning of the term "to offer."

And by this order he has the full right, and there is no question about it, to offer or tender this bill as a substitute. That order does not go beyond the right to offer it as a substitute; and when offered it is subject to the rules of this House, and must be offered under and in conformity with the rules of the House. It must stand or fall under the rule which declares "that no amendment or substitute shall be in order on a subject different from the one under consideration."

I am sustained in this view by a decision which the Speaker has made within a week, to which I desire to call the attention of the House. It will be remembered that we have a rule making a conference report always in order, and which provides that a conference report may be presented at any time. That is the language of the rule, "may be presented at any time." Last week a conference report was presented by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE], and under the language of the rule when he had presented the conference report he contended it could be considered, and no motion to adjourn would be in order. It was argued that the mere presentation of such a report was a barren ceremony if it did not carry with it the right also to consider. The language of this order, "leave to offer," can not convey any larger meaning than the rule to which I have referred, and yet the Speaker held that when the conference report was presented the terms of the rule had been fully satisfied. This is the language of the Chair:

The nineteenth rule of the House provides that the presentation of reports of committees of conference shall always be in order, except when the Journal is being read. Under this rule it has been held that the presentation of a report is in order.

Then the Speaker said the literal terms of the rule have been complied with:

The report has been presented to the House, and the terms of this rule have been satisfied and complied with.

So that when the gentleman presents or offers his substitute the literal terms of the rule have been complied with and the literal terms of this order have been complied with, and the substitute is open to any objection that may be urged against it under the rules of the House. If the gentleman desired to go further and make this substitute in order, he could very easily have done so if he had said:

Shall have leave to offer this substitute, which substitute shall be in order.

Then there would have been no question about it. There is nothing in this order but the right to offer I have just suggested, the terms in which all orders of this kind are made. I have looked in vain for a single order, obtained either by suspension or by unanimous consent, couched in the language of this order, under which it was claimed that all points of order were waived. In the Forty-third Congress General Garfield moved this—and I call attention to it, as the question is to be decided by the House. General Garfield said:

I want to offer this:

"Resolved, That the rules of the House be so suspended that the following section shall be in order as a part of the text of the bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government."

"Shall be in order" is the language. And the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] in the last Congress, on the Post-Office appropriation bill, asked unanimous consent that a certain provision might be incorporated in that bill—not that he might have leave to present it. This was his language:

Mr. BLOUNT. Believing that the House will appreciate the force and justice of the criticism made by the Postmaster-General in the extract which I have just read, in relation to the present compensation of third-class postmasters, I ask unanimous consent that on the 2d day of March, of this year, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads should be allowed to place in the Post-Office appropriation bill, for consideration by the House, a proposition authorizing an allowance for rent, etc.

That was agreed to, and the rule prohibiting new legislation on appropriation bills was thereby suspended. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] made a like request yesterday. He asked leave to present a certain proposition in the bill. But suppose that instead of asking the privilege of incorporating it in the bill he had simply asked leave to offer it when the bill should be under consideration by the House, and suppose that leave had been granted, would any member here contend that the point of order could not be made against it? So the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asked that the rule might be suspended in regard to an appropriation bill, and that a certain amendment might be allowed to be incorporated in the bill.

In other words, the mere right to offer the proposition does not do away with a point of order when it is offered. This is the first opportunity we have had to make the point of order. It could not be interposed when the order was made, because that was simply an order saying that a certain bill might be presented. That order has now been executed and the gentleman has presented his bill, and this is the first time that we have had an opportunity to make the point of order against it.

But it is said, what was the intention of the House? If the Chair was to pass upon the question, he might say he would go outside of the language of the order and ascertain if possible the intention of the House. I do not know what that intention was. I simply know that so far as I am concerned I listened to the order very carefully; I voted for it because I believed that it would not prevent us from making the point of order, and had I believed at that time that we could not make the point of order against the substitute when offered, I should not have voted for the order.

But it will be said that, under this construction of the order, the gentleman gets no additional rights. He had the right under the rule to offer the substitute, and if it be held that the order gives him no additional rights he gains nothing by it. Does that concern you or me? Are we operating here and considering this bill under the intentions of the gentleman from Illinois, as they shall be disclosed from time to time, or under the terms of this order and the rules of the House? I hold that we are operating under this order, and under the order the gentleman can go no farther than to offer this substitute, and that when presented it is subject to all points of order; and I make the point of order the same as against the other proposition, that it is not germane to the bill under consideration.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, the question which the Chair is to submit for the decision of the House is, what did the House mean by the language used in this order? It is one of the rules for construing all laws that you must look to the intention of the law-making power. You must look to the old law as it existed, the mischief that existed, and the remedy that was intended to be applied for that mischief. These are cardinal principles which must be kept in view when we come to construe this order. Now what was the old law? It was that the Senate bill was in the Committee on Territories, where it was beyond the reach of this House for consideration. House bill No. 8466 was on the Calendar, reported and ready for consideration whenever the House might reach it. It was the desire of the House that these two bills should be considered together, but under the rules they could not be considered together. Under the rules of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], if he desired, could offer his bill, House bill 8466, and have it ruled out, but it would not be in order. So that, if the position assumed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] be correct, the additional rule which was made by the House confers no privilege whatever upon the bill of the gentleman from Illinois; and the House in making the order did a thing that was without any purpose whatever, a thing which did not aid at all in the solution of the problem or in effecting the remedy desired. The House intended, I say, that these two bills should be brought up and considered together, that the question of admission should be decided, not only for the one Territory of Dakota, but for all the Territories mentioned in these bills, at one and the same time, and the House took the bill out of the Committee on Territories by a special order, and brought it here and laid it on the table subject to be considered by the House. By the adoption of that order the House revoked, for the time being, the rule which prevented House bill 8466 from being offered as a substitute for the other, and made it in order to be offered as a substitute, so that the whole question might be taken up by the House and considered with reference to all the Territories and decided at one time.

That was the intention of the House, and this order must be construed to carry out the intention of the House, and from the language used it seems to me clear that that was the intention, and that the order conferred upon this House the power to consider this substitute, and not merely to have it offered. The order was not intended merely to provide that it might be offered and ruled out under the existing rule, but the House, for the purpose of considering this bill, changed the existing rule and made a new rule by which the two bills were to be considered together.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MILLS. Certainly.

Mr. BURROWS. Would you hold that if this order read, "shall have leave to offer a substitute," all points of order would be waived against the substitute?

Mr. MILLS. No, sir; I would hold that the whole question was to be determined together.

Mr. BURROWS. But you think that by mentioning the number of the bill the point of order is waived?

Mr. MILLS. No, sir; the point of order is not waived, but the rule is overruled for the time being by a new rule.

Mr. BURROWS. Suppose it should turn out that the bill mentioned by number in the order was the river and harbor bill, could not the point of order be made against it?

Mr. MILLS. No, sir; it could not. The House can by its order overrule any rule of this House; and it can make in order any bill when another is being considered, whether it applies to the same subject-matter or not. Under general parliamentary rules, the river and harbor bill would not be in order as an amendment to a bill on another subject.

Mr. PETERS. Do I understand the gentleman from Texas to say there is no doubt as to the intention of this order?

Mr. MILLS. I think there is none; there is none in my mind.

Mr. PETERS. Then you differ with the Speaker in regard to that.

Mr. MILLS. That may be. I do not regard the Speaker as entirely infallible. I do not believe he speaks by inspiration. He is a human being like the rest of us.

Mr. REED obtained the floor.

Mr. SPRINGER rose.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman from Illinois desires to make an explanation, I will yield.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will state that when this matter was being considered between the majority of the Committee on Territories and the minority members of that committee, this particular resolution was submitted to the minority, or at least to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER], who in reference to this matter represented the minority, and I understood that the resolution was agreeable to them. If I had had the slightest idea that this business was to be taken out of the hands of the Republican members of the Committee on Territories, and that the other side of the House was to look at every technicality in regard to the question, I should have been more careful in dealing with it. But I thought we had reached a conclusion which was satisfactory to both sides of the House, and in that view this order was offered by me under a motion to suspend the rules, and it was agreed to. When it was pending, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] inquired of me why the resolution asked leave to offer this House bill as a substitute for the South Dakota bill, and in answer to that question I stated:

Because it would not be in order to make it unless we did so.
Mr. REED. Why do you not take up South Dakota——

No; that is not the point.

Mr. REED. Read that; it seems to begin well. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, it reads very well.

Mr. REED. It is understood that all other legitimate amendments may be offered?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly. It shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, which will admit any proper amendment. I desire to say to the gentleman that opportunity will be given to test the sense of the House by yea-and-nay votes upon every substantial proposition that the minority of the Committee on Territories desire to have a vote taken on.

Mr. REED. Why, then, do you ask for special leave to make the substitution?
Mr. SPRINGER. Because it would not be in order to make it unless we did so.

Therefore, I concede all that the gentleman from Michigan has stated with regard to this proposition. It was for the purpose of avoiding the rules which he has been citing that this proposition was introduced. I stated further:

There is a bill pending in the Committee on Territories in regard to South Dakota. It would not be in order to move an amendment to that, except as relating to Dakota, unless this express leave shall be granted to embrace other Territories.

And that statement having been made, the House immediately adopted the order.

Now, this statement having been made in answer to that inquiry, I submit to gentlemen on the other side whether they did not understand that I was of the opinion that I could not offer the substitute unless the leave of the House was given, which was then sought and was then given with that express understanding.

Mr. REED. If you thought that you could not offer that substitute without leave, why did you offer the substitute which you did offer?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will explain that; I am very glad the gentleman has asked me that question. The substitute which I did offer was the substance of House bill No. 8466 with certain amendments thereto which were germane, and will now be germane to that, and will be moved at the proper time, one of which——

Mr. REED. Why did you not explain that this was not the proposition which the order of the House authorized you to offer?

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Michigan took me off my feet and insisted upon making his explanation of the point of order, and I sat down, as I always do, when that gentleman insists upon taking the floor before I have it, because I always like to hear him speak. This is the first opportunity I have since had to explain the matter. And I want to state that there is not a proposition in the substitute I originally proposed that is not germane to House bill 8466; therefore it is in order to move House bill 8466 as a substitute for this. It is in order to move that bill with amendments, provided each amendment proposed is germane to it. I did no more than that, and I will call attention now to the principal amendment which was germane, and which I wish shall now be brought to the consideration of the House.

Mr. BAYNE. Right there I want to call the gentleman's attention to the RECORD.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman will excuse me at this moment. I want to finish my statement.

The principal feature of the amendment is contained in section 3. The original bill, known as House bill 8466 (and to move which leave was given by the House), provides for one Dakota—one State; but the substitute which I desired to offer in lieu of that contained an amendment in section 3, which permitted Dakota to be divided and to come into the Union as two States, and for the purpose of having the measure harmonious all the way through, and in accordance with the change in this principal feature, several other amendments were inserted so that the bill as proposed would be a harmonious whole, and would result in bringing about what gentlemen on the other side insist ought to be done, namely, the division of the Territory of Dakota into two States, assuming that the people on both sides of the dividing line desire such division.

Mr. REED. Well, it is not now "a harmonious whole."

Mr. SPRINGER. It is harmonious, because as it stands now it provides for one Dakota.

Mr. REED. But it is not "a harmonious whole," because an amendment was needed to make it so.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is harmonious if we want to admit one Dakota.

Mr. REED. That is to say, it is harmonious if we argue the matter one way, and not harmonious if we argue it another.

Mr. SPRINGER. No; my friend desires to be facetious at the expense of the facts.

Mr. REED. On the contrary, I am very serious, because I think there is something concealed under this; and I will be very frank in stating what I believe it is. I think you intend to claim that the House having ordered the admission of this substitute, it can not be amended.

Mr. SPRINGER. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. BAYNE rose.

Mr. REED (to Mr. SPRINGER). I think you had better listen to these suggestions, because you are misleading yourself.

Mr. BAYNE. I want the gentleman to listen and be convinced on this point by the RECORD.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman may read the RECORD.

Mr. BAYNE. Then I ask the Clerk to read what appears in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield for that purpose?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir; I desire to hear the matter read. I do not know what it is.

Mr. BAYNE. The very proposition came up whether your substitute would be susceptible of amendment or modification. An inquiry on that point was made, and the Speaker replied that it was an entirety—that but one amendment could be offered as a substitute after the Senate bill had been perfected. You proceeded upon that hypothesis because you wanted the House to consent to the amendments proposed by the Delegate from Dakota, and they were agreed to; and you had your proposed substitute in due form——

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the RECORD be read; let us see what it shows.

The Clerk read as follows:

The order under which the House is now proceeding provides that this bill shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union bills are read by paragraph for amendment, or by sections, as the House may choose, so that unless some understanding be had the Chair thinks that when a section is taken up and discussed and amended, that would preclude a recurrence to a previous section unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. ADAMS. Then I will ask unanimous consent (of which, however, I may not choose to avail myself) to submit a motion hereafter to strike out the sections providing for an election to ratify the change of name and the change of boundaries.

The SPEAKER. In order to prevent confusion hereafter, it would perhaps be best that the bill be read by sections, or that it be understood that amendments may be offered to the different sections without regard to their order, as the House proceeds with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. DUNN. I wish to make another parliamentary inquiry. It is generally understood that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] will offer a substitute for this bill after the text is completed. Now, the question is, will that substitute be read by paragraphs, so as to admit of amendments, as in the case of the original bill?

The SPEAKER. The substitute would be one entire amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. As an entire amendment it is subject to amendment as well as anything else, is it not? Certainly it is.

Mr. BAYNE. Read the following paragraphs.

Mr. SPRINGER. To show that was the intention the gentleman from New York proposed an amendment, and it was printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BAYNE. Let the Clerk read the following paragraphs.

Mr. SPRINGER. Very well.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DUNN. And when adopted it could not be amended further?
The SPEAKER. After a substitute is agreed to, it is not subject to amendment.
Mr. REED. But it can be amended prior to a vote upon the substitute.
The SPEAKER. Of course.
Mr. CUTCHEON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The bill has now been read the first time. Is it not the regular order to read the bill by sections for amendment?
The SPEAKER. It is.
Several MEMBERS. Regular order.
Mr. SPRINGER. I desire that the friends of the bill should have leave to put in just such amendments as they desire to perfect the text, being those prepared by the Delegate from Dakota [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I am bound to say to the gentleman from Illinois that makes that matter perfectly clear, and I have a distinct recollection of pressing that question to the point it has reached. So it is evident we can amend this if it is agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then the only question is whether the leave to offer carries with it the leave to consider, and as that was expressed and it was understood at the time it was for that purpose, I hope the House will sustain the proposition. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. REED. I hope the House will permit me a single word. The Speaker announced after careful comparison of this order with similar orders in past times that he is unable to state what could have been the meaning of the House, and therefore leaves it to the House to determine its method of procedure in this particular case.

Now this leaves to the House an opportunity to do what every fair man will consider to be just and right. No man can stand up here and give any reason whatever why the fate of one Territory should be linked with the fate of another. There is not even the poor excuse there would be an opportunity to get up some other bill relating to some other Territory, for unless I am mistaken this order gives an opportunity for us to go directly through with the whole list, each in its turn.

Now, why should not the House do it? Let any man ask himself what is fair to the Territories and what is fair to the country, and he can give himself no other answer than that each one ought to be considered on its merits. What object is there in bunching these Territories, in collecting them in a group? Surely there can be no other than to give the weaker the advantage which accrues to the Territories which have the stronger reason. Now, is that fair to the Territory under discussion? As the matter stands now, unless the House changes the present aspect of it, we shall proceed to vote on the immediate admission of South Dakota. Why should we not do it? Can anybody give a reason why we should not? Therefore I ask this House to pause upon the brink of an action which will possibly prevent the admission of a Territory which every man in this House agrees should at once become a State.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, this is a deliberate attempt to distract attention from the question before the House. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.] The question before the House—gentlemen may laugh, but honest men will have to answer this question—the question before the House is what was meant by the order or compact we entered into here, that the right was reserved to offer a substitute for this Senate bill. Does that mean by reserving the right to offer the substitute that you have not the right to entertain the substitute or consider it? Does it mean that this is a mere childish thing, a mere play upon words, without force and effect, or has it any substantial meaning? That is the question, and it is not whether we shall vote for one of the Territories or for all of the Territories together. That is not before us; that is not the question; and as honest men we are bound to vote on this question.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] gave certain rules that are understood and unquestioned as to the construction of such matters. The context read here from this very RECORD shows what was meant, and there is another rule of construction to which there is no exception, that where one construction would give no meaning, force, or effect to the contract, it is not admissible as against one which would give force and effect and meaning to it. The latter must in all cases be adopted.

Now, do we mean here when we solemnly enter into this contract, reserving the right to offer a substitute, that we might offer it, send it to the desk, have it read, and have the Speaker say you can not consider this, or then have the House say you can not act upon it or vote upon it?

It would be a mere empty farce. It is childish and absurd, and against all the rules of construction, and this is nothing but an attempt to lead us away to another question not now before the House, and the consideration of which does not at this time demand our attention.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make one or two brief observations in regard to this matter for the purpose of correcting a misapprehension which seems to exist in the minds of certain gentlemen. The first question that confronts us is, what will be the effect if the House shall vote to consider this omnibus bill? Plainly, it will be to turn what is now a plan for the admission of the State of Dakota into the Union into simply an enabling act in connection with four other Territories. If the bill shall pass in that shape it goes back to the Senate as an amendment to the act for the admission of South Dakota. It then goes to the conference committee, and what will be the result? Simply to defer for two years at least the admission of the States of Washington, of Montana, and of New Mexico. But if we go on and consider the matter as it stands before the House, we shall have immediately the State of South Dakota; and under the order of the House we have a right to go on here and consider, bill by bill, the questions as to whether Montana, North Dakota, Washington, and New Mexico shall be admitted, or if they are in shape to come in under an enabling act, while South Dakota will have the right for which she has been contending in vain here for seven long and weary years.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND. I wish to ask if it was not the understanding of the gentleman, as a member of the Committee on the Territories, when this order was made, that the purpose was to consider the substitute?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. My friend the chairman of the committee talked with me in relation to the matter, and proposed to make House bill 8466 the bill to come before the House.

Mr. BLAND. But what was your understanding?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I am coming to that. It was contended on the part of the minority of the committee that it was our duty to take up and consider the Senate bill, No. 185. The honorable chairman of the committee yielded the point and prepared the rule accordingly, and it was presented to the House and agreed upon in the terms in which it now stands upon our record.

Mr. BLAND. But that is not the question I asked the gentleman.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I am coming to that.

Mr. BLAND. What I want to know is if the understanding was not between the gentleman from Illinois and yourself that the order was to be made for the purpose of consideration without regard to points of order.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. No thought was given to points of order. The main idea was to get before Congress fairly and squarely the question whether South Dakota was to be admitted.

Mr. BLAND. But what was your understanding of the order? What did it mean in your opinion?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. There was nothing said about it; nothing thought about it. The whole object was to bring the Senate bill, No. 185, before the House.

Mr. BLAND. But was not that the understanding, that it was to be considered?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. There was no understanding about it; not a word was said.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. What did you understand?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Just this precisely——

Mr. BLAND. In all candor, did you not understand when that proposition was offered that it was offered to be voted upon?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I understood you were to have a chance for South Dakota, and the concluding portion was to give us an opportunity to consider the other questions.

Mr. BLAND. Well, that is all right.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Yes, that is all right.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then stand by the agreement.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Why, there was no agreement about it.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, the question before the House, as I understand it, is a question of the construction of a rule of this House raised on a point of order made by the gentleman from Michigan.

The Chair, as I understand it, declined to give his decision upon that point of order, but submits the question to the House. Before a vote upon that question has been taken the assertion is made that an agreement had been entered into that this substitute should be offered and voted upon, and I have yet to learn between whom that agreement was made; and whether, if there be any agreement, the parties are able to contract; whether, if there be any agreement, it was an agreement entered into upon the floor of this House.

For one I will say that if such an agreement was entered into upon the floor of this House openly I will not object, and will vote in favor of allowing the substitute to be voted on. But, Mr. Speaker, if the agreement was entered into between certain gentlemen in a committee-room, although it is not clear, then I say it becomes our duty to vote against the admission of this substitute, because gentlemen can not in committee-rooms, and ought not, make an agreement that violates a rule of the House. Therefore, the question of agreement not being fully established, I think it becomes the duty of members of this House to vote as their judgment dictates upon the question of order pure and simple. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to say one word.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman will be heard.

Mr. VOORHEES. Inasmuch, Mr. Speaker, as I was somewhat intimately connected with the proceedings upon which this order was based, it may not be out of place for me to state briefly just what took place. In my zeal to secure some order of the House by which these admission matters might be considered, I put myself in consultation with several of my friends on the Republican side of the House, and notably with my good friend from New York [Mr. BAKER], and it was understood between him and me that if an order could be drawn whereby the consideration of this entire question could be begun on Senate bill 185, a bill for the admission of South Dakota, he individually would agree to a proposition looking to the offering at the proper time of the substitute, being House bill 8465. It was distinctly agreed, as I understood it, that that proposition might be voted upon. If it was voted up, the friends of the South Dakota measure would rest content, and if voted down, this side of the House would be content that South Dakota should come in by virtue of Senate bill 185. I carried that proposition to the chairman of the Committee on Territories, and upon my statement, while I was sitting by him, this order was formulated by him and handed to me. I took it to my friend from New York [Mr. BAKER], and he in turn carried it to members on his side of the House. Just what transpired between him and the Republican members with whom he consulted I know not, but I do know that the distinct understanding between the gentleman and myself was that this substitute should be offered at the proper time; that it should be voted up or voted down, as the case might be.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Will my friend allow me right there——

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Do you not remember the fact that the concluding words of the resolution were—

That thereafter other bills in relation to the admission of the Territories reported from the said committee shall be in order in the House in like manner until disposed of, to be considered in the order fixed by the committee.

I remember, Mr. Speaker, speaking of the effect it would have and the attitude we would be in with reference to Montana, Washington, and New Mexico in case Senate bill 185 should prevail; that under this provision, in these concluding words, we were in a shape to permit the House to proceed with the other measures; but it had nothing whatever to do with the question whether the substitute should be voted upon or not, I think.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman permit me a question at this point? [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. BRUMM. Does the gentleman know of any agreement entered into except in a committee-room?

Mr. VOORHEES. Only just what transpired as I have stated. It seems the Speaker was under misapprehension. The agreement was made on the floor just in the manner suggested by me.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to say simply one word. I have no doubt but that it was the intention of the gentleman from Illinois to so frame his order that the point of order would not be made against the substitute. I have no doubt there was some understanding of that kind among members of the committee. When I came in, and the gentleman moved to suspend the rules and pass this order, I said at once to gentlemen near me that that would not prevent the point of order being made. I have made the point of order in perfect good faith, and it will be a very dangerous precedent if it can be defeated now. As there seems to be some misunderstanding about it, and as gentlemen will vote upon the question of the substitute rather than upon the point of order, I will withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment to the gentleman's substitute is now pending.

The Clerk proceeded to read the substitute.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, as this amendment is now before the House and the reading of it has been waived, I desire to call attention to certain amendments which I desire shall be offered thereto.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Are you going now to ask for a vote on the substitute as printed in the RECORD?

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from New York does not object to taking a vote on the substitute which I have offered as printed in the RECORD, containing only such amendments as are germane to House bill 8466.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I suggest that the first thing in order is a vote on the substitute of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD].

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from New York who is now in the chair [Mr. COX] desires to move an amendment, and as he is not on the floor I will offer it for him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COX). The Chair will state the proposition. Unanimous consent has been given that the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Illinois is now pending—the substitute as printed in the RECORD—to which the gentleman offers an amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. This amendment, I desire to state——

Mr. BUCHANAN. Let us have that amendment read.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from New York desires to offer an amendment which I will offer in his behalf. I desire to make a request of members. It will greatly facilitate this matter and enable us to reach a vote much more quickly if they will allow me to substitute for the proposition which is pending the one which I originally submitted.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is there an amendment yet offered?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP). The substitute is pending.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Let us have the amendment read.

Mr. COX. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On pages 4 and 5 of substitute, strike out all after the word "second" to the end of the paragraph and insert: "The State of North Dakota shall be entitled to one Representative in Congress, and South Dakota shall be entitled to two Representatives in Congress until the apportionment under the eleventh census."

Mr. COX. I wish to say a word in explanation of that amendment. As South Dakota has a population of 375,000 or more——

Mr. BUCHANAN. But there is a question back of that. That amendment does not fit in there. The substitute pending is House bill 8466.

Mr. COX. I ask the attention of the House for a moment. Inasmuch as South Dakota has population enough for two and a half members I propose to give her at least two members, and as North Dakota is entitled to one I provide that she shall have one member until the next census, and I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am not objecting to that. I am calling attention to the fact that it does not fit in that place. It is drawn as an amendment to the substitute that went by the board.

Mr. SPRINGER. Unanimous consent was given to consider that in lieu of the other proposition.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not understand that unanimous consent was given.

Mr. COX. Unanimous consent was asked for and given to consider the substitute as printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, there is no such understanding on this side.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN], the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], and various other gentlemen are all on the floor and talking together. Which one is entitled to the floor? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I have already stated it. It is that the amendment as offered does not agree with the terms of the substitute before the House, the bill H. R. 8466. To that it has been replied that unanimous consent has been given to bring before the House the substitute originally offered by the gentleman from Illinois and ruled out of order by the Speaker. I desire to know whether that is the fact or not, and if so at what time that consent was given. I did not hear it.

Mr. COX. I would like to have the record read on that point. The Chair certainly put the question very plainly and clearly, asking for unanimous consent to consider this substitute. If the Reporter's notes do not show the matter in that way, I am very much mistaken.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Which substitute does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. COX. The one printed in the RECORD yesterday morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP). The Clerk informs the Chair that such consent was given. The present occupant of the chair was not at that time presiding.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I submit that it is rather unfair to overrule the ruling of the Chair of only an hour ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The only question raised is a mere question of fact.

Mr. BURROWS. There is certainly a misunderstanding. It was my understanding that after the other substitute was ruled out the gentleman from Illinois offered House bill 8466 as a substitute; and we are now considering that with such amendments as gentlemen may desire to offer.

Mr. COX. The Chair put the question as plainly and clearly as ever a motion was put in this House, asking for unanimous consent for the consideration of the substitute as printed in the RECORD of yesterday.

Mr. BURROWS. I did not hear it.

Mr. COX. Everybody heard it.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. COX. I appeal to the record.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I stood within 30 feet of the Chair and did not hear it.

Several MEMBERS. I did not hear it.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] indorses my statement, and the Reporter's notes will sustain it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the only question raised is a question of fact as to whether the House did or did not give unanimous consent to consider the substitute printed in the RECORD. The present occupant of the chair was not in the chair at the time when the action in question was taken. Therefore the Chair will cause the Reporter's notes to be read to ascertain what they show.

Mr. BURROWS. That is right; let them be read.

Mr. COX. I am willing to stand by the Reporter's notes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Reporter will write out whatever there may be in the notes on this subject, so that it may be read.

Mr. MACDONALD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I understand that the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois is not now before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Reporter's notes which will show what did take place are now being written out and will be read.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. It is fair for me to state, as one of the friends of the Dakota bill pure and simple, that under all the circumstances we ought by unanimous consent to consider the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois as printed in the RECORD as the basis for amendment, hoping that if any substitute is to be adopted, it will be that offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD]. In this way we can facilitate the matter, have speedy action upon it, and put an end to it. I ask unanimous consent that this course may be taken.

Mr. COX (to Mr. BAKER, of New York). Has not that consent already been given?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I so understood.

Mr. COX. I appeal to the Reporter's notes to justify my statement.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. The gentleman from Dakota so understood.

Mr. COX. And as I supposed so did every man here.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. But there was so much confusion in the House——

Mr. SPRINGER. Then let it be agreed to again.

Mr. COX. I want the Reporter's notes read.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I have no objection to that. I simply desire to understand the condition of affairs. I did not understand any such consent was given. If we had less noise and more business we could get along better.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I make this request for unanimous consent, so that the Macdonald amendment shall be fully and fairly considered and voted upon.

Mr. BURROWS. That will be right.

Mr. SPRINGER. The only objection I offered to that suggestion, when I had the conference with the gentleman from Colorado, was that it would take two hours to read the substitute; and I would now ask unanimous consent that after the amendment which I desire to submit to this substitute be voted on, we may then have a vote upon the substitute of the gentleman from Minnesota without reading it.

Mr. SYMES. You mean his amendment to the substitute.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir, his amendment to the substitute.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I prefer that the substitute of the gentleman from Minnesota should be voted on before that of the gentleman from Illinois. It must be so as a matter of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have agreed that the gentleman from Minnesota shall have a vote on his proposition after this other question has been submitted to the House. I think that is fair.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Members of the House have read both the propositions and understand this question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call the attention of my friend from New York to the fact that when I had drawn this order providing that House bill 8466 should be first considered, with leave to offer the Senate bill as a substitute, the request came from his side that the matter should be arranged the other way. I have yielded everything to you; why should you not be willing to yield this to me?

Mr. REED. Regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded. The Reporter's notes, when written out, will be read.

Mr. COX. The regular order is the amendment which has been submitted. I do not propose that unanimous consent shall be asked until the Reporter's notes are read.

Mr. SYMES (to Mr. COX). Assuming that you are correct, this is another proposition.

A MEMBER. The point of order made by the gentleman from Michigan was withdrawn.

Mr. BURROWS. Of course it was understood when I made the point of order that I would withdraw that point, as against the bill named in the special order, if the Speaker decided in my favor.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. There is no question about that, and in behalf of Dakota and the friends of Dakota I renew my request for unanimous consent that the vote be now taken, first on the substitute of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD], and second on that offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. LODGE. Regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts demands the regular order.

Mr. BURROWS. Let the official report be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is in such a state of confusion that it is utterly impossible to hear gentlemen upon the floor. The Chair is informed by the Chief Official Reporter that he has not yet obtained the statement, to which reference has been made, in the official notes.

Mr. WARNER. Permit me just a moment. I wish to make this suggestion. I was sitting here paying attention, as I thought at least, to the action taken upon the substitute, and my remembrance is that the Speaker said this——

Mr. CUTCHEON. I rise to a question of order. It would be interesting to know what the gentleman from Missouri is saying, but we can not hear a word of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is well taken, and the Sergeant-at-Arms will aid the Chair in preserving order upon the floor.

The Chair will state that in the absence of any notes furnished to the Chair on this question, the present occupant of the chair not being then in the chair, it is not in order for him to decide upon a question of order any more than it would be for any other member of the House. Therefore, if it is insisted upon, the Chair must leave that question to the House—whether it did give unanimous consent or not to the substitution of that bill. It is merely a question of fact about which there is no information immediately available.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. Let the request for unanimous consent be again stated.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to say a single word. The gentleman from Illinois presented as a substitute the bill named in his order. There is no question about that. And after discussion—after I had made the point of order—I withdrew the point of order against that substitute, it being the one named in the special order. Now that substitute is under consideration, as is clearly understood by gentlemen on this side of the House. Gentlemen on the other side of the House seem to have adopted a different view, and hold that the proposition under consideration is the one which was ruled out by the Speaker. There is a proper way to settle the question of difference. Now let us proceed to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] then occupying the chair states that unanimous consent was given by the House to consider, in lieu of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois, that which had been printed in the RECORD.

Mr. LODGE. That is a mistake.

Mr. BURROWS. If there is any record of that I would like to have it produced.

Mr. OWEN. Let the Reporter's notes be read.

Mr. LODGE. There is no such record, as I understand it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand that the Journal Clerk made a minute of the proceeding, and made it at the time, which corresponds with the statement of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX. And that statement is confirmed by the gentleman from Dakota and others.

Mr. LODGE. Well, let any such statement be read.

Mr. BURROWS. Let us have the record. It will be sufficient.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask for the reading of the Journal entry made at the time.

Mr. BURROWS. No; let the Reporter's notes be read.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the Chair has stated that the Reporter's notes have not yet been furnished, or that they did not catch the remarks in the confusion prevailing.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. Nor did anybody else.

Mr. SPRINGER. There was a great deal of confusion at the time——

Mr. REED. If there was so much confusion prevailing at the time that even the Reporters did not get the language, how could we be expected to have had such an understanding?

Mr. COX. There was such an understanding. It was clearly stated. The Journal Clerk's evidence, which I call for, is better than that of an incompetent reporter's notes. There was no such confusion prevailing as to prevent the agreement from being heard and understood by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the present situation in which the House finds itself is largely attributable to the want of order on the floor, and appeals to the House to aid the Chair in enforcing the rules.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. If the Reporter's notes do not show that any such unanimous consent was given, and this entire side of the House, almost without exception, were not aware that any such consent was given, can it be considered by the Chair that the House is bound by any such consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The only question, the Chair will state, that is presented by the situation now is one of fact as to what substitute or bill is before the House. As stated before, the present occupant of the chair did not occupy it when either of these propositions was before the House; but when he takes the chair he is informed by the gentleman from whom he took it [Mr. COX] that the pending proposition brought before the House by unanimous consent was that which was printed in the RECORD by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CUTCHEON. My inquiry relates to that precise state of facts. Under these circumstances, there being no record by the Official Reporters, and this entire side of the House understanding that there was no such admission, can it be considered as binding upon the House, and must not the Chair submit it again to the House?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry: whether it would be in order, under the circumstances, to move to reconsider the unanimous consent given, by any member, as everybody is presumed to have voted for that? If so, I move to reconsider the unanimous consent, so as to go back to where we were. If the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Illinois made an agreement which the Speaker thought was to be carried out, but which the House misunderstood because of the confusion prevailing, would it not be better to reconsider that action and put things back where they were before that was done?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the Reporter's notes have now been copied, and will probably throw some light upon the question. They will be read.

The Clerk read the following transcript from the Reporter's notes:

Mr. BAKER, of New York (to Mr. SPRINGER). Are you going now to ask for a vote on the substitute as printed in the RECORD?

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from New York does not object to taking a vote on the substitute which I have offered as printed in the RECORD, containing only such amendments as are germane to House bill 8466.

* * * * * * *

The gentleman from New York now in the chair (Mr. COX) wishes to offer an amendment, and as he is not on the floor, I will offer it for him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COX). The Chair will state the proposition. Unanimous consent has been given that the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is now pending—the substitute as printed in the RECORD—to which the gentleman offers an amendment.

Mr. BURROWS. There, it seems that the gentleman from New York had not asked unanimous consent. It is simply stated that it was given. Why can not the gentleman from Illinois take up the substitute and offer his amendment?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will explain that to the gentleman if I can get order.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I ask that the order be reconsidered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP). The gentleman from Kentucky asks that the order be reconsidered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to that. I think this agreement is already made, and I want to explain that the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the request of the gentleman from Illinois, asking unanimous consent to substitute the bill printed in the RECORD for the substitute offered by him.

Mr. BURROWS. Which is it? There have been several bills printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The substitute.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to make a brief statement——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is endeavoring to determine what is before the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have sent the bill up to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state this: As he understands the request of the gentleman from Illinois, he asks unanimous consent that the substitute which was ruled out by the Speaker on a point of order be considered as pending now as the substitute offered by him.

Mr. MACDONALD. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota has objected. The Clerk will report the substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do trust that gentlemen will treat me with fairness about this subject. I stated to the gentlemen on the other side favoring the amendment that they desired to submit, that the South Dakota bill should be perfected in just such language as they desired it should be offered and voted upon, and I asked a similar favor for myself and for this side of the House, which was that each side of the House could present all the propositions that it desired and have a vote upon them; and that is all I desired.

It would delay this matter a long time if I have to go through with all these small amendments that have been put in this proposition for the purpose of perfecting the text. There are several of them that are merely inaccuracies in regard to several matters, and it will delay this thing a long time if we are to go through them. Therefore it was printed in the RECORD as gentlemen desired to have it, and as the friends of the bill on this side desired to have it. I hope gentlemen will deem it due to the House and the country to allow the House to vote upon them, and that is all we request.

Mr. REED. There are two propositions to be before the House. One is the South Dakota bill of the Senate and the other the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Illinois. Now, both of these have to be perfected under parliamentary law in accordance, not with the wishes of the friends particularly of the one or the other, but in accordance with the wishes of the majority of the House; that the House, if not interfered with, will determine which of the two alternative propositions it will vote upon. The gentleman from Illinois has said the South Dakota or Senate bill has received its amendments. Now, will he consent that the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD] may be offered and voted upon as an amendment to his substitute?

Mr. SPRINGER. If you will allow it to be done without reading the whole of it, as it will take two hours to read it.

Mr. REED. That means that the House is to vote upon a proposition of that kind without reading it, and that is the only way it has to ascertain whether it is absolutely unsuitable and improper.

Mr. SPRINGER. It would require a long time to read it.

Mr. REED. And if it requires time to do it, what is the difficulty about it?

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no objection to its being brought to a vote; and only ask this to save time now.

Mr. REED. Let us vote upon it, then.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will yield for him to offer it now.

Mr. REED. I understand from the friends of the South Dakota bill that they have no objection to this course, namely, the presentation of the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], and that a prior vote shall be taken on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD], and any such other amendments as may be found necessary by the House to perfect it, and then, when both propositions are perfected, to take a vote upon the alternative—that is, upon the substitute; and if that substitute is voted down, then upon the admission of South Dakota.

Mr. SPRINGER. Which substitute do you mean?

Mr. REED. If the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota is carried, then it becomes a part of the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois; and if it is voted down by the House, then it is substituted by the South Dakota bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will agree that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD] may now move his substitute, the South Dakota bill, and take a vote upon it.

Mr. REED. But that is not the proposition. The proposition is that that shall be submitted and voted upon as a substitute for your substitute.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand that that is agreeable to the other side of the House.

Mr. REED. It is an amendment to your substitute. It will be first voted on, of course.

Mr. SPRINGER. All right. I will agree to let the gentleman from Maine say what is fair in this respect and I will agree to everything that he says.

Mr. REED. Then you will be quite sure to get what is fair. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I am so desirous to have a vote upon this matter that if the gentleman from Maine will take charge of it and indicate what votes will test the sense of the House, I will agree to anything he proposes.

Mr. SYMES. If the gentleman had said that this morning there would not have been so much time wasted.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, is it understood that the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD] shall be in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is pending, offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], a substitute for the Senate bill. The first thing in order is the reading of that substitute, to which amendments may be offered if desired.

Mr. SPRINGER. That reading was waived at the beginning of the session to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the substitute must be considered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I know that; but the reading was waived.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then if there be no amendment, the question is on agreeing to the substitute.

Several MEMBERS. No! No!

Mr. KELLEY. The amendments to be considered to the substitute are those offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD], and not other amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first amendment pending to the substitute.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] desires to offer an amendment. Let that be read.

Mr. KELLEY. There is no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, except that it has not received unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On pages 4 and 5 of the substitute, strike out all after the word "second" to the end of the paragraph, and insert:

"The State of North Dakota shall be entitled to one Representative in Congress, and South Dakota shall be entitled to two Representatives in Congress until the apportionment under the eleventh census of the United States."

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope that will be agreed to.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] I purpose to know where this House stands, let the cries of "Vote, vote!" be as numerous and as long as they may. There has been confusion enough upon this important question. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. An amendment is now proposed, which seems to be an amendment to the substitute headed "House bill 8466," and I desire to know if that bill is the pending substitute?

The SPEAKER. The present occupant of the chair is not aware that anything else has been offered.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Then I would ask the mover of the amendment at what line on page 4 the amendment comes in?

Mr. COX. I supposed I was offering an amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to come in at the bottom of page 4.

Mr. BUCHANAN. And headed in large print "Substitute?"

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But that is not the answer that the Speaker makes to my inquiry.

Mr. SPRINGER. While the present occupant of the chair was out it was agreed that this was to be considered instead of the other.

Several MEMBERS. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. That being the case, of course that proposition is pending. The Chair had ruled it out of order in the first place, but now the Chair is advised that there has been an agreement that the proposition printed in the RECORD shall be considered as a substitute.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I have no objection to either, but I want to know which is which.

The SPEAKER. That, then, is the order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just read.

The amendment of Mr. COX was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now I yield to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. TOOLE] to offer an amendment to the substitute.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Provided at the time of election of delegates, as provided in section 2 of this act, the constitution framed and adopted by the constitutional convention at the session thereof begun Monday, January 14, A. D. 1884, and concluded February 9, A. D. 1884, at Helena, Mont., shall be submitted to the people of said Territory for their ratification or rejection, and all persons entitled to vote for delegates under the provisions of this act shall be entitled to vote upon the ratification or rejection of said constitution Each elector voting at such election for delegates shall have written or printed upon the ticket the words "For the old constitution" or "Against the old constitution;" which said vote shall be canvassed as provided herein for the canvass of votes for the election of delegates, and if, when all the votes for or against the adoption of said constitution have been canvassed in the manner aforesaid, it shall appear that the constitution has been ratified by a majority of all the votes cast, then and in that event the constitutional convention which may assemble in said Territory of Montana, as provided in subsequent sections of this act, shall resubmit to the people of Montana, at the election provided for in this act, for ratification or rejection, the constitution so adopted aforesaid, with such changes only as relate to defining judicial districts, the salaries of county officers in counties organized since the adoption of the constitution, and such other changes as may be necessary in order to comply with the provisions of this act.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is no objection to that amendment so far as I know, and I hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to, there being—ayes 4, noes 92.

Mr. PAYSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Where does the amendment just proposed come in?

Mr. SPRINGER. At the end of section 2.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to offer an amendment to my substitute, to come in at the end of section 3.

Mr. STRUBLE. Mr. Speaker, is another amendment in order to section 1?

The SPEAKER. This amendment is one entire proposition, and under the rules is not required to be considered by paragraphs. An amendment to one section does not preclude a subsequent amendment to a preceding section.

Mr. STRUBLE. If I understand the substitute now before the House, I desire to offer this amendment——

The SPEAKER. There is one amendment pending—that offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 3 of the substitute insert:

"Seventh. That at the election for delegates to the constitutional convention in South Dakota each elector may also have written or printed on his ballot the words 'For the Sioux Falls constitution of 1885,' or the words 'Against the Sioux Falls constitution of 1885;' and if a majority of all votes cast on this question shall be 'For the Sioux Falls constitution of 1885,' and if a division of the Territory is authorized as provided in this section, then it shall be the duty of the convention which may assemble at Sioux Falls as provided herein, to resubmit to the people of South Dakota, for ratification or rejection at the election provided for in this act, the constitution framed at Sioux Falls and adopted November 3, 1885, and also the articles and propositions separately submitted at that election, with such changes only as relate to the name and boundary of the proposed State, to the reapportionment of the judicial and legislative districts, and such amendments as may be necessary in order to comply with the provisions of this act; and if a majority of the votes cast on the ratification or rejection of the constitution shall be for the constitution irrespective of the articles separately submitted, then the President of the United States may issue his proclamation, declaring the State of South Dakota admitted as a State in the Union from and after the date of such proclamation. And the Territorial government of the Territory of Dakota shall continue in existence thereafter and apply to that portion of the Territory not embraced in the State of South Dakota until the State of North Dakota is admitted into the Union; but the archives, records, and books of the Territory of Dakota shall remain at the capital of North Dakota until an agreement in reference thereto is reached by said State."

Mr. BAKER, of New York. This is a part of the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota. The presentation of it in this manner is not in accordance with the agreement which was made when the gentleman from Maine was on the floor. It was fairly understood we should have a vote on the substitute of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. SPRINGER. This does not change that agreement at all.

Mr. REED. I submit to the gentleman from Illinois that this was not within the scope of the agreement. I think he had better withdraw it.

Mr. SPRINGER. My agreement was that the gentleman from Minnesota might offer his proposition as a substitute for mine after it had been perfected by the amendments which would be offered.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. REED. I think upon reflection the gentleman from Illinois will see that this was not within the spirit of the agreement.

Mr. SPRINGER. As I understand the Chair, the regular order is that we must perfect this before a vote on the substitute can be taken.

Mr. REED. The proposition of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD] is not a substitute, but an amendment; and a square vote was to be taken on it. I submit to the gentleman from Illinois that he ought not to propose this amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I want to explain why this proposition would carry out what some gentlemen have insisted should be done, and why the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota will not.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. The whole question is covered by the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. SPRINGER. I insist it is not, and if I could have the attention of the House for a few moments I think I could convince every gentleman here that his amendment would throw everything into the most inextricable confusion. For the sake of preserving the measure from being absolutely meaningless or irreconcilable I have offered this amendment. I can explain in a few moments what the amendment provides. It is very different from the proposition of the gentleman from Minnesota. It proposes that at the time delegates are voted for in South Dakota each elector may have written or printed upon his ballot the words "For the Sioux Falls constitution of 1885" or "Against the Sioux Falls constitution of 1885;" and if a majority shall be in favor of that constitution, and if a division should be ordered as provided in other portions of the bill, then when the convention assembles it has only to make such changes in the constitution as may relate to boundaries, to the name of the Territory, to the reapportionment of the judicial and legislative districts, and such amendments as may be necessary in order to comply with the provisions of the act of Congress. There is a want of such compliance in that constitution in many respects, rendering it necessary that the convention should take such action as I have stated; and then the constitution as amended by the convention is to be submitted to the people in November next. Thus this Territory is treated just as Montana has been treated in the amendment just agreed to.

If the constitution as amended should be approved by a vote of the people, then the President is to issue his proclamation admitting South Dakota into the Union from the date of such proclamation; and the Territorial government of Dakota is to continue in existence as to the portion of the Territory not embraced in South Dakota until Congress shall take action in regard to the admission of North Dakota; but I will say to gentlemen that the admission of the two portions of the present Territory will practically be simultaneous, because at the next regular meeting of Congress North Dakota will have voted upon a constitution and will be ready to come into the Union.

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has seen fit to present his substitute which covers a great many different Territories and an immense tract of country. It also covers a great many facts and a great many propositions of law. A great deal of confusion has resulted therefrom.

But I am informed that his amendment in its scope is an interference with the agreement that was plainly made here on the floor of the House, and I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD] whether my view is not correct, or whether I have been imposed on in regard to it.

Mr. MACDONALD. The agreement having been made between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] I did not pay very close attention to it. It was understood that my amendment should be offered and acted on.

Mr. REED. Does not this amendment now offered cover portions of the ground embraced within the provisions of your substitute?

Mr. MACDONALD. I do not so construe it. I construe it in a certain sense that it does, as it retains his provision to submit the constitution—for the resubmission of the constitution of Sioux Falls to a vote of the people.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Your proposition is complete in providing for the admission into the Union of the State of South Dakota.

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. It is an interference with that complete proposition, and it is not fair for the gentleman from Illinois now to bring forward this substitute, which is clearly in violation of the understanding on the part of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. I took this proposition to the gentleman from Minnesota early this morning and he read it. There has not been a surprise in the matter to anybody.

Mr. REED. But I think the gentleman from Illinois under the circumstances will himself see he should not press it.

Mr. MACDONALD. If my amendment is offered and voted on there is nothing to prevent him from offering his substitute.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to call the attention of the House to this fact, that the proposition introduced by the gentleman from Minnesota as an amendment to the substitute offered by me with the consent of the Committee on Territories—that is, the Democratic portion of it—embraces, I am informed, many of the features of two or three bills, and it is twice as long as the substitute I have offered. I confess for myself that I have not had time to read it and it would take two hours to read it carefully. I submit to the House in all candor, I submit to the gentleman from Minnesota, whether he will ask that we shall vote on a proposition so lengthy, so cumbersome as the substitute which he has offered and which comes only from himself without any other member or any committee knowing anything at all about it——

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I know it well. It is all right.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire in good faith to have the propositions which are legitimately here voted on, but I do protest, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Minnesota ought not to insist the House shall vote on his proposition when it has never been considered by any committee, and thereby crowding out these well-matured propositions.

Mr. REED. I wish to recall the gentleman from Illinois back to the frame of mind in which he was a short time ago when he said he would leave the whole business to me. [Laughter.] I hope he has not repented.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman is claiming generosity for everybody under the sun except the friends of this bill.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Illinois will desist, the Chair will endeavor to secure order upon the floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor, he having yielded at the request of the Chair.

Mr. MACDONALD. I understood the gentleman from Illinois to ask me a question, and I wished to answer.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to assure gentlemen over there of my desire to meet everything that can be demanded that is reasonable. Now, I will ask, before this amendment that I have offered is voted upon, that the House will take a vote upon the proposition of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. That is all right. Now let us vote.

Mr. SYMES. And that is in accordance with your agreement.

Mr. SPRINGER. Oh, no; not in accordance with my agreement. My friend from New York has offered an amendment since——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota will send his proposition to the desk.

The Chair will state, as he understands the arrangement now, that the House shall vote upon the proposition of the gentleman from Minnesota before voting upon such amendments as may be submitted to the one offered by the gentleman from Illinois, and if the proposition of the gentleman from Minnesota is not agreed to, that the House will proceed to amend the other. Is that the understanding?

Mr. BURROWS and others. It is.

[Cries of "All right!"]

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If I understood the Chair correctly, he used the words "the House shall vote upon the proposition." I wish to know by what authority the Chair makes that decision?

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated that such was the agreement.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. When was it made?

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen have just this moment come to the understanding. Is there objection to it?

Mr. SPRINGER. It has been agreed to already.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I object.

Mr. SYMES. It is too late to object.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I make the point of order that the agreement had been made and was not objected to some time ago, between the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Maine.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Maine can not make agreements that will bind the House.

Mr. BURROWS. But it was understood and agreed to by the House.

The SPEAKER. Unless a proposition is stated from the Chair and assented to by the House, the Chair does not think it is more than a private agreement.

It is now stated that the agreement was made some time ago, perhaps during the absence of the present occupant of the chair.

Mr. SPRINGER. For the purpose of bringing the House to some understanding in reference to this bill, I will for the present withdraw the amendment.

Now I want to ask unanimous consent that the proposition of the gentleman from Minnesota may be considered as having been read, and then I will move to adjourn so that gentlemen can read it in the RECORD. Otherwise, I will have to insist on sitting here until it has been read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the proposed substitute, and asks that it be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then let it be read; and I desire to state that as soon as it is read I will move to adjourn, and no business shall be done after the reading, if I can avoid it, so that gentlemen who do not desire to remain can leave the Hall, and I will stay with the gentleman from Florida to take care of the floor. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Minnesota has already been printed once in the RECORD, but it will be read.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important matter; and we are not all going to sit here to hear it read, as it will consume some hours, we are told. It does not seem to me to be good legislation to have it read in the absence of the members, and therefore I move to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

W. R. WHEATON AND C. H. CHAMBERLAIN—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 3646, entitled "An act for the relief of William R. Wheaton and Charles H. Chamberlain, of California."

These parties were, respectively, for a number of years prior to 1879, the register and receiver of the land office at San Francisco, in the State of California.

Prior to July, 1877, they had collected and retained, apparently without question, certain fees allowed by law for reducing to writing the testimony heard by them in establishing the rights of claimants to public lands.

On the 9th day of July, 1877, these officials were notified by the Acting Commissioner of the General Land Office that monthly thereafter, and dating from July 1, 1877, such fees should be reported with other fees to the General Land Office.

This notification furnished clear information that whatever may have been the justification for their retention of these fees in the past the parties notified must thereafter account to the Government for the same.

On the 8th day of February, 1879, the beneficiaries were peremptorily required by the Commissioner of the General Land Office to deposit in the Treasury of the United States the sums which they had received for the services mentioned since July 1, 1877, and which, though reported, had not been paid over. Soon thereafter, and pursuant to this demand, the sum of $5,330.76, being the aggregate of such fees for the nineteen months between July 1, 1887, and February 1, 1879, was paid over to the Government.

On the 19th day of February, 1879, these officers were authorized to employ two clerks, each upon a salary of $100 per month.

The purpose of the bill now under consideration is to restore to the beneficiaries from the money paid over to the Government, as above stated, the sum of $3,800. This is proposed upon the theory that clerks were employed by the register and receiver to do the work for which the fees were received, and that these officials having paid them for their services they should be reimbursed from the fund.

It will be observed that whatever services were performed by clerks in the way of writing down testimony, and paid for by the beneficiaries, were performed and paid for after July, 1877, and after they had in effect received notice that such employment and payment would not be approved by the Government.

Upon this statement the claim covered by the bill can hardly be urged on legal grounds, whatever the Government may have allowed prior to such notice.

I am decidedly of the opinion that the relations, the duties, and the obligations of subordinates in public employment should be clearly defined and strictly limited. They should not be permitted to judge of the propriety or necessity of incurring expenses on behalf of the Government without authority, much less in disregard of orders. And yet there are cases when, in an emergency, money is paid for the benefit of the public service by an official which, though not strictly authorized, ought, in equity, to be reimbursed.

If there is any equity existing in favor of the beneficiaries named in the bill herewith returned, it is found in the fact that during the nineteen months from the 1st day of July, 1877, to the 1st day of February, 1879, they paid out certain moneys for which the Government, in the receipt of the fees which they paid over, received the benefit. Manifestly such equity in this case, if it can be claimed at all in view of the facts recited, is measured by the sum actually paid by these officials to the persons, if such there were, who did the work from which the fees arose which were paid over to the Government.

In other words, if certain clerks were paid by the beneficiaries from their private funds for doing this work, there should be a distinct statement of the sum so paid, and their claim should rest upon indemnity and reimbursement alone. But no such statement appears, so far as I can see from an examination of papers presented to me by the Interior Department and from the report of the Senate committee who reported this bill, except as it may be gathered from the rather indirect allegations contained in a paper prepared by counsel.

No vouchers have ever been received at the General Land Office for money paid for clerical services rendered during the period for which reimbursement is sought. The verified statement of the claimants annexed to the committee's report contains only the allegation that they paid for the necessary clerical services, and the affidavits of the clerks themselves furnish no clew to the amount they received. Such an omission, in my opinion, discredits the claim made, and the allowance of the sum of $100 per month for two clerks during the period of nineteen months covered by this claim, because that was the sum authorized to be paid thereafter for clerks' services, is, it seems to me, adopting a standard entirely inapplicable to the subject.

In any event these beneficiaries should be required to establish the sum necessary for such indemnification, and the amount appropriated for their relief should be limited to that sum.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 17, 1889.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. PLATT. May I inquire what bill it is that the President objects to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to William R. Wheaton, ex-register, and to Charles H. Chamberlain, ex-receiver of the land office at San Francisco, Cal., jointly, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,800, being a portion of the amount deposited in the Treasury of the United States by them as fees for testimony which was taken by clerks whose compensation was paid from the private funds of said ex-register and said ex-receiver.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the bill and veto message be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill and the message will be referred to the Committee on Claims, if there be no objection.

Mr. BERRY. Did not the bill come from the Committee on Public Lands?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have the files examined to ascertain.

Mr. BERRY. I am of the opinion that it came from that committee.

Mr. STEWART. Then let it go to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the bill was reported by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BERRY. Then I move that the bill and message be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STEWART. I accept that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be referred, with the message of the President, to the Committee on Public Lands.

THE REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, that order is closed and the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 9051.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is entitled to the floor, the question being upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. ALLISON. From the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. From the Committee on Finance.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, the amendment proposed by the committee contains a proposition to give a bounty of 1 cent a pound on sugar produced in the United States from beets, sorghum, and from sugar-cane. If those Senators who reported the bill had remembered the pleasure which it may have given them as it did me at the time before dimes and half dimes were coined to purchase fourpence ha'penny worth of maple sugar for immediate consumption, I think they would put maple sugar in the list. It may be that the sugar-maple does not grow in Iowa. I do not know as to that. If it does not, that is reason enough to excuse the Senator from Iowa for forgetting maple sugar, but I do not see how we can excuse the Senator from Rhode Island who lives neighbor to New Hampshire and Vermont, which a few years ago were among the largest producers of maple sugar. I do not know how it is at this time.

The debate on this bill has certainly resulted in some good, in that it has at last compelled the admission by the friends of the bill that high duties increase the price of commodities, and that the consumers of such imports pay that increased price. This is that much of an achievement in the interest of right and of justice, and it is to be hoped we will not again hear the assumption in the progress of this debate that increased duties do not increase the cost of products to the consumer.

The Senator from Iowa repeatedly stated in the discussion on yesterday that the high duty now imposed upon sugar largely increased the cost of sugar to the producer. That of course we understand to be true, and he seemed to make it a point of complaint that it took so much money from the people and turned it over into the public Treasury.

I wonder that it had not occurred to the Senator in making that point that the duties we impose upon iron, upon steel, upon cotton and woolen goods and like fabrics also take large amounts of money from the people that go into the public Treasury for the support of the Government. But unlike sugar, which furnishes revenue almost entirely, the duties imposed upon the articles I have just named not only take the money from the people to put into the Treasury for the support of the Government, but take several times as much from them and transfer it from the rightful owners of the money into the coffers of the manufacturing establishments without price and without consideration.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] yesterday expressed, as he had several times before expressed, the idea that it was right and proper for Senators to legislate for the benefit of their own constituents, and avowed that that was the rule upon which he acted. I am aware, sir, that it is very hard for us to divest ourselves of all idea of selfishness. I am aware that it is our duty to take care of the interests of our immediate constituents, as it is our duty to conserve the rights of all the American people; but in taking care of our constituents we should be careful that we do not do so by being unjust to other people, for that would be inexcusable.

The Senator from Kansas vindicates himself, however, against any supposition that he would benefit his own constituents at the expense of others by the support which he gives to this bill, which is a bill for the benefit of manufacturing capital at the expense largely of the agricultural people of this country, and he represents a peculiarly agricultural State. As was said at a former time by the late Senator Benton, the West and the South are recognized in this bill "for its burdens and not for its benefits." The position which they occupy in it is that they furnish the bounty, the bonus, which Congress proposes to give to people engaged in other vocations than in agriculture; and my surprise during the whole progress of this debate has been that gentlemen representing agricultural communities, who are to bear the immense burdens imposed by these laws for the benefit of other people, should find themselves compelled by party exigencies and party discipline to support a measure which distinctly and clearly sacrifices the interest of the people they represent for the benefit of others.

Yesterday the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] very aptly referred to the bill before the Senate as indicating a change in our theory of Government. When we remember that our Government, as it was originally constituted, was expected to conserve and protect the interests of all alike, and to give exclusive and special privileges to none, and contrast it with this bill, which is intended to impose monstrous burdens upon the great masses of the people for the benefit of a few capitalists, individuals and corporations, we may well understand the force of the suggestion of that Senator that this bill is the announcement of a change of the character of our Government.

Mr. President, the grant of constitutional power under which this legislation is to take place is "to lay and collect duties, etc., to pay debts, to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." That is the power and the only power under which such a law as this can be passed. I know of no other. I know of no other power given by express grant of power or which follows as an incident to any granted power. This bill ignores the idea embodied in the tenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, that the powers not granted in the Constitution are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

It assumes in Congress unlimited power over the property of the people of this country. It ignores another idea of the Constitution in the fifth amendment, that private property shall not be taken by the Government except for public use, and not then except upon just compensation. It ignores the whole theory of our constitutional system of government, and places the rights and property of the people under the control of a political majority, freed from the limitations and restraints and protection of the Constitution.

The view has been advanced upon different occasions during the progress of this debate that if we may levy duties at all for the support of the Government, that necessarily imposes upon the people burdens beyond the support of the Government and transfers to the protected manufacturers the money of the consumers in an amount equal to the rate of the tax. Certainly it has that effect; and then we may be asked, why urge the constitutional objection? That is urged because the power given in the Constitution and the reason for giving it was to collect revenue for the support of the Government and the payment of its debts.

The object of this bill, as it has been stated over and over by Senators on the other side of the Chamber, is to give protection to domestic industries subordinating to the question of revenues. Indeed, assertions on that side have been repeatedly made that one of the objects held in view by this bill was to reduce the surplus of revenue by the exclusion of imports into this country; but of that I shall say more after a while.

But when we impose a tax for the collection of revenue it is true that to the extent to which that tax goes it furnishes protection, not as a principal object of the law or of the Constitution, but simply as an incident to the power to collect revenue by an indirect tax. I submit that it is a plain perversion of the Constitution to assume that protection of domestic industries can constitutionally be the object of such a bill.

If we can reduce revenue by excluding imports, the logical result of such a policy is to destroy our foreign trade, to take from our people the foreign markets for our agricultural products, which last year amounted to more than $523,000,000 worth, and was about 75 per cent. of all our foreign imports—such a policy would bankrupt our people, destroy our prosperity, isolate us commercially from the balance of the world, and turn us back into barbarism.

It has occurred several times that gentlemen have spoken with some feeling about the charge against this bill that its object is to transfer the property of one part of the citizens to another part without consideration, and they have complained that it has been denounced as robbery. That denunciation is not new to this body or to this debate, as I shall show by the presentation of one or two authorities. Mr. Cooley, in his work upon Constitutional Limitations—and he is perhaps as high authority as we can refer to on such a question—makes the statement:

> But we think it clear, in the words of the supreme court of Wisconsin, that "the Legislature can not * * * in the form of a tax, take the money of a citizen and give it to an individual, the public interest and welfare being in no way connected with the transaction. The objects for which money is raised by taxation must be public, and such as to subserve the common interest and well being of the community required to contribute." Or, as stated by the supreme court of Pennsylvania, "the Legislature has no constitutional right to * * * levy a tax or authorize a municipal corporation to do it in order to raise funds for a mere private purpose."

Such as improving the fortunes of a manufacturing company—I put that in parenthesis, not as part of the authority—

> No such authority passed to the Assembly by the general grant of legislative power. This would not be legislation. Taxation is a mode of raising revenue for public purposes. When it is prostituted to objects in no way connected with the public interest or welfare, it ceases to be taxation and becomes plunder.

That is not my word. It is the word of the supreme court of Pennsylvania.

> Transferring from the owners of it into the possession of those who have no title to it, though it be done under the name and form of tax, is unconstitutional for all the reasons which forbid the Legislature to usurp any other power not granted to them.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator will allow me to call his attention to the fact——

Mr. REAGAN. I shall be obliged if the Senator will put his question when I am through. It will interrupt the course of my argument. I do not wish to exhibit any discourtesy, but I would like very much to continue my statement, and then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator for any question he wishes to ask.

Mr. SPOONER. I was not intending to put a question. I only wanted to call the attention of the Senator to the fact, pertinent to the precise point he is debating, that the supreme court of Michigan some years ago held constitutional an act of the Legislature of that State granting a bounty to encourage the production of salt, and afterwards on appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States the Supreme Court of the United States treated that act as a legal enactment.

Mr. REAGAN. Whatever the reasons may have been for the decision of the supreme court of Michigan, the general ground laid down in these decisions can not be controverted successfully. Mr. Justice Miller, in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Loan Association against Topeka, decided in 20 Wallace, uses this language:

> To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen, and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes is none the less robbery because it was done under the forms of law and is called taxation. This is not legislation; it is a decree under legislative forms.

So it will be seen that when we speak of this bill as being a measure to plunder and to rob the people, we are following the language of some of the ablest courts in this Union, and we are presenting a case which, it seems to me, with all deference to those who hold a different view, is placed upon the firmest foundation of justice and truth and common honesty, and can not be overthrown by sophistry and by artful statements.

I know, sir, how easy it is for persons—for we all have something of human nature in us—to believe that that is right which is to our interest or to the interest of our friends. It is the old case of the lawyer who persuades himself that his client, however guilty, is an innocent man. If it is to the interest of our particular constituents that they shall be enriched by the money of the constituents of some other Senator, it seems that we can find arguments to justify the plundering of that other Senator's constituents for the enrichment of our own.

This may be more the fault of the weakness of human nature than the fault of individuals, who yield to the seduction presented by the hope of gain to those who seek it. Our Republican friends have indicated by this bill and by their speeches that they are animated, not by the purpose of securing equal rights, equal privileges, equal prosperity to all, but by the purpose of using the Federal Government to enrich particular classes of the American people at the expense of others. Their policy is the use of the Federal Government to enrich their friends. There can be no faithful observer of the history of that party that does not understand and clearly comprehend that their idea of success in policy rests upon the promotion of the interests of the moneyed classes as against those who contribute to the fortunes of moneyed people, the agricultural and laboring classes and all others not engaged in manufacturing.

There have been no class interests resting upon money that it has not done all that it could do from its origin as a party to aid and strengthen, and the interest of the people as contradistinguished from the privileged classes is rarely spoken of unless upon the eve of a Presidential election. On such occasions we hear a great deal said about the interest of labor and the interest of the people.

I had occasion to notice that during the debate of last summer and to say then that after the election we should not hear much from the same Senators on the subject of the rights of labor and the interests of the people until we approached the time for another Presidential election.

Their policy is to assume the paternal care and management of the various pecuniary interests of the people of this country and to determine the amount of bounty which they confer upon their wards at the expense of people not so blessed by their favor. No one can doubt this who sees the policy by which they are animated. To accomplish this purpose they have in the bill before the Senate combined most skillfully the classes of interests, the moneyed interests of privileged classes, and which it was supposed would be sufficient to enable them to carry this bill successfully through, and Senators who represent agricultural States and parts of the country, I trust, will not consider me as too presumptuous when I say that, if such a law can be put in force, they will yet hear from their constituents on that subject, not about the result of the last election, but about the oppression and robbery of themselves by a law passed by the aid of their Senators.

Sophistry may answer for certain purposes, but the cold logic of facts, the cold experience of oppressive taxation, of privation of benefits for the enrichment of the already affluent and powerful, can not escape the attention of the American people and will not escape that attention permanently, and Senators had as well understand this.

This seems to be a fine frolic here to impose unlimited duties for the purpose of excluding imports because there is a majority that has the power to do it. The majority must understand, however, that there are sixty millions of American people behind us with vast and varied interests, each interest looking to its own welfare and criticising action which tends to its injury. In this combination of interests for the purpose of carrying this bill of plunder, this bill which I think I have a right to call a bill of robbery, originally, as it was reported by the committee, agriculture was left out of the combination because it was necessary to have some field from which to draw the revenues to enrich the particular classes intended to be benefited by the bill.

That most numerous class of the American people, that class which has done most to enrich this country, to conserve civil liberty and popular rights, to maintain the manly independence of the American citizen, is selected by the framers of this bill as the class which is to be the victim to be plundered for the benefit of the beneficiaries of the bill. But it seems to have occurred to Senators in the progress of the debate that perhaps they had made a mistake in entirely leaving agriculture out of the benefits of this bill, and, notwithstanding, in their report and speeches, after making an argument against the high duty on sugar, after showing that it was burdening the people with an undue and unjust tax, they concluded it was necessary in this combination to embrace at least a part of the agricultural interests of the country, and so they come in, ashamed or afraid to go back on their arguments about the high tax on sugar, with an amendment proposing in lieu of the high duties to give a bounty of 1 cent a pound on all sugar made in the United States, thus embracing not only those who make cane-sugar in Louisiana, Texas, and other Southern States, but doubtless especially to throw a bait to the great agricultural Republican States of the West, such States as Iowa and Kansas, on the idea that they are to have a bounty on sugar if they will make it out of beets and sorghum.

It is said that the production of sugar in this country was about 5,000,000 pounds for the year 1887–'88. It was 200,000 hogsheads, which would make 5,800,000 pounds. This would give a bounty of $580,000 on that amount of sugar to the producers of sugar. Of course, if the policy of the law should succeed in augmenting the production of sugar, the amount would be increased; but on that basis of $580,000 to be given to the whole Union, how much is the price which is to be paid to Iowa and to Kansas for their part of this $580,000 to justify the violation of the Constitution and the adoption of a most pernicious policy? I would like to know whether the citizens of those two great agricultural and Republican States think they ought not to sell for a better price than this for the adoption of such a policy and for the violation of the Constitution.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REAGAN. I would prefer that the Senator should reserve his question and let me get through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The Senator from Texas declines to yield.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, where do the Senators find the warrant in the Constitution for the giving of bounties, for the levying of taxes upon one part of the people to make a gift to another part of them? Under what clause of the Constitution may it be found? From what power conferred by the Constitution may it be derived?

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. REAGAN. I will hear a question from the Senator, but I do not know that I will answer it now.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understand the Senator from Texas has repeatedly said since he commenced his discourse that the protective system was not only robbery, but was unconstitutional. He has repeated that several times. I want to ask the Senator from Texas if he indorses the Mills bill?

Mr. REAGAN. If the Senator wants to know whether I indorse all the items in the Mills bill, I say to him unhesitatingly that there are many of them which I do not approve, but I very greatly prefer that bill to the still worse one of the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL. The next question is, does the Senator indorse the provision of the Mills bill that fixes a rate, I think, of about 60 per cent. tariff on sugar?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not know that I do. But I will ask the Senator now——

Mr. MITCHELL. Then I——

Mr. REAGAN. I do not wish to be diverted further.

Mr. MITCHELL. One other question, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. REAGAN. I must ask the Senator not to insist on further questions at this time. I will cheerfully answer all questions when I am through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas declines to yield further.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not believe the duty ought to be as high on sugar as it is under the existing law. I do not believe that it ought to be as high on rice as under the existing law. I would not take the entire duty off of wool; I would not take the entire duty off of lumber. I state these things in order that Senators may know why I prefer the Mills bill, as it is called, bad as I conceive it to be in some respects, to the Senate bill, though it does not meet my approval as a whole; and the Senator knows, and all other Senators know, that in matters of legislation no one Senator can expect to embody his views upon a question affecting all the great material interests of this country. All such legislation must of necessity be a compromise of opinions and of interests.

I say further to the Senator that I have conversed with Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, and I have never conversed with one of them who expressed himself satisfied with that bill. There is not one of them who has not said it was not such a bill as he desired, but it was all he could get under the circumstances. I feel just as they felt. It is not such a bill as I would desire, but I would take it rather than the present law and rather than adopt the Senate substitute.

On the subject of the allowance of bounties I would read a paragraph or two from a report of Mr. Clay, made on the subject of bounties on the 19th of January, 1858:

> That, after a careful and elaborate examination of the whole subject of fishing bounties and allowances, the committee has been irresistibly led to the conclusion that they originated in the fallacious but now almost universally exploded theory of refunding to the manufacturer, on establishing the fact of re-exportation, the amount of duties paid on the raw material entering into the product of his industry and skill.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to inquire whether he said that was written by Henry Clay?

Mr. REAGAN. Henry Clay.

Mr. TELLER. Not at all. If he will look he will see it was not Henry Clay. Henry Clay was dead at that time, and he never enunciated such a sentiment while living.

Mr. REAGAN. I believe, on reflection, the Senator is right. I thought it was Henry Clay.

Mr. TELLER. I know I am right.

Mr. DAWES. It was Clement C. Clay, of Alabama.

Mr. REAGAN. Yes; Clement C. Clay, of Alabama.

Mr. TELLER. Clay, of Alabama.

Mr. REAGAN. I suppose that as to that Senator, because Mr. Clay was from Alabama, his report would have no weight. Anything that appears from a Senator south of what is called Mason and Dixon's line, I am aware, is no kind of authority for the Senator from Colorado, no matter how much of virtue and of wisdom is in it. I understand that, but it is not necessary for us to prolong the discussion upon that point, and he understands it as well as I.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will read from the works of Henry Clay, who was south of Mason and Dixon's line, we shall find no fault with him.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator will pardon me, I will read something from the utterances of Mr. Henry Clay, south of Mason and Dixon's line, to which I should like to have the approbation of the Senator from Colorado, too, before this debate gets through.

Mr. TELLER. I did not say I would approve of everything he did or said.

Mr. BUTLER. I so understood the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. But I did not want the Senator from Texas to make the impression that the remarks of Clement C. Clay, of Alabama, were those of Henry Clay, of Kentucky.

Mr. REAGAN. I merely saw the name of "Mr. Clay" at the head of the report which I hastily read, and I gave the date of the report, forgetting that Mr. Henry Clay was not then alive.

I shall continue the reading of the paragraph, and trust I shall not be interrupted again until I get through.

That this view of the origin and object of these gratuities, whether granted in the shape of drawbacks, allowances, or bounties, according to the phraseology of the law authorizing them, has not only been adopted by the different committees of Congress to whom the subject has at different times been referred, but has been demonstrated in their reports by an array of facts and reasonings and a recapitulation of the acts bearing upon it that can scarcely be resisted by any disinterested and unbiased mind; that the report made to this body April 10, 1810 (Senate Document No. 113, Twenty-ninth Congress, first session), by Hon. T. H. Benton, covers the whole subject and its history from the commencement of the Federal Government to the date of said report, and leaves nothing for your committee to add further than to state that the subsequent and current history of our cod-fisheries illustrates the arguments and strengthens the conclusions of that masterly report, and shows that the bounties (in the language of the Secretary of the Treasury, in January, 1857) "instead of furnishing encouragement for seamen, mainly encourage the commission of multiplied perjuries, and tend to the demoralization of a large class of the community."

I will read another paragraph of that. After discussing the question as to whether they need the bounties the report adds:

If they do need it, it is inexpedient to grant it, because the mackerel, whale, and other fisheries, our merchant and military marine, certainly afford ample means for training seamen without the aid of bounty. And, if both expedient and necessary to sustain the cod-fisheries, it is unjust and unconstitutional to levy contributions on all other kinds of labor for their support.

I leave the authority upon its own reasoning. Its author was an able lawyer and one of the purest men I ever knew.

If this bill with this amendment, or whether with or without this amendment, could become a law, the students of American history would in after years mark its passage as a distinct change in the character of this Government, leading to its inevitable downfall and the inauguration of an aristocracy of wealth and of a merciless despotism.

Mr. President, on this subject I am tempted to read a somewhat lengthy paragraph from a speech made by Mr. McDuffie, of South Carolina, in a debate on the tariff of 1828, and I am inclined to read it because it so much more clearly and powerfully expresses the ideas and feelings which pervade my own mind than anything I can say that it will be better for the Senate and better for the country that his words should be heard:

Sir, if the union of these States shall ever be severed and their liberties subverted, the historian who records these disasters will have to ascribe them to measures of this description. I do sincerely believe that neither this Government nor any free government can exist for a quarter of a century under such a system of legislation. Its inevitable tendency is to corrupt not only the public functionaries, but all those portions of the Union and classes of society who have an interest, real or imaginary, in the bounties it provides, by taxing other sections and other classes.

What, sir, is the essential characteristic of a freeman? It is that independence which results from an habitual reliance upon his own resources and his own labor for his support. He is not in fact a freeman who habitually looks to the Government for pecuniary bounties. And I confess that nothing in the conduct of those who are the prominent advocates of this system has excited more apprehension and alarm in my mind than the constant efforts made by all of them, from the Secretary of the Treasury down to the humblest coadjutor, to impress upon the public mind the idea that national prosperity and individual wealth are to be derived, not from individual industry and economy, but from Government bounties. An idea more fatal to liberty could not be inculcated. I said on another occasion that the days of Roman liberty were numbered when the people consented to receive bread from the public granaries. From that moment it was not the patriot who had shown the greatest capacity and made the greatest sacrifices to serve the republic, but the demagogue who would promise to distribute most profusely the spoils of the plundered provinces that was elevated to office by a degenerate and mercenary populace. Everything became venal, even in the country of Fabricius, until finally the empire itself was sold at public auction!

To which I think we are rapidly hastening. We sell Presidencies and Senates and Congresses now.

And what, sir, is the nature and tendency of the system we are discussing? It bears an analogy, but too lamentably striking, to that which corrupted the republican purity of the Roman people. God forbid that it should consummate its triumph over the public liberty by a similar catastrophe, though even that is an event by no means improbable, if we continue to legislate periodically in this way, and to connect the election of our Chief Magistrate with the question of dividing out the spoils of certain States, degraded into Roman provinces, among the influential capitalists of the other States of this Union! Sir, when I consider that by a single act like the present from five to ten millions of dollars may be transferred annually from one part of the community to another—

And now under this law from five to six hundred millions would be so transferred—when I consider the disguise of disinterested patriotism under which the basest and most profligate ambition may perpetrate such an act of injustice and political prostitution, I can not hesitate for a moment to pronounce this very system of indirect bounties the most stupendous instrument of corruption ever placed in the hands of public functionaries. It brings ambition and avarice and wealth into a combination which it is fearful to contemplate, because it is almost impossible to resist. Do we not perceive at this very moment the extraordinary and melancholy spectacle of less than one hundred thousand capitalists—

And now between three and four hundred thousand manufacturing establishments—by means of this unhallowed combination, exercising an absolute and despotic control over the opinions of eight millions of free citizens—

Now sixty millions—and the fortunes and destinies of ten millions? Sir, I will not anticipate or forebode evil. I will not permit myself to believe that the Presidency of the United States will ever be bought and sold—

He was living in a day earlier than this—by this system of bounties and prohibitions. But I must say that there are certain quarters in this Union in which if a candidate for the Presidency were to come forward with the Harrisburg tariff in his hand, nothing could resist his pretensions, if his adversary were opposed to this unjust system of oppression. Yes, sir, that bill would be a talisman which would give a charmed existence to the candidate who would pledge himself to support it. And although he were covered with all the "multiplying villainies of nature," the most immaculate patriot and profound statesman in the nation could hold no competition with him, if he should refuse to grant this new species of imperial donative.

Mr. President, for seventy years in the history of this Government the American people presented a spectacle to which the world was unused, of brave, earnest, honest, free men, patriotic in the broadest and noblest sense, seeking to promote the general welfare of all, and denying special privileges or advantages to any. A sense of justice pervaded the lower strata of communities as well as the higher officials; a sense of patriotism and pride in the welfare of all animated the whole people. Now, sir, after twenty-odd years of Republican rule under the policy of governing by money and corporations, what is the condition of the popular mind? It is a feeling of apprehension, a remembrance of injustice done and fear of wrongs to come which takes away from men that broad patriotism and love of country which would come naturally to a people under a just and impartial government.

When fifty years ago Mr. Girard, by accidental good fortune, had become the possessor of a fortune of $3,000,000, it was the wonder of our people—a fortune which came to him not strictly in the legitimate pursuit of any regular business, but because, being the owner of ships, the people of San Domingo and Hayti who were being massacred placed their valuables on his ships and did not live to call for them. But he was guilty of no crime in plundering the people to make his fortune. So it went on until twenty-odd years ago. The wealth of this country was more equally distributed among the people than in any other country beneath the sun. The fruits of that wealth were more universally enjoyed than by any other people known to us in ancient or modern times by proud, upright, patriotic, brave, honest American citizens, enjoying the blessings of the best government that had ever been given to man. How is it now? Under a system of laws conferring bounties upon corporations and privileges to banks and by financial management in favor of the interests of bondholders and bankers by the Republican party, we have built up men's fortunes by the ten and by the hundred million. We do not become astonished to hear now that a man's fortune is worth a hundred or two hundred million dollars.

Mr. PLUMB. In that line does the Senator find in his recollection, and if not I will refresh it and recall it, some Democratic favoritism towards national banks somewhat recently exercised?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not remember what the Senator refers to.

Mr. PLUMB. I refer to the deposit of about $60,000,000 of his money and mine and money of the people of the United States in national banks without interest by this Administration.

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator perhaps chooses to attempt to divert me, and I will answer him directly if I can. There is a very good answer to that, but I do not choose to be turned off just now; and I do not admire the policy of attempting at every effective point to try to turn an argument off by a question. I am dwelling upon the condition of this country, upon the character, the hopes, and the prospects of the American people, and upon the fact that under a system of legislation which was intended to and has promoted the fortunes of a few men and of many corporations, the great body of the American people are becoming poorer and poorer, and this day more than one-half of the American people are unable to secure to themselves the ordinary comforts of life and to meet all the obligations which are imposed upon them by their duties to their families and to society.

If the Senator can find any Democratic party, or any Democratic office-holder, or citizen who has favored these policies, I join him in denouncing that party and that man with as much vigor as he dares to use. I am not here to justify wrong by any one, if wrong has been perpetrated, but to try to point out the evils of this sort of class legislation for enriching the few at the expense of the many; for degrading the character of the American citizen, and making him a poor dependent, a menial at the foot of power and of money.

Mr. President, the Senator asks me if a Democratic administration has not loaned $60,000,000 without interest. I might add that money to a very considerable amount, not $60,000,000, was so loaned, and it was loaned in pursuance of a policy that had been adopted by previous Republican administrations, which, I suppose, the Senator thinks was all right. It was loaned because there seemed to be an impending danger of a financial crisis. It was loaned on security by the deposit of Government bonds, which made the Government absolutely secure. The holders of bonds run them up until it was impossible to buy them without paying exorbitant premiums. The banks had retired a portion of their circulation. The President and the Secretary of the Treasury, it seems, conceived the idea that it was better that this money should go into the hands of the banks, where it could reach the people and ward off the danger of a financial crisis, without loss to the Government, than that it should remain in the Treasury, where it would draw no interest and where it was doing nobody any good.

What objection has the Senator to that? Does he think it would have been better for the country to retain that money in the Treasury, where it was drawing no interest, than to have loaned it to the banks, where it drew no interest, but where it went into the circulation to stave off the possibility of financial disaster and to aid in the business operations of the country and give the reward of labor?

Mr. PLUMB rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FARWELL in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. PLUMB. I do not want to argue the question. I simply wanted to have the Senator do as he has now done—justify loaning the money to the banks. That is all I care about.

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator thinks he has answered all I have said about the policy of the Republican party with reference to banks and the bondholders by saying that the Democratic Administration loaned money to banks. The Democratic Administration did not adopt the policy of the act of 1869, by which the people of this country were loaded with an additional burden of not less than $500,000,000 to give increased value to the bonds of the Government in the hands of men who paid at the rate of about 50 cents on the dollar for those bonds. The Democrats never did that. The Democrats are not responsible for the demonetization of silver in 1871–'72, when the country was on the verge of bankruptcy, when the currency had been contracted to such an extent that property was being sold for taxes and the country and people were unable to pay their debts. The Democratic party was not responsible for the passage of the act which required the taking up and cancellation of the legal-tender notes and retiring them from circulation when the people were suffering for the want of currency. But it is responsible for having remonetized silver and restored the silver coin of the country to some extent to the people. It is responsible for the repeal of the act for the retirement of the legal-tender notes after perhaps some $50,000,000 of those notes had been retired, arresting the operation of that act to retire them and preserving to the people $346,000,000 of legal-tender notes as a part of the currency of the country intended to aid its industries and to reward its labor. But it is not responsible for all the vast bounties given to railroads and other corporations in land and in money with a view to open up railroad communication with the Pacific, which was all right and proper. If the Government's bounty had been used to build those roads no complaint would have ever come from me; but as I understand it, the men who combined to build those roads, instead of using the land and money given by the Government, pocketed it and issued stock and bonds with which to build these railroads, and the people have yet to pay for their construction in paying for transportation of persons and of freight, while a few men are furnished with fortunes of hundreds of millions of dollars given to them for the patriotic purpose of aiding to construct a railway or railways across the continent.

I did not have it in view to speak of any of these subjects, Mr. President. I simply aimed at present to level whatever remarks I made at the policy of this bill, and at the more infamous policy of giving bounties, making gifts to a particular industry by a tax levied upon the other industries of the country. I shall hope until the vote is taken that the Senate will have too much respect for American interests, the rights of American citizens, the Constitution of the United States, which, as has been said, and wisely said, is the sheet-anchor of our liberties, to take this other step and propose to vote bounties out of the Treasury, levied upon other industries, for the support of the sugar industry.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I have been many years associated with the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] in the public service, and during all that time our relations, so far as I know and believe, have been such as become the intercourse between gentlemen having confidence in the integrity and honesty of purpose which actuated each other. I have not risen now at this late day in our association in that service to measure words of vituperation with him nor to undertake now to question his honesty of conviction. During that service he and I have differed very widely upon matters of constitutional law and of the power of Congress under the Constitution. He has gone very far during that time in his construction of those powers and of that instrument away from our common path, and has been led by his construction into positions and attitudes which very much surprised and pained me.

I rejoiced when he began to retrace his steps and came back into a common service in the other House and here with me as we began our public service together. But during all that time and during all that period of what seemed to me to be so strange a wandering from what I thought was the true construction of the Constitution, I never charged the Senator with any purpose to violate the Constitution of the United States or any indifference to the matter whether he did violate it or not, but attributed all those strange, and, as it seemed to me, utterly indefensible positions upon his part, to what he honestly believed to be the true construction of the Constitution. Yet, after thirty years' service with him, I have been compelled this morning to sit by his side and hear him charge me and a majority of the Senate with the moral turpitude of an indifference as to whether we violated the Constitution or not.

I desire to put two or three plain interrogatories to the Senator. If the Senator believes the statement which he has made here upon this floor, is it not incumbent upon him to lay before the Senate and the country the ground for the charge of moral turpitude against me and a majority of the Senate? I do not ask him to show how utterly inconsistent with his idea of the Constitution is my idea of the Constitution. I admit that. I admit that the Senator stands up here, as he has to-day, in an honest advocacy of a construction of the Constitution which, to my mind, is utterly groundless and indefensible, and appears to me as strange as it is indefensible; but I should hold it as much a violation of my relations to him as a gentleman as it would be in violation of the rules of parliamentary order and courtesy to charge him with moral turpitude in advocating that doctrine.

I put this other question to him, whether it is not due from him to do one of two things, withdraw that charge before the public and the Senate, or lay before the Senate the evidence he has that I, a Senator sworn to support the Constitution of the country, am deliberately and morally guilty here of an indifference as to whether I violate that oath or not?

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator will allow me a word. I am sorry that the Senator takes the view that anything I said had a personal application to any individual Senator, and especially to him, for whom I have always had the greatest personal and political respect. I think I did use an expression something like this——

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me, I will read to him the precise expression which he used.

Mr. REAGAN. I shall be obliged if the Senator will read it.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator said:

I have no idea that the Senators who advocate this policy will pretend to answer this question, for I suppose it is a matter of utter indifference upon this subject as upon most others to them whether they violate the Constitution or sustain it, so that the policy which subserves their purpose can be carried out.

Mr. REAGAN. My purpose was not to characterize individual action, not to impute improper motives to individuals, but to characterize the policy of the Republican party. However, I fear that in doing so I used language not altogether justifiable, and I beg, so far as it may be liable to such construction, to withdraw that language.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I regret that the Committee on Finance have, while proposing a bounty on sugar, deemed it expedient to give that bounty on sugar from cane. It seems to me that while they have omitted any bounty on maple surgar they might also well have omitted to propose a bounty on cane sugar. It appears that the raising of sugar in Louisiana, according to the statements made by the chairman of the subcommittee, is not an industry of this country which upon correct principles of protection is entitled to assistance either by a duty on foreign sugar or by the bounty which is proposed by the committee.

As I understand the chairman of the subcommittee, the amount of sugar raised in this country is comparatively insignificant in quantity compared with the amount required for consumption. I understand further that it is the opinion of the committee that this industry is not making that progress which entitles it to protection, either by a high rate of sugar duties or by a bounty. While I shall vote in accordance with the judgment of the committee on this subject upon the principle laid down by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in the ontset of the discussion on this bill, I regret that they have proposed that a bounty should be given for the protection of cane sugar, which, according to their own showing, is an industry progress in which is not sufficient in this country to justify the care and fostering protection of the Government, which the Senators from Louisiana desire shall be accorded to it by a high rate of duty, while they oppose the bounty proposed by the committee.

Mr. STEWART. If the Senator will allow me, I suggest that he can relieve the Senators from Louisiana from the embarrassment of this bounty by moving to strike out "cane sugar" wherever it occurs in the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Nevada can make that motion if he sees fit; but I have stated my position upon the question, which is that upon this matter of detail I shall vote with the committee, although I regret that they are undertaking in this way to encourage the growth of sugar-cane for the purposes of making sugar when they admit that there is no probability that the industry will ever be a success in this country.

More than that, Mr. President, I regret that the committee, even if this were an industry worth protecting by a bounty, should insist upon protecting it against the opposition of the two Senators from the State in which the industry exists. It seems to me that if those Senators do not want this form of protection it should not be forced upon them. I can conceive of no reason for doing it, except that the Senate are of opinion that those Senators do not represent the people of their State. If they do not then possibly the Senate may wisely take notice of that fact and legislate in accordance with what they believe to be the desire of the people of Louisiana without regard to the wishes of their Senators. But unless that be the situation it is to me an anomaly in legislation upon the tariff question either to continue an unnecessary duty upon sugar or to insist when making a needed reduction in that duty upon giving a bounty on the production of sugar in a State against the wishes of the Senators from that State. It is also an anomaly in practical legislation to insist upon retaining an enormously high duty upon rice, a product of South Carolina, when the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] upon the floor of this Chamber has stated that he does not desire that the duty shall be retained.

There is another reason why I do not think that the sugar of Louisiana should be entitled to excessive care from the Government, and that reason is that the laborers upon the sugar plantations of Louisiana do not have the same advantages in the race for life that the laborers do in other sections of the country. Senators on the other side have had a great deal to say about duties protecting only the capitalists, and have contended that duties do not increase the wages of labor. There is one duty which I admit does not increase the wages of the labor of those engaged in making the product for the benefit of which the duty is imposed, and that is the duty on sugar, for reasons which I will endeavor to state.

Capital and labor, employers and employed, in the strife of life undoubtedly have perpetual contention with each other. The employer tries to get labor as cheap as he can. The laborer, the operative, the employé, tries to get as high wages as he can obtain. Both the employer and the employed in a free country, certainly in a free republic, can agitate and can organize, each class for its own benefit. Throughout the Northern States of this Union the operatives in our factories, the miners in our mines, and the wage-earners of all kinds can organize for their own protection. They have trades unions, they have Knights of Labor, and they have various other organizations of workingmen engaged in the great struggle of life, all endeavoring by these means to increase the share which shall come to them of the joint product of the capital of others and their own labor.

But, Mr. President, this privilege is not accorded to the negroes of Louisiana engaged in producing sugar upon the plantations of that State. When Louisiana Knights of Labor with black skins undertake to get a higher rate of wages from the sugar-planters the militia is called out and they are shot down by the white military companies. That is the way capital controls labor in the sugar State of Louisiana.

I desire to call to the attention of the Senate a letter which I have received, signed by Hugh M. Wallis, editor of the Terre Bonne Times, published at Houma, La. It is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE TERRE BONNE TIMES,
Houma, La., December 17, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Being persuaded that a correct and truthful account of some of the political outlawry on the part of the local Democracy of this parish will be of inestimable value to you and our friends in the Congress of the United States in preparing some way for the better protection of the lives and property of Republicans in this State, I am induced to trouble you at this time.

About one year ago there was a laborers' strike organized throughout several of the sugar parishes for an increased rate of wages, and the order known as the Knights of Labor led the strike. There was some rioting, in a small way, engaged in by some parties unknown, but to counteract any criminal acts upon the part of the strikers the governor of the State sent the military to several parishes, which overawed and subdued all opposition to the will of the planters, and the laborers were forced back to the plantations at the rates offered by said planters.

Then the persecutions of the laborers were begun by judicial process. Both white and black men were arrested upon charges of trespass, compelled to give unreasonable bond or lie in jail until the meeting of the court. These cases were brought before a grand jury the foreman of which was one of these self-same planters, and had been a very prominent figure in the persecutions, a leading Democrat of local reputation. True bills were found in every case for criminal trespass. The cases were put upon trial, a petit jury impaneled, and evidence introduced, and argument of counsel and charge of the judge delivered, and the case finally given to the jury for judgment. And, to the disgust and evident defeat of the persecutors, the jury brought in a verdict of "not guilty;" whereupon the planters and their sympathizers and tools formed a vigilance committee at once under the cover and protection of the State troops, bought guns and Winchester rifles with funds subscribed by the planters and other Democrats of this parish and of the city of New Orleans.

The vigilants proceeded at once to organize and dragoon the laboring people of the parish, and have continued their operations up to the present time. Under cover of this organization acts of intimidation and bulldozing were practiced before, during, and after the State election in April last. There was one colored man named Hampton killed by these vigilants on or about April 19, 1887, and the house of R. B. Johnson was fired into by the same gang on the same night, as the bullet holes in the doors and windows bear silent but certain evidence of the fact. Other houses, some three or four in number, were fired into in the night-time soon afterwards, and, fortunately, no lives were lost, but the owners and their families have been compelled to flee from the parish. Some dozen or so of colored Knights of Labor, all Republican, have been driven from this parish for the commission of no crime against the laws either of the State or the parish; and still no investigation by any authority whatever has been had, although these things are of public notoriety, known of all men.

Hon. RANDALL L. GIBSON, in his speech which is before me, says "that no one in Terre Bonne was injured, and that no such man as R. B. Johnson ever lived in this parish." Now, Mr. GIBSON must know that such an assertion as that can not be passed by without contradiction, as it is an untruth in whole and in every part. R. B. Johnson was a member of the State Legislature, in 1877, from this parish, during the contest for the governorship between Packard and Nicholls, and has lived here ever since, having a home in this town belonging to him. All of the other parties run out of the parish by threats to kill them and by shooting at them and their friends in their houses in the night-time have never returned, although several of them have property here.

At the last election for President and Congressman in this district and parish not half of the vote was polled by reason of frauds and intimidation. The Democratic leaders and their henchmen openly practiced their arts of bulldozing and intimidation upon the leaders of the colored Republicans by visiting them at their homes and threatening them with death in case they attempted to carry this parish for the Republican ticket. They did these things so openly this time that their names are known almost to everybody, and yet the grand jury impaneled just awhile ago failed to indict them for their crime. At last an attempt has been made to assassinate the editor of the Terre Bonne Times because he is a Republican and shows up the iniquities practiced by these same vigilants. On December 3, this year, such an attempt was made on us by three Democrats, local leaders and members of the campaign committee of their party, to get rid of us; but it failed. We have always stood up for Republican principles, and will continue to do so as long as we live; and the Times will continue to hold up to the public gaze such creatures for such scorn and contempt as they richly deserve. I suggest to you the passage of a new election law to enable Republicans to vote as they may wish; also, that you push your motion for an investigation of the late election in this State, as you will unearth a real political bonanza in the matter.

You are at liberty to use this letter in any way you choose. I have preferred not to burden it with the names of individuals who are known to me as criminal in these matters, but have stated facts that can be substantiated by indisputable evidence. If you think proper you can ask R. L. Gibson, Andrew Hero, jr., Governor Warmoth, H. C. Minor, or any other reputable gentleman in Louisiana, who Dr. Hugh M. Wallis, editor of the Terre Bonne Times, is. There is every incentive urging our friends to act and we hope you will not cease to urge your motion until success crowns your efforts.

Respectfully,

HUGH M. WALLIS,
Editor of Terre Bonne Times, Houma, La.

Hon. WILLIAM E. CHANDLER,
United States Senator from New Hampshire.

I will not in this discussion at this time——

Mr. GIBSON. As the letter alludes to me, will the Senator allow me to make an explanation to the Senate?

Mr. CHANDLER. Not until after I finish.

Mr. GIBSON. It will be very brief.

Mr. CHANDLER. I intend to be very brief myself and should prefer to have the Senator wait. If he wishes to ask me a question or to state any single fact I shall be glad to yield to him, but if he desires to make a speech on this general subject there will be plenty of time hereafter.

Mr. GIBSON. I only want to state two or three facts that will dissipate entirely the impression which the letter has produced upon the mind of the Senator.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have not finished all I desire to say, but if it will gratify the Senator to say now what he wishes to state with reference to this letter, I will yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. GIBSON. The letter just read to the Senate by the Senator from New Hampshire purports to have been written by H. M. Wallis, a resident of Houma, Terre Bonne Parish, Louisiana. It informs the Senator from New Hampshire that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] stated an untruth when he declared in the debate on the Chandler resolution last summer that he did not believe there was any such man as Johnson residing in Terre Bonne Parish, and that his own statement showed he had suffered no harm or injury on the occasion referred to. The letter also informs the Senator [Mr. CHANDLER] that there is a reign of terror in Terre Bonne Parish; that the strike which occurred there some months or some years ago was put down by the militia, and that the free will of the people had been suppressed at the recent election.

It is evidently the intention of the Senator from New Hampshire, by reading this letter to the Senate, to cast a slur upon me and upon the good people of the parish of Terre Bonne. I have been a resident of that parish since my childhood, and still own a plantation I inherited, situated about 20 miles from the village of Houma, which formerly produced large crops, yielding a net revenue of from twenty-five to fifty thousand dollars a year.

For many years past, with the exception of the main house and yard, the entire property has been in the possession and use of the former negro slaves. The colored people and some white people who have lived upon it occupied the houses, raised their cattle and their crops without paying a sou of rent or of the taxes.

So much for my contribution to the reign of terror in Terre Bonne Parish; so much for my oppression and denial of rights and privileges to my former negro slaves.

I have been a great deal absent from Terre Bonne Parish, and notwithstanding the statement of the Senator's correspondent, which it has pleased the Senator to parade before the Senate, with the view of perhaps wounding my feelings, I can say truthfully I never heard of the man alluded to in the letter. I have never heard his name mentioned except in the communications addressed to the Senator from Kansas and to himself. It is quite possible that I might make this statement without uttering a falsehood, for it is quite possible that such a man might live in Terre Bonne Parish without my knowing him.

I know many people in Terre Bonne Parish, and when I go to my old home, both on the plantation near the neighboring village, which the citizens have named in honor of me, Gibson City, and when I go to Houma, I have always been received with every mark of esteem, I may say friendship and affection. I did not know, until informed by the Senator from New Hampshire, that I had an enemy in my old parish or that there was any person in it who would characterize any statement I might make as untrue. Nor did I believe there was a Senator in this body who would so far forget decorum and good manners, which always mark the relations of gentlemen and which we have the right to expect from American Senators, as to read a letter, with the view to wound the sensibilities of an associate, from one of his political correspondents.

I remember some year or two ago (I can not fix the date) there was a strike on some of the sugar plantations in La Fourche and Terre Bonne, and I heard something about it on one of my visits to Louisiana. I heard that the district judges of La Fourche and Terre Bonne were exercising the powers of their office and their influence and standing in the county to endeavor to persuade the strikers from persisting in a course of conduct in violation of the laws. They had become the disturbers of the peace and put in peril life and property. The officers of the law interposed to preserve order and to vindicate the laws. No one was more active than the presiding judge, who is one of the leading Republicans of the State.

There was a militia company organized under the laws of the State in Terre Bonne Parish. It was organized, not for any political purpose, or to accomplish any political object, but for recreation and drilling and social entertainment, and to aid, if occasion should require, the civil authorities. The captain of the company is William J. Minor, a leading Republican. I have never heard of any outrage in the parish. It is true I am, as I before observed, absent a great deal; indeed, I visit the parish generally once a year, and then only for a few days at a time; but I have always had occasion to congratulate myself and my neighbors and friends, my fellow-citizens of that parish, upon the relations of confidence and kindness existing between the white people and the colored people.

It is a Republican parish in politics. The Republican party generally, indeed, I believe, always, carries the parish for both parochial and State officers.

The Republicans elected the members of the General Assembly in 1880, and again in 1888. The leading native Republican resides in the parish, and he is the largest planter in it. I refer to H. C. Minon. We differ in politics. He is a Republican and I am a Democrat, but we are neighbors and friends. I can say that he would be an honor to the Republican party in any State in this Union, and a credit to any community in which he might reside. A Republican parish, Republican office-holders, Republican members of Legislature, and yet the Senator would have the Senate believe a reign of terror prevails there, the voice of the people suppressed and the laborers robbed of their earnings.

How deeply the Senator's sympathies are excited for the wrongs of people at a great distance from his own home and people! How quickly he responds with remedies for all the grievances of these people so far away, while overlooking and neglecting opportunities for his sagacious and ample benevolence at home! I was surprised that any one residing in Terre Bonne Parish and in intimate correspondence even with the Senator from New Hampshire should have suffered himself to cast a slur upon me, but I was still more astonished to find a Senator who could descend to reading such letters to the Senate.

But, sir, the Senator feels that perhaps he has been commissioned by the good people of New Hampshire to offer reproach and opprobrium and insults to the good people of Louisiana, and that, devoting himself to the mission, he may receive proper reward. The Senator allowed himself to utter the declaration that the Senators from Louisiana do not represent the people of the State. I have no doubt it would suit the Senator better if he could appoint the Senators from that State himself, but meantime I suggest that he might employ his time to more advantage by looking after the election of the next Senator from New Hampshire.

Sir, let us examine the grounds of these extraordinary statements of the Senator.

My credentials show and the fact is that I received the unanimous vote of the Legislature of Louisiana, Democrats and Republicans, white and colored members. The first time I was elected to the Senate every member of the Legislature voted for me. At the election in May last there was but one vote in the General Assembly against me.

There were several candidates for the second place, but there was no candidate against me for the seat I occupy in the Senate. I was nominated and elected without opposition. I had no coalition, no compromises, no understanding. I had gone before the people of the State face to face from one end of the State to the other during six long months of the most extraordinary canvass that ever took place in Louisiana, and I confess I felt proud of their approval of my course as their Senator.

I have never heard the faintest whisper against the fairness of my election. There was no opposition at home. There was no complaint. Republicans and Democrats had alike extended the trust to me, had joined in conferring the honor. There was not a petition, not a complaint, not a contest, not a memorial of any kind from any citizen of that State, not even an affidavit was forthcoming at the bidding of the Senator from New Hampshire. There was absolutely nothing before the Senate excepting my credentials and the broad seal of the State, certifying my election without opposition to the Senate.

Under these circumstances it was reserved for the Senator from New Hampshire to offer a resolution—a resolution without a precedent in the hundred years of the existence of the Government—to instruct the Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate the conduct of the recent State election in Louisiana; not the election for Representatives in Congress, but the State election for State officers. And now he regales the Senate by reading a letter that may wound the sensibilities of one of his associates and cast odium upon the people of his State—create a false impression for political effect.

From my earliest boyhood I was taught to revere the Senate of the United States, and when I came here I expected to find it filled with gentlemen whose bearing and conduct would be in keeping with the august powers which the Constitution clothes this body with and the splendid traditions which have given it a foremost position among all the deliberative assemblies in the world, for dignity, decorum, learning, and wisdom. It will fall from this lofty position if Senators shall condescend to convert themselves into mere scavengers of scandal and seek not how best they may serve their country, but how best they can belittle their fellow-countrymen of the Southern States of the Union, sow the seeds of dissension, discord, and hate, and with what impunity they may violate the courtesy and candor due from one gentleman to another, and not less from one Senator to another.

Public life has not sufficient attraction for me to remain in it if the Senate shall decline upon the lower plane suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the general discussion of the question upon which the Senator has entered may well be deferred until the resolution for the investigation of the election in Louisiana in April last is taken up, and any difference on that subject between me and the Senator who has just spoken may be settled at that time.

Fortunately, as I now understand the Senator, he makes no objection to an investigation. On the contrary, he has offered in the Senate a resolution directing the Committee on Privileges and Elections to open up the whole subject of the condition of the suffrage throughout the United States. I welcome the Senator to the ranks of those who believe that the Senate of the United States, in order to preserve its own purity, its own integrity, in order to ascertain the regularity of the composition of the Senate, may investigate the condition of the suffrage in all the States, and when his resolution is amended by striking out its limitation to the three States of Louisiana, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts, I shall certainly give it my support, and hope it may receive the unanimous vote of the Senate.

By means of these investigations we shall find out to what extent the suffrage in the States of this Union is corrupted and to what extent votes are influenced by intimidation and political murder.

The Senator made reference to an anonymous letter. No anonymous letter has ever been used by me in the Louisiana discussion. The names of one or two correspondents have been withheld, but no anonymous letter has been read; and to-day, when I have produced to the Senator a letter bearing testimony to the murder of colored Knights of Labor engaged in making sugar upon these protected Louisiana plantations, I have given to him the signature to that letter, and the Senator from Louisiana has uttered no word in condemnation of the signer, Dr. Wallis.

The letter which the Senator says I would not have introduced into this discussion if I had shown a proper regard for the decorum of the Senate was also not an anonymous letter, but was signed by R. B. Johnson, and it was dated at New Orleans April 25, 1888. It was addressed to Maj. Andrew Hero, jr., of New Orleans, the Republican candidate in April last for lieutenant-governor, and a man who although a Republican is the peer of any Louisiana Democrat.

That letter makes a succinct statement of outrages in Terre Bonne Parish perpetrated by a gang of Democratic roughs under the lead of Mr. Tobias Gibson, a brother of the Senator. The letter was not introduced into the discussion by me first, but is to be found in a speech made on a previous occasion by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS]. All the answer the Senator from Louisiana has ever made to the distinct charges contained in the letter has been to say what Dr. Wallis recites, that "no one in Terre Bonne was injured;" that "no such man as R. B. Johnson ever lived in that parish."

Mr. President, I leave the further elucidation of the subject which the Senator has discussed at considerable length until the resolution for investigation is before the Senate, and I will come back to the precise point which I undertook to-day to make, and which is this: I do not believe that the Senate should undertake to foster the unnatural industry of the raising of sugar in the State of Louisiana by giving a bounty at this time, particularly when the Senators from the State repudiate the proposition to give the bounty and propose to vote against it, and when more especially there is no method by which the laborers upon the sugar plantations of Louisiana can get their fair share of the sugar product of that State, because whenever they agitate or organize for that purpose they are shot down by the Louisiana militia sent to the scene by the governor in order to demonstrate that whatever rights of organization laborers in the other States may have, the poor black sugar hands upon the plantations of Louisiana shall have no such rights.

Mr. President, in this discussion yesterday the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] made a singular statement, which I will read:

This supervision of the people over the exercise of the taxing power has been put into eclipse by the coming of the Senate between them and their constitutional rights. The three hundred and twenty-five Representatives of the people are distributed over the whole country in proportion to population, and their demand for the House bill is the demand of the majority of the whole people, while ten of the Senators who vote to destroy this bill of the people, by the people, and for the people represent fewer people and a smaller area of country than are contained in a single State of the Union. The simple reason why the people are not allowed to have the bill that does justice, even in stinted measure, to them is that the manufacturing industries of the United States are most largely under the care of those ten Senators, and they prefer a bill that is distinctively and carefully framed for the purpose of supporting those manufactories by the taxation of the people.

If the Senator from Alabama meant anything by these assertions he meant that in reference to this pending question concerning the Mills bill and the Senate substitute, the House of Representatives, which passed the Mills bill, stands at some advantage over the Senate, and that the House is entitled to some voice upon this question greater than that of its mere utterance expressed by the majority by which the Mills bill passed the House. He also seems to attempt to convey the idea that the Senate is seeking to express and enforce its views in some other way than by the majority vote of its members.

I must confess that I do not quite understand the point of the Senator from Alabama when he denounces ten Senators upon this floor, who exercise their power only through a final vote of all the Senators, as improperly standing in the way of the wishes of the people of this country because the House of Representatives has passed the Mills bill and sent it to the Senate for consideration.

Mr. President, I do not know to what ten Senators the Senator from Alabama alluded. If he meant the New England Senators, there are twelve. He does not specify. Assuming, however, that he meant the New England Senators, it has occurred to me to see how many voters of this country in the last Presidential election were behind the Senators from the six New England States, and how many voters were behind an equal number of Senators who are advocating the passage of the Mills bill. I have taken the State of Alabama, the Senator's own State, and the States of Delaware, Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, and Louisiana, all of which are represented by Senators who vote for the Mills bill and against the Senate substitute, while all the twelve Senators from the six New England States vote against the Mills bill and for the Senate substitute.

In the six New England States there were 444,645 votes for Harrison, 355,071 for Cleveland, and 19,897 for Fisk, making the total for President on the 6th of November last in the six New England States of 819,613 votes.

In the six Southern States mentioned there were 181,193 votes for Harrison, 424,523 votes for Cleveland, and 3,318 votes scattering, making a total of 609,034 votes, showing 210,579 votes less in the six Southern States which are casting 12 votes in this body in favor of the Mills bill than in the six New England States whose Senators are voting the other way.

The figures in detail are as follows:

States.	Harrison.	Cleveland.	Scattering.
Six Southern States:
Alabama	57,197	117,310	583
Delaware	12,973	16,414	400
Florida	26,659	39,561	403
Georgia	40,443	100,472	1,802
South Carolina	13,740	65,825
Louisiana	30,181	84,941	130
Total	181,193	424,523	3,318
New England States:
Maine	73,734	50,482	2,690
New Hampshire	45,728	43,358	1,592
Vermont	45,192	16,788	1,459
Massachusets	183,447	151,990	8,641
Rhode Island	21,960	17,533	1,281
Connecticut	74,584	74,920	4,234
Total	444,645	355,071	19,897

Total in New England States	819,613
Total in six Southern States	609,034
Excess in New England	210,579

And yet the Senator from Alabama stands up here to criticise and to condemn the Senators from New England because through the vote of this Senate, the majority vote of this whole Senate, varying from 2 to 12, all the propositions on the other side are voted down and the Senate stands by the American system of protection to American industries.

It may be said, possibly, that the six Southern States which I have selected did not, on the 6th of November last, cast their full vote, and it is lamentably true that they did not. There are included in this table the States of Louisiana and South Carolina, where the Republican vote is substantially suppressed, either by intimidation or by false counting. If, however, the votes of those six States had been lawfully increased last fall, as they might have been, until they reached the aggregate of the votes of the six New England States, the increased votes would not have been cast for Grover Cleveland, but would have been cast for Benjamin Harrison.

The Mills bill passed the House of Representatives by a vote of 162 yeas to 149 nays, being a majority of 13. A change of seven votes would have defeated the bill; seven changed votes would have passed a bill revising the tariff substantially as the Senate bill revises it. As the Senator from Alabama has set up the House of Representatives as entitled to represent the whole people as against the Senate, and has condemned the Senate, unduly influenced, he said, by these ten Senators, for refusing to adopt the Mills bill, I desire to call attention to the number of Representatives which the six New England States have upon the floor of the House of Representatives. They have twenty-six. The six Democratic States to which I have alluded have thirty-four Representatives in the House, giving a sufficient surplus over the New England States to account for the passage of the Mills bill, although last November when the people of the United States were passing upon this precise tariff issue there were 819,613 popular votes behind the twenty-six New England Representatives, and only 609,034 behind the thirty-four Democratic Representatives. The number of Representatives in the House from these respective States is as follows:

Number of Representatives in House.

Alabama	8
Delaware	1
Florida	2
Georgia	10
South Carolina	7
Louisiana	6
	34
Maine	4
New Hampshire	2
Vermont	2
Massachusetts	12
Rhode Island	2
Connecticut	4
	26

	Votes.
The districts represented by the 149 members who voted against the bill cast	4,629,424
The districts represented by the 162 members voting for the bill cast	3,816,022
Popular majority against the members supporting the bill	813,402
NORTHERN STATES—22.
The districts represented by 133 members voting against the bill cast	4,279,521
The districts represented by 60 members voting for the bill cast	1,921,863
SOUTHERN STATES—16.
The districts represented by 16 members voting against the bill cast	349,903
The districts represented by 102 members voting for the bill cast	1,894,159

I have prepared four groups of Congressional districts which have elected seven or more members of the present House of Representatives, and I find the result following:

	Total vote.
First Alabama district	4,220
Second Alabama district	5,659
Third Alabama district	4,662
Fifth Alabama district	6,333
First Arkansas district	6,092
Fifth Arkansas district	4,746
Seventh Kentucky district (W. P. C. BRECKINRIDGE's)	4,808

Making a total vote in this first group of 36,520 votes, which elected seven Representatives.

The second group I take entirely from the State of Georgia:

First Georgia district	2,078
Second Georgia district	2,411
Third Georgia district	1,704
Fourth Georgia district	3,239
Fifth Georgia district	2,999
Sixth Georgia district	1,723
Seventh Georgia district	6,680
Eighth Georgia district	2,377
Ninth Georgia district	2,366
Tenth Georgia district	1,944

Making only 27,520 votes cast in the ten districts of the State of Georgia.

The third group includes:

Fourth Louisiana district	5,759
Sixth Louisiana district	10,132
First Mississippi district	3,167
Third Mississippi district	6,900
Fourth Mississippi district	3,086
Fifth Mississippi district	4,316
Seventh Mississippi district	4,514

Making 37,874 votes only behind this third group of seven Representatives.

The fourth group is made up entirely from the State of South Carolina—seven districts in the State of South Carolina.

First South Carolina district	3,317
Second South Carolina district	5,235
Third South Carolina district	4,409
Fourth South Carolina district	4,470
Fifth South Carolina district	4,701
Sixth South Carolina district	4,469
Seventh South Carolina district	12,476

Making a total of 39,077 votes only in this fourth group of seven South Carolina Representatives, which constitute the majority that passed the Mills bill.

Now, note the contrast. In the second district of New Hampshire, in which I reside, there were cast (on the same election when all these Mills bill Southern free-trade Democrats were precipitated into the House of Representatives) 39,559 votes. Yet on this showing the Senator from Alabama stands upon this floor and claims that the House of Representatives represents the whole people of the United States, and that the Senate should bow to the popular will!

Mr. President, upon this whole subject the people of this country are learning many things. They are not only learning something upon the Southern question, but they are learning something upon the tariff question, and wherever there is a free and honest vote and a fair count, and wherever the influence of the rum power has not been felt at the polls, the Republican party has been gaining votes throughout the land.

There is progress that is not unhopeful even in the State of the Senator from Missouri. As we are to be gratified in the next Congress by having a Republican Senator from Delaware to help uphold the tariff system of the United States, in which no community is more interested than the State of Delaware, so it is not unlikely that many Senators now upon this floor may see a Republican Senator, a high-tariff Senator, here from Missouri.

The Republican vote in the State of Missouri has been steadily increasing. Garfield had 153,567 votes only; Blaine had 202,929, while Harrison had the magnificent vote of 236,253. The Democratic majority in Missouri is still quite large, but it is steadily declining. Hancock had 55,042, Cleveland 33,059 four years ago. Last fall he had only 25,701. The same tendency of the popular mind is visible in various other States, the Senators from which have championed the cause of a tariff for free trade, or "a tariff for revenue only," if they prefer to have that term used.

Take the State of Kentucky, which is represented by a Senator whom we all respect [Mr. BECK], now absent on account of sickness, who has labored so much here toward breaking down the American tariff system. The Republican vote in Kentucky was 104,550 in 1880. In 1884 it was 118,122; in 1887 Mr. Bradley had for governor 126,473, while Harrison had 155,134 votes. The Democratic majority during the three last Presidential elections has gone steadily down from 43,449 to 34,849, and last year to 28,666.

North Carolina is a State in which the Republican party is hopefully growing, where the people are rising up to gradually overcome the Democratic forces arrayed against the natural development of that State and in favor of a tariff for revenue only. The vote in North Carolina for Garfield was 115,878; for Blaine, 125,068; for Harrison, 134,784. The Democratic majority for Cleveland of four years ago was 17,884, while last fall it was only 13,118.

So I might challenge the attention of Senators to the growing Republican strength in Tennessee, West Virginia, and Virginia; and I believe that within the next four years, instead of the voice of the present House of Representatives, to which the Senator from Alabama has undertaken to ascribe so much potency, being re-enforced by the approval of the people, the Republicans in the Senate who stand for the protection of American industries will be re-enforced, as they have already been from Delaware, as they are likely, even, shortly to be from West Virginia, by the advent into this Chamber of several other Republican Senators from States which are now Democratic.

Mr. SPOONER withholds his remarks for revision. [See Appendix.]

Mr. EUSTIS. The Senator will allow me to supplement the information he has given with a brief statement.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly; but I am through.

Mr. EUSTIS. For instance, in the ten years from 1865 to 1874, inclusive, the product was 490,000 tons.

Mr. FRYE. For ten years?

Mr. EUSTIS. Yes, sir. For a like period from 1875 to 1884 it was 1,030,000 tons, an increase of more than 100 per cent. in a single decade. This supports the position the Senator from Wisconsin has taken——

Mr. FRYE. Can the Senator give the ten years from 1850 to 1860?

Mr. EUSTIS. I can not. This supports the position of the Senator from Wisconsin that it is not exactly fair to compare the statistics of a few years after the war with those previous to the war. There is no property which the war so devastated as the sugar crop.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me, I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana how he accounts for the fact that in 1877, in 1879, in 1880, and in 1881 the sugar crop was much larger than it was in 1887?

Mr. EUSTIS. That is owing to seasons.

Mr. ALLISON. Climatic influences?

Mr. EUSTIS. Climatic influences which we can not control by law. For instance the crop of 1887 and 1888, which produced 200,000 tons, is the largest crop that has ever been produced in Louisiana, except the crop just before the war.

Mr. SPOONER. While this has been a revenue duty, at the same time having been a protective duty to Louisiana, I want to call attention to these figures and then I shall have finished. Commencing with 1851 and ending with 1887, I want to show the vast disproportion of the Louisiana sugar crop to the imported sugar and the immense sum of money which the people of the United States have paid by way of duty upon imported sugars during those years. The total production in Louisiana during those years was 7,559,053,405 pounds. That was from 1851 to 1887. The total amount of sugar imported and used by the people of the United States during those years was 47,587,912,647 pounds, and the amount of money paid in the way of duties during those years was $961,318,340.30, or nearly a thousand millions of dollars.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I wish to add to the information which has been given to the Senate on this subject, and in pursuance of what I attempted to say yesterday, and which I was prevented by the Chair from doing, although my reference was to a former session of Congress and I supposed I had the right to refer to it as a historical fact, but I was prevented from doing so. Now I have the RECORD. I find in the RECORD of July 8 of last year an amendment offered by Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, to the tariff bill then under discussion. I will not read the whole amendment, but the section which has reference more especially to the matter now under consideration, to wit, a bounty to the producers of sugar in this country. I find in the last section these words:

On sugar, 2 cents per each pound of crystallizable sugar contained therein as ascertained by the polariscope.

On molasses, testing above 56 degrees by the polariscope, 6 cents per gallon; testing not above 56 degrees by the polariscope, 4 cents per gallon.

And the bounties provided for in this act shall be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe.

In discussing that amendment, Mr. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, used the following language, which I shall read for the purpose of correcting a misapprehension on the part of some of the Senators who have discussed this question, who have stated that under the operation of the law as it now exists the production of sugar has not increased in the State of Louisiana. I believe the Senator from Kansas made that the principal ground upon which he proposes to vote for this bounty system, that the Louisiana producers were sluggish and indolent, and had not availed themselves of the advantages which the people of this country had a right to expect from them. Mr. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, said upon that subject:

Now, my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was not quite candid when he said protection did not stimulate the production of sugar in Louisiana. Sir, war is the science of destruction carried into practice by nations. Louisiana is even now recovering from five years of war, during which her cane-fields were overgrown and her machinery and the buildings that housed it went to decay. Impoverished by war, ruined as the people of all the Confederate States were, their banks gone, their insurance companies without capital, their private fortunes exhausted, a people who had been making about 500,000,000 pounds of sugar per year found that in 1864-'65 they could produce but 10,800,000 pounds, though in 1861-'62 they had produced 528,000,000 pounds. Now, sir, beginning at the close of the war with wasted estates and fortunes broken, they have, under protection, raised the crop from less than 11,000,000 pounds to 303,000,000 pounds in 1882-'83. In the decade from 1867 to 1876, inclusive, they raised 1,121,000,000 pounds of sugar. In the next decade the 1,100,000,000 had grown to 2,297,000,000 pounds, or largely more than doubled in a decade. Sir, I would plant myself upon the record of Louisiana's sugar growing since the close of the war to prove the beneficence of the American protective system which gentlemen propose to set aside in favor of what the American people would not adopt for Hamilton and Washington and what they would not sustain if this House could be tempted to perpetrate the folly of trying to put the industries of the country under such a form of protection.

That is what this high and reliable authority on the subject of protection said in the House of Representatives on the 8th day of last July.

Mr. President, a friend has handed me a paper containing interviews with several of the gentlemen of the House of Representatives from the State of Kansas, which I will ask the Secretary to read, beginning with Mr. PETERS.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. PETERS, of Kansas: "I am not favorable to the proposition of the Senate Finance Committee to establish a bounty of 1 cent a pound on sugars produced in this country, in compensation for a 50 per cent. cut in the duties, because any cut in the rate of duty at present will retard the development of the sugar industry in my State. A large majority of the people of Kansas, including the sugar-men, favor protection by a duty. The people of Kansas are interested in this subject of sugar. The district I represent, the Seventh, is composed of thirty-seven counties in the southwestern portion of the State. Every Congressional township in these thirty-seven counties can raise enough cane to supply a $75,000 sugar plant. A plant of that size can work up each season 2,000 acres of cane, and 10 tons per acre can easily and surely be raised, or 20,000 in each township. One hundred pounds of the very best coffee 'C' sugar can be made from each ton of cane, and from 12 to 15 gallons of sirup.

"The price paid to farmers for a ton of cane is $2. It is, if anything, less expensive to raise than corn, and is a certain crop. Forty thousand dollars would therefore be paid to farmers in each township for the cane. The sugar product in each township would amount to 4,000,000 pounds, and the sirup product to 240,000 gallons. The sugar can be sold at the plant for 5 cents per pound, and the sirup is worth 15 cents per gallon for feeding to cattle and hogs.

"If we had the capital to erect a plant in every township, the sugar and sirup product of my district alone would, within three years, be of the value of $20,000,000 annually. So you can see to what an extent my people are interested in the sugar question. We have raised sorghum-cane for many years, mostly for feeding purposes. As we raised nearly a million pounds of sugar in the State last year we know that all we need to develop the industry is the money to put in the necessary number of sugar plants.

"I think a 25 per cent. cut in the duty on sugar with no bounty would prevent the growth of the sugar industry in this country. Speaking for my own State, we have not the money to establish sugar plants. We must look to the East for it, and any change in the present law will seriously impair our chances for securing it. Were the question to arise whether the sugar-men would prefer a cut of 25 per cent. in duty and no bounty, or a cut of 50 per cent. with a bounty of 1 cent per pound, I would say that I think they would prefer a cut of 25 per cent. and no bounty. In my opinion a discriminating bounty is unjust and dangerous.

"I do not think the House would adopt the Senate proposition if it was transmitted to it."

In answer to the question whether he thought the production of either beet, sorghum, or cane sugar could ever be profitable in this country, Mr. PETERS replied:

"I can speak only concerning the production of sugar from sorghum-cane, because I have no practical knowledge of the beet or tropical cane industries. It has been completely demonstrated in Kansas that under existing laws sugar can be profitably made from sorghum-cane."

Mr. PERKINS, of Kansas: "I think the proposition of the Senate committee would be reasonably satisfactory to the people of Kansas if it were not for the fact that capitalists are afraid of the bounty system, and do not like to put their money into enterprises that depend in whole or in part for their pecuniary success upon a bounty paid from the national Treasury. My own judgment, however, is that such a provision as the Senate committee proposes, making the bounty permanent and continuous for a period of twelve or fifteen years, and providing it can only be suspended by the affirmative act of Congress, would in the end give confidence to capitalists, and would do much to stimulate the sugar interests of the United States. I think the majority of our people prefer the protection by duty rather than by bounty, and yet I think the latter system would be accepted fairly well, as it would annually save to the consumers of sugars in the United States many millions of dollars.

"The people of Kansas are largely interested in the subject, as they have much faith in the recent experiments made in the manufacture of sugar, and they generally believe that in a very few years their State will be one of the great sugar-producing States of the Union, if not the largest, and because of this I think they would prefer the bounty system in part to an actual reduction of 25 per cent. of the present protection.

"I think it is very doubtful whether the House will accept any bill that passes the Senate, but if the two Houses can agree upon the other provisions of the bill I believe they can agree upon provisions relative to sugar.

"In conclusion let me say that this year Kansas has grown and manufactured more than 1,000,000 pounds of good sugar and forty car-loads of sirup. New works will be erected during the coming season and more seeds planted than ever before, unless some unfavorable legislation is enacted."

Mr. TURNER, of Kansas: "I am heartily in favor of the Senate Finance Committee's proposition, provided, of course, that such a bounty would not be subjected to the caprice of each Congress. In my opinion a bounty of 1 cent per pound would be just to all interests concerned. There is no doubt that the production of sugar from the cane in this country is profitable and that it can be made still more so. Why, last year a factory in Topeka, Kans., declared a dividend of 9 per cent., and our State is thoroughly interested in the development of the industry. The manufacture of sugar in the United States is still in its infancy. I think that at this time it would be unfair to make a reduction of even 25 per cent., with no bounty, in the duties on imported sugars, and that such a cut will be unfair until such a time as the industry is so far developed as to equalize all the advantages gained by experience. The sugar-men would prefer a cut of 50 per cent. in duty with a bounty of 1 cent per pound to a cut of 25 per cent. in duty and no bounty. Bounties are as fair a means of developing industries as any other method. Those who oppose bounties are simply prejudiced against them. In my opinion the House would adopt the Senate proposition if it was submitted to it."

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas, said he thought the proposition of the Senate committee was unwise and unjust to the industry. He was confident that sugar could be profitably produced in this country, and that we could produce enough to supply our home consumption within the next fifteen years, if Congress shall do its duty. He fears that a 25 per cent. cut in the tariff with no bounty might have the effect of discouraging investment of capital. The sugar-men, in his opinion, would be satisfied with neither a 25 per cent. cut and no bounty nor a 50 per cent. cut with a bounty. He was opposed to bounties on general principles, but thought that all the Republicans of the House would accept the Senate proposition rather than vote against the bill.

Mr. FUNSTON, of Kansas: "The sugar-men of Kansas do not want a bounty in compensation for a 50 per cent. cut in duties. You ask me if a 25 per cent. cut in duty with no bounty would prevent the growth of the sugar industry in this country. I answer that it would not prevent it, but that it would retard it. The sugar-men do not want a cut of 25 per cent. in duty and no bounty, neither do they desire a cut of 50 per cent. with a bounty of 1 cent a pound. They want the present duty. These bounties are a humbug and always have been. There is no excuse under the sun for making sugar an exception to the general protective system. Nothing will be done in this Congress in regard to sugar any way."

Mr. MORRILL, of Kansas: "I approve the proposition of the Senate Finance Committee. The effect of such a bounty will be more direct than that of a tariff. It is my impression that the sugar-men of Kansas prefer the bounty, because, as I have said, the protection is more direct. I can not say whether a 25 per cent. cut in duty, with no bounty, would prevent the growth of the sugar industry in the United States or not. The great factor involved is that of labor. I believe that in the development of new industries bounties are a great stimulant. They should only be continued, however, for such a period as is absolutely necessary to protect the industry. It is my opinion that if submitted to it to-day the House would reject the Senate proposition in regard to the sugar question.

"The production of sugar in this country can be made profitable. Kansas is much interested in the development of this new industry, especially in the southern and western parts of the State. Plants for the manufacture of sugar are being established. There is no section of the State in which sorghum can not be grown at little expense. Beets are not so certain."

Mr. FELTON, of California: "I think the Senate proposition would be acceptable to the beet industry of California and the Pacific coast, provided the continuance of the annual payments of the bounty should cover a period of, say, ten years. I will add, however, that in my opinion the people of the Pacific coast prefer the duty to the bounty. I think a cut in the duties of 25 per cent., with no bounty, would materially interfere, if not prevent, the development of the beet-sugar industry in this country. It is too great a cut to leave a profitable margin under the present conditions of the industry. Of course the sugar-men would prefer a cut of 50 per cent. with a bounty of 1 cent a pound, rather than a cut of 25 per cent. in duty and no bounty. In regard to bounties I may say that I am opposed to the principle which underlies them. I very much doubt if the House would adopt the Senate proposition if it was transmitted to it.

"In my opinion the production of beet-sugar (I know nothing about sorghum and but little of cane-sugar) in the United States can not only be made profitable, but that the industry is capable of great development, and that at no distant time the manufacturers of this product will be able to supply the country. I think I am justified in making this statement from the results of last year's operations in this industry in California. Sixteen thousand tons of beet-sugar was produced in one locality, the percentage of saccharine juices being a little less than 12 per cent."

General VANDEVER, of California: "I think the people of California prefer a bounty to the duty. In my opinion the bounty would best give the industry the impetus which it needs."

Mr. BUTLER. The gentlemen whose views are here given are, I believe, all Representatives from Kansas and California, some dissenting from the principle of the Senate bill and some thinking perhaps that it would afford the necessary protection. I assume that these interviews are authoritative, and therefore I have taken the liberty of having them presented to the Senate.

The amendment of the Senate Finance Committee proposes—

That until April, 1900, there shall be paid to the producer of sugar testing not less than 80 degrees by the polariscope, from beets, sorghum, or sugar-cane grown within the United States, a bounty of 1 cent per pound, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe.

I differ with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] entirely in regard to the views he has expressed as to the power of Congress to give a bounty to any agricultural industry, and I can not discover why it would not be as competent, according to his theory, for Congress to give a bounty of $5 a head to every man who raises beef in this country; why it would not be as competent for Congress to give a bounty of $3, or $2, or $1 a head for every sheep raised in this country, or $1 for every hog raised in this country.

The Senator puts his advocacy of this bounty upon the ground that it is in aid of a languishing industry; that the sugar industry has not advanced under the high protective tariff which has heretofore existed and to which he gives his assent; that it is solely upon the ground that it is a languishing industry, and that he desires to protect and support and build it up by giving a bounty of 1 cent a pound on sugar.

Mr. SPOONER. I know the Senator wants to represent me correctly.

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. My argument was based, so far as the question of expediency was concerned, upon the statement that it was a new industry so far as beet sugar and sorghum sugar are concerned.

Mr. BUTLER. It is a new industry so far as beet and sorghum are concerned, but the Senator will not claim that it is a new industry so far as the production of sugar is concerned.

Now, take the Senator's own view of it, if that be true. Suppose it is a new industry; admit that in five years from this time they may come into Congress and say that the industry has not prospered under your 1 cent bounty, and they want 2 cents, or want 3 cents, or 4 cents. Suppose the beef industry in this country should languish, as I am told it is languishing now, why have not the cattle-raisers of this country the same right to come to Congress and demand of us, upon that principle and upon that theory of taxation and legislation, that the agriculturists of the West and Southwest shall have for every head of beef cattle raised a bounty of $5? I can not for the life of me see the distinction. So if I were prepared to admit the constitutional power of Congress to grant this bounty (which I do not admit), I say as a matter of policy it is vicious and unjustifiable beyond measure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator from South Carolina a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly; I will yield to any one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the act of Congress of the 16th of February, 1792, which provided for giving a bounty of one and one-half dollars a ton upon small fishing vessels, and of $2.50 a ton on larger ones, and so on, in order, as I suppose, to encourage the fishery interests of the United States; and I ask him how he distinguishes in point of constitutional authority this act passed in the time of Washington and Jefferson and Madison and the other fathers of the Republic who made the Constitution and the bounty now proposed?

Mr. BUTLER. Well, Mr. President, I do not think that one wrong of that kind will justify the repetition of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course not.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not believe even at that time, as construed by the gentlemen to whom the Senator from Vermont refers, there was a constitutional right or power to make that bounty. I do not believe they had it then, and I do not believe we have it now.

There is much in what the Senator from Wisconsin said as to the past construction of the Constitution, one school of statesmen in this country insisting upon what he chooses to call a strict construction of that instrument and the other school insisting upon a more latitudinarian construction, if I may use the expression. I was very happy to hear the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] say that it was no longer a sectional or a party question, and he cited the opinion of a very distinguished gentleman from south of the Ohio River in support of the construction which he put upon the general-welfare clause, to which I have never assented and can never give my assent. Whilst I have very great respect for the opinion of that gentleman upon general subjects, I can not subscribe to the view which he took of the general-welfare clause. My theory upon the subject is that the general-welfare clause relates entirely to such subjects as are within the grant of powers delegated to the Congress of the United States under the Constitution. Congress may legislate, within the limits imposed by the Constitution, for the general welfare of the people of the United States, and I think we may just as well claim that there is no restraint whatever upon Congress, that a majority may pass any act which in its judgment is for the general welfare, in absolute and utter disregard of the written Constitution under which this Government is administered, that there are no restraints imposed upon the will of the majority, but that if that majority should regard one system of legislation as conducive to the general welfare, it may enact it into law. That seems to me to be the logic of that position.

So, Mr. President, if we take the view which the high protective people of this country take, there is no justification whatever for this bounty of 1 cent a pound on sugar. It has been demonstrated again and again that in the first place it will not afford the protection claimed by those who entertain that view.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to interrupt the Senator just long enough to state, if he will allow me, the ground of public policy upon which this proposed bounty is made.

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly I yield.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator asks, why should we not put a bounty upon cattle and upon other agricultural products? The idea of those who propose this bounty is that having tried for a century what effect high protective duties (to use the Senator's own language) have on the production of sugar, we find that it has been a failure. Finding that sugar is an absolute essential of civilized human life, and enters into the consumption of every household, and that we pay to foreign countries from $100,000,000 to $130,000,000 annually for sugar, increasing every year, it was believed that it was a wise thing to test the experiment of whether or not by stimulation, as a question of broad public policy, we could produce this necessary article of human life in this country.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator will permit me there——

Mr. ALLISON. That is the ground upon which this is placed.

Mr. BUTLER. That being the ground on which the committee have reported this provision in the bill, will the Senator from Iowa be good enough to explain to me and to the Senate and to the country how it is that he can extract that 1 cent a pound bounty to accomplish what he insists has not been accomplished by a high protective tariff? I should like very much to get at the process by which the Senator reasons out a result different under this method from that resulting under a high protective tariff.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. Now, may I ask the Senator the question which he has not explained; and that is what difference there is between the method of paying a bounty directly and the method of paying a bounty indirectly, as he suggests the present tariff does? I ask him if there is any difference.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator does not answer my question. I put a question to him. I am sitting at his feet for light, and he puts a question to me as to the very information I asked of him.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well, I will give the Senator the answer.

That is the reason which operated on the minds of those who favor this bounty. They believe that if you can place before the people who are so situated as to be able to produce sugar, either from sorghum or beets, that they will have a definite and distinct sum for each pound of sugar thus produced, it will encourage them to make the necessary expenditure which they have not hitherto made without it. Now, if the Senator wants my individual view, I will repeat what I said yesterday, that in my belief with this bounty it will be a slow process.

I want to say another thing, if the Senator will allow me, partially in response to the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. I do not believe that it would be a fair and just disposition of this matter to confine the bounty to the production of sugar from beets and sorghum and not extend it also to the sugar from cane, which is a competing industry with sugar from sorghum and beets. Therefore I am not willing to grant a measure of encouragement to the production of sugar from sorghum and beets that I would not be willing to grant to those who are engaged in the production of sugar from cane.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, according to the Senator's own statement let us see where he finds himself. He says that he proposes to make this experiment—because it is an experiment according to his own admission—with practically a new industry upon the theory and upon the ground that the high protective-tariff duties have not developed it as rapidly with Louisiana sugar-cane as was expected and anticipated in this country.

Mr. ALLISON. One moment. I did not say "anticipated." It is absolutely impossible to develop it from sugar-cane.

Mr. BUTLER. Then, according to the Senator's own admission, the high protective-tariff duties have not been tested in regard to the protection of sugar from beets and sorghum. How, therefore, can he sustain the proposition that he proposes to change the high import duties to a bounty in order to encourage a new industry, which he himself admits has never been tried in this country?

Mr. ALLISON. That is only a partial thing. I propose in connection with that to save to the people who consume sugar in this country the difference between the present rate and the proposed rate; and also, if the Senator will allow me, to give the people an opportunity to use more sugar, because it has been thoroughly demonstrated that where sugar is a free product it is consumed much more largely by the people than it is where it is a heavily-taxed product.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely.

Mr. ALLISON. And if I may be pardoned for alluding to that subject, when sugar was made free in Great Britain, from that time forward steadily the consumption of sugar in Great Britain increased, so that it is now about 73 pounds per capita as compared with 54 or 55 pounds in our own country.

Mr. BUTLER. Then the object, as I understand the Senator from Iowa, is not for protection. It is not for protection that you offer this bounty instead of high protective duties, but to save money for the consumers in this country.

Mr. ALLISON. For both purposes.

Mr. BUTLER. Both purposes. For the purpose of protection and for the purpose of saving money to the consumers of sugar. That I understand to be the proposition of the Senator now.

Mr. ALLISON. It is for the purpose of endeavoring to secure, if practicable, the development of the sugar industry of this country and to see if it is practicable to produce sugar here for our own consumption.

Mr. BUTLER. Then the Senator abandons the protection theory and doctrine, in a measure at least, and throws himself upon the question of economy to the people of this country.

Mr. ALLISON. I am not dealing with little catch-words about what I am stating respecting this thing, and I trust the Senator from South Carolina is not.

Now, I should like to ask him, if he will allow me, as he has the floor——

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask him if he is in favor of protecting the industry in this country engaged in the production of sugar beyond the protection given to any other industry in this country, or a protection equal to the protection of any other industry?

Mr. BUTLER. I tell the Senator very frankly that I am not; and I tell the Senator with equal frankness that my position upon this subject is that where it is necessary to raise $300,000,000 revenue it is the duty of Congress in common fairness and common honesty not to select any one, two, or three articles of consumption and strike them down and pile your tariff up on others not so circumstanced.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask another question?

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to go a little further.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. BUTLER. I would adjust the duties for the purpose of raising revenue for the economical administration of this Government, with protection as an incident of that adjustment of the tariff, in contradistinction to the position which I understand the majority of the Committee on Finance to occupy of making protection the object and revenue the incident. I say to the Senator that I would so adjust the tariff that, if protection flowed from it, I should not only not complain but should rejoice at it. But why the committee should have selected the two agricultural products of sugar and rice and cut them down 50 per cent. and raised the tax on other commodities of equal consumption in this country is something that I have not been able to comprehend.

Mr. President, I will say further to the Senator that, instead of my having any feeling of hostility to any Northern manufacture, as indicated by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], in the votes that I have given and shall give upon this bill, I feel the profoundest interest in the development of every section of the Union without regard to localities, and I would vote as promptly and as readily, if the duties were adjusted as I think they ought to be adjusted, to give the manufacturers of Iowa and New England the same benefits that I would claim for the industries in my own State. The Senator from Wisconsin must not assume, because it is not true, that a high protective tariff or any adjustment of the tariff relates to industries north of Mason and Dixon's line. He must not assume, because it is not true, that Pennsylvania and Ohio and Wisconsin are the only States in the Union that produce iron. He must not assume that the New England States and New York and Ohio are the only States in this Union interested in the development and encouragement of cotton manufactures, because that is not true.

But I have never been able to comprehend, and neither the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] nor the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has explained to my satisfaction, why it is that they take an agricultural product in two or three States of this Union, to wit, rice, and cut that 50 per cent., strike that down, and destroy it according to their theory, and almost——

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator desire an answer?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALDRICH. The duty upon sugar has never been advocated or defended by any single Senator on that side of the Chamber upon any other theory than that it was a purely revenue duty, in this discussion nor in any other which I have listened to.

Mr. BUTLER. My position on that subject is this: I think the tariff on sugar as it now stands is too high, I will say to the Senator very frankly, but I would justify my vote for that duty on the ground that of every $10 collected from that duty $9 go into the Treasury of the United States and but $1 into the pockets of those who claim to be protected by it. I put it upon that ground.

Mr. ALDRICH. Precisely; and that corroborates what I stated, that it is advocated and defended upon that side of the Chamber simply as a revenue duty; and in 1883——

Mr. BUTLER. As a revenue duty with incidental protection. But how can the Senator justify the provision in this bill which increases the tax on cotton-ties to 100 per cent., runs it up from 35 to over 100 per cent. in the interest of perhaps half a dozen manufacturers of hoop-iron in one section of this country when not one dollar of the increased duty will go into the Treasury of the United States, but eight hundred thousand or a million dollars will go into the pockets of those manufacturers? How does he justify that?

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator desire an answer?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then I will answer the Senator. The duty which we propose to place upon cotton-ties is a protective duty for the purpose of the encouragement of an American industry and to better reward American labor. The duty upon sugar is a pure revenue duty, laid upon an article which is a necessity of life, and it is the purpose of this bill, in accordance with the message of the President of the United States calling the attention of Congress to the excessive revenue, to reduce the revenues of the United States, and we say that the revenue can not be reduced any better than upon this article of prime necessity.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator says it is a protective duty.

Mr. ALDRICH. The duty on cotton-ties is a protective duty.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it not prohibitory? Will it not be prohibitory?

Mr. ALDRICH. On cotton-ties?

Mr. BUTLER. On cotton-ties, upon which it is raised from 35 to 100 per cent.?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not think it is prohibitory. I do not think the Senator from South Carolina has any warrant for saying that it will be prohibitory. It is the same rate of duty which is imposed upon other gauges of hoop-iron.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator says he thinks 100 per cent. on an article used by twelve or fifteen or twenty millions of the American people will not be prohibitory.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will point the Senator to an article with 113 per cent. duty used by sixty-five millions of people that is not prohibitory, and the article is raised in the Senator's own State.

Mr. BUTLER. Rice! Oh, Mr. President, the ghost of rice always appears to haunt the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. And it will remain to haunt the Senator from South Carolina, too.

Mr. BUTLER. Let the Senator from Rhode Island make a fair proposition in regard to rice, and not manifest that hostility to rice which he does not show to industries in another part of this country and I will meet him on half-way ground.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator will see that the Senate bill proposes to place a rate of duty upon rice of 45 cents a bushel, rice being raised in South Carolina, Georgia, and Louisiana, and it proposes to place the rate of duty on beans raised in the Northern States at 25 cents a bushel.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, I understand that.

Mr. ALDRICH. And beans contain more nutriment than rice and are of more value in a family. Now, can the Senator say that we have treated the industries of the South differently from those of the North? Yes, we have. We have given the two industries of the South, to which the Senator has alluded, greater protection than any other agricultural items in this bill. That is the way we have treated them.

Mr. BUTLER. That is not the question, and I deny that proposition, and the Senator has not met the point that I made in regard to cotton-ties, and I could select a hundred others if I had time.

The claim of the Committee on Finance is that it is their intention or their wish or their purpose to reduce the revenues. They claim that the revenues are too high with $100,000,000 of surplus in the Treasury, and it must be reduced; and yet they take two articles, and instead of making a reduction proportioned to the present duty, as they have on other articles, they cut them down 50 per cent. and then say that there is no discrimination and that still the duties are higher.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. Their bill not only does not decrease the duties on a great many articles of staple production but increases them.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely; and then the Senator says, because I have made some complaint about this enormous reduction of the rice tariff, that is not true, that still rice is more highly protected than any other commodity in this country, in the face of the fact that it has been demonstrated over and over and over again in this debate that you have increased the duty in certain regions and localities and strike at these two, claiming at the same time that your object is to protect American industries!

The Senator from Rhode Island put a question to me the other day. He asked me if I thought the rice planters and the rice laborers in the South could get along without a protective tariff; in other words, if they could compete with the cheap labor of India in the production of those articles? I tell the Senator that my position upon that subject is simply this: Not only can they compete with the labor of any part of the world, civilized or uncivilized, in regard to rice, but I have such an estimate of, I have such confidence in, the ingenuity, in the industry, in the capacity of the American mechanic and laborer that I believe he can compete successfully with any people upon the face of the earth in any department of industry.

Mr. ALDRICH. How as to sugar?

Mr. BUTLER. I think, perhaps, he may with sugar, and I have not selected sugar or rice, and I take no stock in the idea that the American laborer may not compete successfully with the laborer of any part of the world.

Mr. President, I have discovered during the progress of this debate that whenever any act of iniquitous legislation is attempted to be justified gentlemen cross the Atlantic Ocean and seek that justification in the economic laws of the monarchies of Europe; notably the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], the other day, referring to the practices and laws of Germany in regard to sugar bounties, justified them upon the ground that Germany and France had granted bounties, and therefore the United States Government might grant a bounty. The German Government is essentially a paternal government, and Germany may do a great many things which would not be justified under our form of government and under our system of laws. France and Belgium and England may do a great many things which would not be justified in America.

I have also discovered that when a justification is sought for increasing the duties we are told by gentlemen from the New England States that the profits of manufacturers are not greater than the lowest rates of interest in this country; that it is a great fallacy, a mistaken idea, that the manufacturers of this country are making money and piling up immense sums in fortunes and monopolies, but that, instead of being profitable, they are in many instances barely self-supporting, making a very small percentage on the investment of the capital. If that be true—and we must assume that it is true, because honorable gentlemen tell us so—under the high protective-tariff system that we have had, if manufactures have ceased to be profitable under the high protective system, would not the dictates of common sense, to say nothing of common honesty, require that we should change that system, liberalize our tax laws, start out upon a new venture, experiment, as the Senator from Iowa says in regard to this bounty, and see if by the exercise of common business principles each individual, each corporation standing upon its own basis, unaided, unsupported by the Government, would not make more satisfactory progress? But the Senators who advocate this system say no; the profits of manufacturers have gone down under the operation of the high protective system; therefore we must go to the Government of the United States, to the Treasury of the United States, to the pockets of the tax-payers of the United States and re-enforce and supplement and build up the languishing manufactures of this country, and when that is done perhaps for five or ten or fifteen or twenty years and manufactures again languish, go to the Treasury, go to the tax-payers again and demand with a "stand-and-deliver" policy an increase of taxation to encourage American industries and increase the wages of American laborers.

I have observed another thing, Mr. President, that when it suits our friends on the other side to rely upon the opinions of the great founder and expounder of the American system, as he named it, they quote from Mr. Clay to support their propositions, omitting to mention the fact, which is a fact, that the very foundation-stone and basis of Mr. Clay's advocacy of a protective system for America was that it protected Americans against the protected industries of England. He put it upon the ground that, whereas England had a high protective tariff, it was necessary for the development of American industries that the American people should construct a parallel against the citadel which England had erected around her industries; and he put it upon that ground alone, as I have understood.

It has been asserted again and again in this debate that the effect of a high protective tariff was to increase the wages of American laborers, to protect them against the pauper labor of Europe; and Senators cite Germany, they cite France, they cite Belgium, as examples to be followed in the matter of tax laws, and in the next breath they depict in pathetic language the squalid, depraved condition of the European laborer, brought about by what means? I had heard so much of that, that when two years ago it was my good fortune to visit the continent of Europe I went with my eyes and my ears open, expecting to find on every hand, in every direction, among all classes of the laborers of Germany and Belgium and England and France, squalor, degradation, poverty, ignorance, and vice. I had some regard to their condition, in traveling through those countries, and I have never seen in this or any other country what appeared to me to be a more contented set of debauched, degraded people than I found upon the continent of Europe.

I had been told that in Belgium and in Germany they degraded women and worked them in carts by the side of a dog, that they were disregarded, degraded; and the first scene that greeted my eyes after landing upon the American shores was to witness four or five poor Irish women in free America, where labor is so happy, so prosperous, as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] told us the other day—to see four or five poor Irish women on their knees scrubbing in a restaurant for the bread of life. Poverty, Mr. President, is everywhere——

Mr. FRYE. Washing the floors, the Senator means.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir; scrubbing.

Mr. FRYE. Horrible!

Mr. BUTLER. It was horrible. When I had heard my friend from Maine depict in such eloquent language the condition of the laboring people on the other side of the water, I did not suppose they ever were called upon not only to wash a floor—if we had listened to the eloquent speech of the Senator from Maine we would suppose they all lived in fine houses and arrayed themselves in linen and silks——

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like to ask the Senator whether they do not wash their floors in South Carolina, and whether every family can hire a servant; and, if so, who is that servant, because some degraded person must do it?

Mr. BUTLER. That may appear to be very smart to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is.

Mr. BUTLER. Extremely smart! But he can not get rid of that fact by attempting to interject a ridiculous and stupid remark to me, and it would be more becoming, if the Senator will permit me to say so, to admit the fact, which was denied by the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] the other day, that there are poor people in New York. That Senator said there were no poor people in New York; no poor people at the North. I have ridden by the mile and the hour in the great cities of the North and have seen the poor people with their heads hanging out of the windows of narrow tenement houses gasping for breath; and yet the gentlemen say there are no poor people there!

Senators are not going to lead me aside by the absurd inquiry whether people wash floors in South Carolina. I expect they wash them about as often as they do in Connecticut, and perhaps a little oftener. It is true that we have poor people there who do that work. There is no doubt about that, and the Senator from Connecticut is belittling the argument. Whilst I do not mean to intimate that he is intentionally misrepresenting the condition of things, he and other Senators do misrepresent when they say that all the pauperism and all the poverty and all the pauper labor in the world are to be found on the other side of the water, and that this system of legislative robbery—an expression which does not seem to be entirely agreeable to gentlemen; of course I do not mean it personally——

Mr. CHANDLER. Perfectly agreeable.

Mr. BUTLER. What did the Senator from New Hampshire say?

Mr. CHANDLER. It is perfectly agreeable.

Mr. BUTLER. "Perfectly agreeable." The Senator from New Hampshire has a very singular way of manifesting his delight and pleasure, and he has a very curious way of allying himself with robbers, if that is agreeable. The pretense that this system of what I call legislative robbery elevates all American laborers, that they are all happy, that they all live in fine houses, that there is no want, no poverty, but all are taken out of the domain of poor people by high taxation, which increases the cost of their living 47 per cent. on every $100 they pay for the necessaries of life——

Mr. ALDRICH. They pay 82 per cent. on sugar.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, sir, let it be 82 per cent. they pay on every pound of sugar, if you please, or on rice 100 per cent. I say to the Senator from Rhode Island that that is legalized robbery and a wrong to the poor people who have to pay it.

Senators quote Mr. Clay as authority on the high protective system. Let us see what Mr. Clay said upon that subject in the great speech he made in the House of Representatives in 1824:

> The great desideratum in political economy is the same as in private pursuits; that is, what is the best application of the aggregate industry of a nation that can be made honestly to produce the largest sum of national wealth? Labor—

Says Mr. Clay—and this is Mr. Henry Clay, if the Senator from Colorado will take notice, and not Mr. C. C. Clay, of Alabama.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator give the date of that speech?

Mr. BUTLER. Eighteen hundred and twenty-four.

> Labor is the source of all wealth, but it is not natural labor only; and the fundamental error of the gentleman from Virginia, and of the school to which he belongs, in adducing from our sparse population our unfitness for the introduction of the arts, consists in their not sufficiently weighing the importance of the power of machinery. In former times, when but little comparative use was made of machinery, manual labor and the price of wages were circumstances of the greatest consideration. But it is far otherwise in these latter times. Such are the improvements and the perfections in machinery that in analyzing the compound value of many fabrics the element of natural labor is so inconsiderable as almost to escape detection. This truth is demonstrated by many facts.
> Formerly Asia, in consequence of the density of her population and the consequent lowness of wages, laid Europe under tribute for many of her fabrics. Now Europe reacts upon Asia, and Great Britain in particular throws back upon her countless millions of people the rich treasures produced by artificial labor, to a vast amount, infinitely cheaper than they can be manufactured by the natural exertions of that portion of the globe. But Britain is herself the most striking illustration of the immense power of machinery. Upon what other principle can you account for the enormous wealth which she has accumulated and which she annually produces? A statistical writer of that country several years ago estimated the total amount of the artificial or machine labor of the nation to be equal to that of one hundred millions of able-bodied laborers. Subsequent estimates of her artificial labor at the present day carry it to the enormous height of two hundred millions. But the population of the three kingdoms is 21,500,000. Supposing that to furnish able-bodied labor to the amount of four million the natural labor will be but 2 per cent. of the artificial labor. In the production of wealth she operates, therefore by a power (including the whole population) of two hundred and twenty-one million five hundred thousand, or, in other words, by a power eleven times greater than the total of her natural power.

Mr. President, apply that principle to this country, multiply sixty millions by eleven, and you will find in this country that machinery has been so much improved over the day to which Mr. Clay refers that we have a capacity of six hundred millions of natural laborers in America to-day, and I suppose it would be as fair to apply that proposition to this country, even with emphasis, as that Mr. Clay should have done it in 1824 to Great Britain.

So I repeat that with the wonderful, marvelous, unheard-of advance made in labor-saving machinery in this country the manual or the natural labor is almost imperceptible in estimating the compound of the fabrics produced. Therefore I think it is a legitimate argument and a safe assumption to say that we can compete, in view of this wonderful advance in machinery, with any people on earth in any department of industry, and at the same time furnish to the laboring classes of this country equal or better wages than they now get under your high protective-tariff system.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield?

Mr. BUTLER. For a question.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the Senator if he does not lose sight of the fact that these improvements in machinery are also in the possession of the people of other countries? Our patents come in use there, and we utilize theirs here. So really this matter of labor-saving machinery is practically out of the account.

Mr. BUTLER. Nothing like it.

Mr. BLAIR. Much of our machinery in the manufacture of cloth, for instance, comes to us from abroad.

Mr. BUTLER. There is no comparison in that regard between this country and Europe.

Mr. BLAIR. I think the Senator is laboring under a mistake.

Mr. BUTLER. Not at all.

Mr. COKE. I will suggest to the Senator from South Carolina, if he will permit me, that the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], when he was Secretary of State, in one of his reports stated that the United States were twenty-five years ahead of the most favored nation in Europe in labor-saving machinery.

Mr. BUTLER. And I think the Senator from New York was entirely within bounds when he made that statement; and it is a fact, I believe, admitted on all hands, that the American mechanic, the American laborer with his machinery will do at least one-third more work in the course of a day than a similar class of workmen in Germany or in Belgium or in England.

Mr. BLAIR. With the Senator's permission, I will simply say that as I understand this matter the chief superiority of American machinery over that of foreign countries is in the direction of improvements in agricultural machines. I do not understand that in the manufacture of cloth or of cotton or of woolen or hosiery, or any of the great departments of manufacture which clothe the body or protect the body from the elements, our labor-saving machinery is better than that of Great Britain, which is our principal competitor. In fact, a great deal of our machinery comes to us from Great Britain, and much of our machinery has been invented on our own soil by the inventors of that country, and there is an interchange taking place between the two countries with reference to many improvements. So I do not think the statement of the Senator from New York, if he made it in that broad way, is correct, that in the matter of labor-saving machinery on the whole we have much advantage of Great Britain.

Mr. REAGAN. If the Senator from South Carolina will allow me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAGAN. The senior Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], when Secretary of State in 1880, after examining the consular reports, in his report to the House of Representatives assumed the great superiority of American manufactures; and Mr. Blaine, when Secretary of State in 1881, after a similar examination of the reports of consuls, in his report to the House of Representatives gives our superior machinery and the longer length of hours of labor as the reason why we could compete successfully in cotton manufactures.

Mr. BUTLER. I have never heard that proposition contradicted before. All the literature that I have been able to get hold of on that subject conceded that the American mechanic and the American laborer have outstripped the world in invention, in capacity for production. Take the article of shoes alone, made in Lynn, Mass., which, I believe, is one of the chief points for the manufacture of shoes, the American shoemaker with the improved machinery he has will make one-third more shoes than the English mechanic. The American works more hours, he gets his work out better and quicker than the Englishman, as I have been informed; and so it is in all the departments of industry.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will bear with me a moment further——

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. The difference between the man, between the human operative or agency in production in this country and in the Old World, the superiority of ours, has always been admitted as the result of the matter of education, to which, I believe, I have on one former occasion alluded incidentally.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, I have heard that frequently from the Senator.

Mr. BLAIR. I think a few Congresses since I had occasion to look into that, but not recently.

So far, however, as machinery is concerned, made use of in the textile fabrics of the two countries—I am comparing now our own country to Great Britain because we are the chief competitors—I do not understand that there is any marked superiority on the part of American machinery. In fact, on the contrary, a great deal of our machinery is invented and is appropriated by us from Great Britain herself, and, as I have said before, there is an interchange of inventions and improvements, and in the very nature of things no such proposition as that which I understand the Senator to be contending for can be true, because it is only a week between these two countries, and the competition for the market of the world will necessarily result in their making use in England of every improvement which we have in this country, while, on the other hand, we do precisely the same thing with reference to the improvements made in Great Britain—and there is nothing to prevent it; inevitably it must be the case. The statements that are made here in this way I do not understand to be applicable to the manufacture of textile fabrics at all.

Mr. BUTLER. Then the effect of the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire, if he be correct, is that the American laborer is inferior to the English laborer?

Mr. BLAIR. Not at all. The American laborer does not work as many hours as the laborer in Germany.

Mr. BUTLER. Why, Mr. President, according to all the statistics the reverse is true.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator is quite mistaken except, it may be, as to the Southern States. The laborer works from ten to twelve and fourteen to fifteen hours in the factories of the South, and so the women work, but they do not in the North, and so the children work down to ten, nine, or eight years of age; and by the utilization of child-labor and the great length of hours, and by the operatives, quite the equal of the North, and in many respects the superior of the Northern operative, the manufacturers of the South do have a great advantage in that respect. But take the operative of the North with his ten or nine or eight hours' labor, as the case may be, and he does not, as a rule, give as much time to his work as is given in the old country.

Mr. GIBSON. Does the Senator refer to Louisiana?

Mr. BLAIR. I am not aware that they have manufactures to any extent in Louisiana.

Mr. GIBSON. We have cotton manufactures.

Mr. BLAIR. At what point?

Mr. GIBSON. At New Orleans.

Mr. COKE rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators must address the Chair. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. I yield to the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE].

Mr. BLAIR. I will say, if the Senator will permit me on that point, that my statement was made from personal observation, witnessing the labor itself as it was occupied in Georgia and some other points in the South. I know nothing of Louisiana.

Mr. COKE. I desire to read what I have heretofore quoted in the Senate from the report of Mr. EVARTS. In a letter written by Hon. WILLIAM M. EVARTS, then Secretary of State, and now a distinguished member of this body from New York, dated May 17, 1879, transmitting the reports of American consuls on the state of labor in Europe, the honorable Secretary, in an enumeration of his conclusions drawn from the reports, on page 36, says:

> 9. That the average American workman performs from one and a half to twice as much work as the average European workman. This is so important a point in connection with our ability to compete with the cheap manufactures of Europe, and it seems on first thought so strange, that I will trouble you with somewhat lengthy quotations from the reports in support thereof.

He then proceeds to make the quotations to sustain his conclusion fully by the proof.

Mr. BLAIR. That does not conflict with what I stated. I was speaking of the comparison of machinery, the precise point which the Senator from South Carolina raised. I have not said that the American workman was not superior.

Mr. BUTLER. Why, Mr. President, I have never heard it contradicted before, not only that the American laborer, the American mechanic, was superior to any other in the world, but that he worked longer, that the output of his labor was greater, that his product was greater, and that, therefore, we have always insisted, when a comparison is made between the wages paid to labor in Europe and in this country, that they deserved and were entitled to better wages here, because of their greater number of hours of labor and because of the superiority of their work and the quantity of the output of their labor.

I believe if you reduce the hours of labor for the American laborer, and if you reduce the product of American labor to that of Great Britain, or Belgium, or Germany, it will be found that the laborer in Great Britain gets wages equal to those paid in this country.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. Has the Senator's attention been called to this point, as to whether the wages in Europe is larger or smaller per product, that is by units of production, by the yard or by the piece, than it is in this country; that is, whether it costs the American manufacturer more in labor to have a certain piece of work done than it costs the manufacturer in England for the same sort of work?

Mr. BUTLER. I understand not. I was just stating that, in my opinion, if the hours of the American laborer were reduced to those in Great Britain or in Belgium or in Germany, and if his daily or weekly or monthly product was reduced and put on all fours with theirs, it would not cost the manufacturer in this country more than it does in Europe.

Mr. COKE. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that I have here an extract from a report of Mr. Blaine, made when he was Secretary of State, which shows that in the manufacture of cotton, English wages, judged by the product of English labor as compared with the product of American labor, are at least as good as those paid for American labor.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir. I remember that statement of Mr. Blaine when he was Secretary of State, and I have referred to it.

Mr. BLAIR. I know I am intruding somewhat, but if the Senator will allow me, I ask, are there any reports, and is it claimed that there are any facts stated or propositions laid down in any of these reports to the effect that the wages received for a day's work by the European operative, whether in England or upon the Continent, are equal to those received by the operative in this country? I understand that there are none. In the matter of sustenance the English operative needs to eat three times a day; he needs food, shelter, and clothing, precisely as the American operative; whereas, as a matter of fact, I understand that the American at the end of his day's work will have his dollar and a half, while the Englishman will have only his dollar, and that the expense of living is no greater here than there, probably less.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not understand that to be true. On the contrary, the cost of living in this country is very much higher.

Mr. BLAIR. I think the Senator is wrong.

Mr. BUTLER. The cost of living is very much higher in America than it is in Europe, and it has been made so by reason of the very system of taxation which the Senator himself advocates, because it puts a tax upon everything that the American laborer consumes for himself and his family, and necessarily the expense of living must be higher.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will pardon me, does he not see that everything which is eaten and drank by the American laborer must be cheaper here than abroad? We export those same articles of food, paying the additional cost of transportation across the water to those same English populations. As I understand it, the expenses of living are cheaper, averaging the whole, in this country than there, when everything is of the same quality.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator forgets that although this country does export quite a large quantity of what might be termed the food products of England and Great Britain, it is by no means the entire food product they consume that we export. The Argentine Republic is today sending in refrigerating ships thousands and thousands of carcasses of beef and sheep and swine to Great Britain.

Mr. BLAIR. We ourselves sell in competition with them.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely, and that is what I complain of in behalf of the American farmer. The product of the American farmer is sold in competition with the product of the cheap labor of South America and of India, and yet when he comes to buy his supplies he must pay 47 cents in every dollar's worth that he buys under the high tariff imposed by the American Congress. That is exactly what I complain of.

Mr. BLAIR. But the Senator has raised altogether a new issue, and he has evaded the point which was at issue between us.

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. The question was as to the relative cost of the necessaries of life in this country and in England. The fact that we sell those same necessaries of life in England in competition with the products of South America, or that we are able to sell those products there at all, paying the cost of transportation between here and England, shows that the cost of those commodities in our own country is no greater than there. That is the point. The Senator does not reach that point by returning to his other favorite one of the abuses that the agriculturists may be suffering under.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not see the force of the Senator's argument, for he says that a large proportion of the food product of Great Britain is brought into that country from the cheaper labor of the countries of South America and of India in competition with ours. As a matter of course that must bring down the price of those commodities in England. It must make them cheaper.

Mr. BLAIR. That is all I claim.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no doubt myself that in point of fact the cost of the absolute necessities of life is cheaper in Great Britain than in America to-day. I am confident of that because I have made a personal test of it. I think it will not be denied by any Senator or any man who has crossed the water that so far as woolen clothing is concerned, and every article necessary to protect a man and his family, it is from at least 25 to 30 perhaps, or 40 per cent. cheaper in Belgium, Germany, and Great Britain than in this country. I think there is no doubt upon that subject.

Therefore I say that I have a right to assume that the cost of living in Great Britain, or in Belgium, or in Germany is as cheap or cheaper than it is in this country. The laboring people of Great Britain pay no taxes. The entire revenues of that government are raised from income and succession taxes, and from import duties upon a very few articles, and excise taxes. What are called the common people pay no taxes in Great Britain; but there is not an American laborer, as I have stated, who does not for every $100 that he spends contribute $47 of it to somebody, in some instances into the Treasury of the United States, but in the majority of instances into the pockets of the capitalists who manufacture the articles he has to buy.

Mr. HAWLEY rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will answer the Senator more at length some other time. I do not care to ask the question now.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. HAWLEY. I was going to ask a question, but I drop it for the present.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to be permitted by the Senator from South Carolina to say that I have taken great pains to investigate the facts in regard to the particular statement he has just made, and that an American laboring man who with his wife and children earns $1,467 a year, supposing the man to have a family of five children, the man and the three oldest children to work in a woolen factory, the wife to stay at home and the two youngest children to be in school, and expend between $1,100 and $1,200 for their support in a pretty reasonably comfortable style of living, do not pay $50 a year all told more for the necessaries and comforts of life for which they expend their money by reason of the existence of a protective tariff, and they receive this $1,467 against about $830 which persons employed in precisely the same occupations in England get. So the tariff gives to those laboring men an increase in income of over $600 at an increase of expense, deciding every question of doubt in favor of the expense, of not more than $50. I do not believe as a result of my examination that the excess in expense is $15 a year.

Mr. BUTLER. Of course I take the Senator's statement for just what it is worth. I have no doubt he believes just what he says; but if he will pardon me, I prefer to take the statement of the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] when he was Secretary of State, and the statement of Mr. Blaine when he was Secretary of State, to the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts on that subject. I say that by universal admission the average tariff tax in this country is 47 per cent. ad valorem in the entire list; that if the laborer to whom the Senator from Massachusetts refers buys a blanket he pays about 60 per cent. tax; if he buys a coat he pays perhaps 50 per cent.—I do not remember the exact ad valorem duty; if he buys sugar he pays 82 per cent., according to the statement of the Senator from Rhode Island; if he buys and consumes rice he pays about 100 per cent., and if he buys shoes he pays a certain per cent. I say it is a legitimate inference that in buying the average articles of consumption which a man wants in this country out of every hundred dollars he pays $47 of it in the form of taxation.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if he does not see that there is a broad distinction between the case of sugar, where the price is not brought down by home competition, and the case of these other things, where there is a large home conpetition?

If the Senator will pardon me one moment, I will state how the statement which I made was prepared. I got a very intelligent and able man who is acquainted with such matters, a book-keeper in a large establishment, who has been a student of this subject, to take a considerable number of operatives in the Hamilton woolen mills and other woolen mills in the town of Southbridge.

After getting from these men the expenditure for different articles to which their family expenses would extend, including not only $25 a year for pew-rent, but $10 a year for attending lectures, and including a certain sum for contributions to charity and various things, and then submitting the list of the things which they had paid out their money for to several butchers and grocers and other persons of whom they were bought, the result which I got was obtained. The Senator will see, of course, that in the matter of house-rent, the matter of flour and of meat, and a thousand other things of that sort, the protective tariff does not affect them at all.

I wish simply to add one fact. I know I am trespassing on the good nature of the Senator.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. HOAR. I wish simply to say that that statement which I have made was made, I suppose, many times to audiences of workingmen in my own Commonwealth who knew all about the substantial facts, and it never was questioned in a single instance by friend or foe.

Mr. BUTLER. We have heard a good deal about the effect of competition in reducing prices. I observe that Senators are very glib in introducing that feature of the argument whenever they are met with a proposition such as I have submitted; but I have the high authority of the Senator from Rhode Island in his admission yesterday or the day before that the consumer would pay the additional cost which would result from the tax proposed to be put on imported tin. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] shakes his head. I understand the Senator from Rhode Island to admit that the increased cost would come out of the consumer.

Mr. ALDRICH. In the first instance.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Rhode Island says, "In the first instance." Take it in the first, or second, or third, or fourth, or fifth instance, so it comes out of the pocket of the man it does not matter to him.

Mr. ALDRICH. Until the American manufacturer reduces the price.

Mr. BUTLER. Until the American manufacturer can by competition reduce the price.

Mr. GEORGE. By a trust.

Mr. BUTLER. By a trust, as is suggested by the Senator from Mississippi. I have never heard of such beneficence on the part of any manufacturer; and I do not complain of them. They are getting their profit which the laws of Congress permit them to get. I am not complaining of the manufacturers; I am arraigning the system of laws which makes such a thing possible in this country, where the laws are at least supposed to be, and are intended to be, or were intended by the founders of the Government to be, equal and just and uniform.

It is of that I complain, and it will not do when a proposition is made for Senators on the other side to get up and say "You are another; labor is so and so in Massachusetts, or in New York, or in Ohio." That may be true, but labor is so and so in South Carolina, and it is much less. That does not answer the argument. It is not a legitimate reply to a proper argument, if I am making one, to say that you are another, and that there is a bad condition of things in your State, or in somebody else's State.

But, Mr. President, I have occupied the floor much longer than I expected or intended. I wanted to read another extract from Mr. Clay's speech. It was in that day important to increase the revenues of the Government, and his argument was met by the proposition that if you increase taxation you will diminish the revenue, and the public debt can not be paid. Mr. Clay replied to that by saying that the increase of duties on imported goods would have the effect of increasing the revenue. Without troubling the Senate to read that portion of his speech, I will claim the right to insert it in my remarks. Mr. Clay said:

The fifth objection to the tariff is, that it will diminish the public revenue, disable us from paying the public debt, and finally compel a resort to a system of excise and internal taxation. This objection is founded upon the supposition that the reduction in the importation of the subjects on which the increased duties are to operate will be such as to produce the alleged effect. All this is matter of mere conjecture, and can only be determined by experiment. I have very little doubt, with my colleague [Mr. Trimble], that the revenue will be increased considerably, for some years at least, under the operation of this bill. The diminution in the quantity imported will be compensated by the augmentation of the duty.

* * * * * * *

Customs and an excise agree in the essential particulars that they are both taxes upon consumption and both are voluntary. They differ only in the mode of collection. The office for the collection of one is located on the frontier, and that for the other within the interior. I believe it was Mr. Jefferson, who, in reply to the boast of a citizen of New York, of the amount of the public revenue paid by that city, asked who would pay it if the collectors' office were removed to Paulus Hook, on the New Jersey shore? National wealth is the source of all taxation; and, my word for it, the people are too intelligent to be deceived by mere names, and not to give a decided preference to that system which is based upon their wealth and prosperity, rather than to that which is founded upon their impoverishment and ruin.

But according to the opponents of the domestic policy, the proposed system will force capital and labor into new and reluctant employments. We are not prepared, in consequence of the high price of wages, for the successful establishment of manufactures, and we must fail in the experiment. We have seen that the existing occupations of our society, those of agriculture, commerce, navigation, and the learned professions, are overflowing with competitors, and that want of employment is severely felt. Now, what does this bill propose? To open a new and extensive field of business in which all that choose may enter. There is no compulsion upon any one to engage in it. An option only is given to industry to continue in the present unprofitable pursuits or to embark in a new and promising one. The effect will be to lessen the competition in the old branches of business and to multiply our resources for increasing our comforts and augmenting the national wealth.

The alleged fact of the high price of wages is not admitted. The truth is that no class of society suffers more in the present stagnation of business than the laboring class. That is a necessary effect of the depression of agriculture, the principal business of the community. The wages of able-bodied men vary from $5 to $8 per month, and such has been the want of employment in some parts of the Union that instances have not been infrequent of men working merely for the means of present subsistence. If the wages for labor here and in England are compared they will be found not to be essentially different. I agree with the honorable gentleman from Virginia that high wages are a proof of national prosperity; we differ only in the means by which that desirable end shall be obtained.

But if the fact were true that the wages of labor are high, I deny the correctness of the argument founded upon it. The argument assumes that natural labor is the principal element in the business of manufacture. That was the ancient theory. But the valuable inventions and vast improvements in machinery which have been made within a few years past have produced a new era in the arts. The effect of this change in the powers of production may be estimated from what I have already stated in relation to England, and to the triumphs of European artificial labor over the natural labor of Asia. In considering the fitness of a nation for the establishment of manufactures we must no longer limit our views to the state of its population and the price of wages. All circumstances must be regarded, of which that is perhaps the least important. Capital, ingenuity in the construction, and adroitness in the use of machinery, and the possession of the raw materials are those which deserve the greatest consideration.

All these circumstances (except that of capital, of which there is no deficiency) exist in our country in an eminent degree, and more than counterbalance the disadvantage, if it really existed, of the lower wages of labor in Great Britain. The dependence upon foreign nations for the raw material of any great manufacture has been ever considered as a discouraging fact. The state of our population is peculiarly favorable to the most extensive introduction of machinery. We have no prejudices to combat, no persons to drive out of employment. The pamphlet to which we have had occasion so often to refer in enumerating the causes which have brought in England their manufactures to such a state of perfection, and which now enable them, in the opinion of the writer, to defy all competition, does not specify, as one of them, low wages. It assigns three: First, capital; secondly, extent and costliness of machinery: and, thirdly, steady and persevering industry.

Notwithstanding the concurrence of so many favorable causes in our country for the introduction of the arts, we are earnestly dissuaded from making the experiment and our ultimate failure is confidently predicted. Why should we fail? Nations, like men, fail in nothing which they boldly attempt, when sustained by virtuous purposes and firm resolution. I am not willing to admit this depreciation of American skill and enterprise. I am not willing to strike before an effort is made. All our past history exhorts us to proceed, and inspires us with animating hopes of success. Past predictions of our incapacity have failed and present predictions will not be realized.

I think this proposition of a bounty to be paid to the sugar-planters of this country is wrong in principle and wrong in policy. The Senator from Wisconsin must not assume that the Louisiana sugar planter is alone interested in it. The people of Kansas, the people of Minnesota, of California, of every State in the American Union are interested in the fair adjustment of the tax on sugar. In my own State the sorghum of which we have heard so much, from which such satisfactory results have been procured in Kansas, grows to great luxuriance, and south of the parallel of latitude in which I live two crops of it in one year can be grown. It would be a great boon to the agriculturists of that part of the country if some system could be devised by which they could diversify their crops and abandon, what I have always insisted was an evil practice, the concentrating of their energies and their capital in the cultivation of cotton alone.

In the alluvial lands along the Savannah River, where corn crops of 50 or 60 bushels per acre have been destroyed three years successively by floods, sorghum cane could be grown almost without limit. Instead of 10 or 12 tons per acre, which I understand is the average crop in Kansas, I believe that those rich lands would make 20 or 25 tons, and the crop would not be injured or destroyed by the high water.

So it is not the people of Louisiana alone, or of Kansas alone, who are interested in this question. I want to see the duty so adjusted that equal and exact justice shall be done to all parts of the country, not alone to Louisiana or to Kansas; and if Congress can agree upon a rate of duty which will effectuate the results claimed by the committee as desirable, to wit, the reduction of the surplus in the Treasury, and at the same time afford protection to these industries, not only will I support it cordially, but I shall be rejoiced to see it become a law.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I have not taken part in this debate on the general principle of the tariff this winter. It has been a subject of discussion for the American people now for many years. It occupied to the exclusion of all other business the great part of the attention of the House of Representatives, and later of the Senate at the last session, and it was thoroughly argued before the great tribunal of the people, which rendered its judgment at the recent election.

But the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] the other day read to the Senate some testimony, taken before a commission in Massachusetts, of one or two persons of whom nobody here, so far as I know, knew anything, undertaking to give a wretched picture of the condition of the working people in the cotton industries of the important city of Fall River. Fall River is a rapidly growing center of cotton manufacture in this country. It already has, I suppose, more than fifty cotton factories and a population approaching 65,000 or 70,000 persons. Undoubtedly that cotton industry under decent protection will be increased very largely during the next ten years. Measures are already taken for the building of new and large mills.

I have requested my honored friend, the Representative from that district, who lives in that city and is largely interested in its industries, to obtain from a trustworthy source, a manufacturer and manager of mills of large experience, a few statements which I think will utterly and entirely overthrow the supposed facts introduced by the honorable Senator from Texas. Without detaining the Senate at this hour in the evening with any further remarks, I desire to have the letter read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

FALL RIVER, MASS., January 16, 1889.

DEAR SIR: Below I hand you list of wages paid by the Shove Mills:

Weavers:	Per week.
8 looms	$9.50
6 looms	6.50
Mule-spinners	11.00
Frame-spinners (girls)	4.68 to 6.24
Speeder-tenders (women)	6.50 to 8.50
Spooler-tenders (girls)	4.50 to 5.70
Card-grinders	8.52
Card-strippers	6.60
Slasher-tenders	10.08
Doffers, mule-room (boys)	4.62
Doffers, frame-spinners' room (boys)	4.00
Back boys	3.00
Laborers	7.50
Section hands, weaving-room	9.42
Second hands	10.50

We think the above list is about the average for the city. Mule-spinners will earn in some of the mills that have long mules about $13 per week.

During the last ten years we have run full time, except during the years 1884 and 1885, when we were shut down for four and eight weeks, respectively, owing to the overproduction or underconsumption of our style of goods. This applies to all the mills in this city, except ten, that were shut down during the year 1884 by a strike of the mule-spinners. This lasted about three months. There has not been a strike of any magnitude since that time.

We employ in the cotton mills of this city about 19,000 operatives, men, women, and children; about 7,000 of these are weavers, and 800 are mule-spinners; the balance are divided among the various departments.

We have on deposit in our institutions of savings about $11,800,000. There is no record kept as to the occupation of the persons that deposit, but we are informed by the treasurers that a very large part of the deposits are made by the operatives of our mills.

The Shove Mills employ about 600 hands; of this number 215 are under twenty-one years of age and 385 over twenty-one years. We had the overseers make a careful canvass of the mill as to the number of persons that owned their own home, with the following result: Real-estate owners, 103; real-estate owners and members of their families employed, 167.

So that more than one-fourth of our employés live in homes of their own. We do not think the average for the city would equal this showing, but very many of the homes in this city are owned by the workers in our cotton mills.

If there are any other points that we can give you, should be pleased to do so.

Yours, truly,

C. C. ROUNSEVILLE, Treasurer.

Dr. R. T. DAVIS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think my honorable friend from Texas can cite an instance on the face of the earth, unless it be in the manufacturing communities which have grown up under the American protective system, which can present a picture like that which these simple statistics afford. I do not think he can find an instance on the face of the earth where there is a body of 19,000 wage-earners, outside of the United States of America, so large a proportion of whom receive these comparatively large wages and so large a proportion of whom are dwellers in houses which they own.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] from the Committee on Finance, to insert what has been read on page 86 after line 57.

Mr. VANCE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ALDRICH answered to his name.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the amendment may be read.

Mr. HOAR. I do not object to the amendment being read, but I desire that the rule that after a Senator has answered to his name there shall be no further debate may be enforced after the amendment is read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

Mr. CALL. I withdraw the request for the reading. I did not know that it was the same as the printed amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. I shall be willing that debate be regarded as closed, but I should like myself to hear the amendment read, if it is not voluminous.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY On page 86, after line 57, it is proposed to insert the following additional sections:

SEC. —. That until April, 1900, there shall be paid to the producer of sugar testing not less than eighty degrees by the polariscope, from beets, sorghum, or sugar-cane grown within the United States, a bounty of 1 cent per pound, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe.

The producer of said sugar to be entitled to said bounty shall have first filed with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue a notice of the place of production, with a general description of the machinery and methods to be employed by him, with an estimate of the amount of sugar proposed to be produced in the next ensuing year and an application for a license to so produce, to be accompanied by a bond in a penalty, and with sureties to be approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, conditioned that he will faithfully observe all rules and regulations that shall be prescribed for such manufacture and production of sugar.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, upon receiving the application and bond hereinbefore provided for, shall issue to the applicant a license to produce sugar from sorghum, beets, or sugar-cane grown in the United States at the place and with the machinery and by the methods described in the application; but said license shall not extend beyond one year from the date thereof.

No bounty shall be paid to any person engaged in refining sugars which have been imported into the United States, or produced in the United States upon which the bounty herein provided for has already been paid or applied for, nor to any person unless he shall have first been licensed as herein provided, and only upon sugar produced by such person from sorghum, beets, or sugar-cane grown in the United States. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall from time to time make all needful rules and regulations for the manufacture of sugar from sorghum, beets, or sugar-cane grown in the United States, and shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, exercise supervision and inspection of the manufacture thereof.

The bounty herein provided for, including the expenses incident to the payment thereof, shall be paid from the duties collected and paid into the Treasury on sugars imported into the United States, and a sufficient sum for said purpose is hereby appropriated, and shall be paid annually from the duties so collected, such appropriation and payment to continue until the 1st day of April, A. D. 1900, and no longer.

SEC. —. That any person who shall knowingly refine or aid in the refining of sugar imported into the United States or upon which the bounty herein provided for has already been paid or applied for, at the place described in the license issued by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and any person not entitled to the bounty herein provided for who shall apply for or receive the same, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall pay a fine not exceeding $5,000, or be imprisoned for a period not exceeding five years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. CALL. It was my intention on the pending amendment to make some observations on the subject of the proposed bounty, but at the request of numerous Senators who desire a vote to be taken this evening, and as what I should say would not change the result of the vote, I will postpone making my observations until morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll-call will be resumed on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The Secretary resumed the call of the roll.

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN].

Mr. CHACE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

Mr. EVARTS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], and therefore can not vote.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], who is absent from the Senate this evening. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. The Senator from Iowa has inadvertently already voted, as he informs me. I therefore transfer my pair to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] and record my vote "nay."

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BLODGETT]. If it is necessary I will announce once more that if he were here I should vote for the committee's bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GRAY. I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. If he were present, I should vote "nay." I presume he would vote "yea."

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], who is necessarily compelled to be absent for a few minutes. If he were present, I should vote "nay," and he would vote "yea."

Mr. PUGH. I will transfer my pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], and record my vote "nay."

Mr. MANDERSON. I have a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], so that both the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] and myself can vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GRAY. Being released from my pair by the transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. HOAR (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM], but inadvertently voted. I desire to withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts withdraws his vote.

Mr. HALE. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is paired with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM], who is absent, and I am paired with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. I suggest that we let the senior Senator from North Carolina be paired with the junior Senator from Kansas, and that we both vote.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. COCKRELL. I vote "nay."

Mr. HOAR. I vote "yea."

Mr. COCKRELL. I will announce that the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] is paired with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]; and that the senior Senator from North Carolina would vote "nay," and the junior Senator from Kansas would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 23; as follows:

Mr. PAYNE presented petitions of the German Church and the First Presbyterian Church, of Cleveland, Ohio, and a petition of the Presbyterian Church, of Sandusky, Ohio, praying for the passage of a national Sunday-rest law; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. HAMPTON presented a petition of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, of Florence, S. C., praying for the passage of a national Sunday-rest law; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. EVARTS presented petitions of citizens of New York City, Sterling, Waverly, and Clintondale, in the State of New York, praying for the passage of a national Sunday-rest law; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of citizens of Port Angeles, Washington Territory, praying that Port Angeles be made a port of entry; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HAWLEY presented a communication from the Secretary of War, inclosing certain papers in support of a bill to place Robert Williams, now a sergeant of ordnance stationed at Vancouver Barracks, on the retired-list as a sergeant; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. VANCE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3321) to incorporate the Washington and Great Falls Narrow-Gauge Railroad Company, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3111) to incorporate the trustees of the National Industrial Institute in Washington, D. C., reported it with amendments.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 787) to protect innocent purchasers of patented articles, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. GRAY. In connection with the report just made by the Senator from Connecticut, as I am a member of the committee, I wish to state that I may object to some of the provisions of the report just made, and may ask leave to present a minority report, if I should think it necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That right will be reserved, if there be no objection.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GRAY introduced a bill (S. 3841) granting a pension to Hepza Hobson Werden; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLATT introduced a bill (S. 3842) for the relief of Charles G. Merriam; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 3843) granting a pension to Clara Leigh Freeborn; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PALMER introduced a bill (S. 3844) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a railroad bridge across the Detroit River; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. PALMER. I desire to state that I do not wish to be considered as being committed, even by implication or inferentially, to the bill one way or the other by introducing it. I introduce it by request. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

FORLORN HOPE STORMING PARTY.

Mr. COCKRELL. On the 3d day of January I reported, by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, the bill (S. 1140) authorizing the Secretary of War to procure and present suitable medals to the survivors of the 'forlorn-hope storming party' of Port Hudson, and submitted a written report thereon. The report has been printed so badly, with so many mistakes in it, that I ask leave to withdraw that report and submit a substitute report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

EVENING SESSION ON MONDAY.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next we may take a recess at 5 o'clock and convene again at 8. I want to give notice thus early so that Senators will not be embarrassed by it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that at the session of Monday next a recess be taken from 5 o'clock in the afternoon until 8 o'clock. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

COLUMBUS PORT OF DELIVERY.

Mr. FRYE. The bill (H. R. 12060) to constitute Columbus, Ohio, a port of delivery, and to extend the provisions of the act of June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," to said port of Columbus, came over yesterday, and was ordered to lie on the table. The Senate Committee on Commerce instructed me yesterday to report favorably a bill of exactly the same terms as the House bill. I ask that the House bill may be taken from the table and placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PAYNE. Before that order is made, I ask that the bill may be now considered. There will be no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the Senate may now proceed to the consideration of House bill 12060.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object if it will take no time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, January 19, 1889, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 18, 1889.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

APPROVAL OF THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Journal will be approved.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I object, as the Journal is not correct. It is unimportant in itself, but it may become dangerous as a precedent. The Journal states by unanimous consent the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] withdrew the substitute, H. R. 8466, and reoffered the substitute previously offered by him and ruled out of order. All that occurred at that time is set forth in the RECORD, and these are the words:

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, as this amendment is now before the House and the reading of it has been waived, I desire to call attention to certain amendments which I desire shall be offered thereto.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Are you going now to ask for a vote on the substitute as printed in the RECORD?

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentlemarf from New York does not object to taking a vote on the substitute which I have offered as printed in the RECORD, containing only such amendments as are germane to House bill 8466.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I suggest that the first thing in order is a vote on the substitute of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD].

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from New York who is now in the chair [Mr. COX] desires to move an amendment, and as he is not on the floor I will offer it for him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COX). The Chair will state the proposition. Unanimous consent has been given that the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Illinois is now pending—the substitute as printed in the RECORD—to which the gentleman offers an amendment.

No request for unanimous consent was submitted to the House from the Chair. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] themselves agreed that this substitute should be in order. The Chair thereupon seems to have taken it for granted that the House coincided with them, and stated it from the chair. I was standing within 30 feet of the chair, and I could not hear, owing to the uproar, even that consent had been given.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] was occupying the chair temporarily when these proceedings occurred, and the present occupant has no personal knowledge of what was said or done upon the floor. Afterwards, during the afternoon, when the present occupant of the chair resumed it, this question was made and unanimous consent was given.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I said that it was of little importance except as a precedent, for, as the Chair knows, unanimous consent can not be given save by the House.

Mr. COX. I wish the report in the RECORD had been a little more complete. I think it was generally conceded after the report was presented to the House yesterday that the Chair did present to the House the request for unanimous consent. Some members on the other side, where the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] sits, perhaps, did not hear the request and the order. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER], the gentlemen from Dakota [Mr. GIFFORD] and Colorado [Mr. SYMES], and all the gentlemen on this side coincide with my statement that the request had been made and was granted.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if he states that he submitted the request to the House.

Mr. COX. I submitted it to the House in as plain a way as ever a proposition was put. It was done in rather an interrogatory method; supposing, as will be seen by the RECORD, that all preliminaries led up to it. Now, the House will remember that after awhile it, after reconsideration, came back to the substitute; and after awhile, when it seemed to be dropped, it came back again to the same substitute. I remember well that the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois was presented. I had an amendment to it, and therefore remembered it. It did come in; and cui bono, what is the good of raising this question now? The substitute of the gentleman from Illinois was offered. It has been agreed that the substitute of the gentleman from Minnesota is to be first voted upon. Why, therefore, all this discussion? I am ready to vote, irrespective of the order in which matters arise; though I was not willing to give our business, like the gentleman from Illinois, to the other side of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does the gentleman make the definite statement that he submitted the question different from what it appears as printed in the RECORD?

Mr. COX. Yes, sir; and besides there is a friend of mine here who will make affidavit that the question for unanimous consent was submitted, though no affidavit is needed.

Mr. TOOLE. I heard it.

Mr. DUNN. I heard it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. With that statement I am content.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Either the RECORD should be corrected or the Journal made to conform to the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the motion to correct?

Mr. SYMES rose.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I demand the regular order.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not move to correct the Journal in that respect, as the gentleman from New York states that he did make the statement to the House; therefore the dangerous precedent as appears from the RECORD has passed away, and I do not move to correct the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Journal, then, will be approved.

Mr. SYMES. I understood——

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House.

Mr. SYMES. I want it to appear in the RECORD that I understood it was put and consented to.

COURT-HOUSE AND POST-OFFICE AT FRANKFORT, KY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting a report of the Supervising Architect showing the names of claimants and amounts alleged to be due by T. J. Collins, contractor for labor and material supplied for the construction of the court-house, post-office, etc., at Frankfort, Ky., as called for by the sundry civil act approved October 2, 1888; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HAYES, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for ten days, on account of important business.

LEAVE TO PRINT DOCUMENTS.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed for the use of the committee the documents and testimony taken by the select committee to inquire into the importation of contract laborers, paupers, etc.

The SPEAKER. Will the work cost more than $500? Because if it does the proposition must go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. FORD. No, sir; it will not.

There was no objection, and leave was granted.

CORRECTION.

Mr. COX. I rise to correct the RECORD in relation to the matter to which the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] has called attention this morning. What the occupant of the chair said on the occasion referred to was this:

The Chair will state the proposition [calling the attention of the House to it]. It is understood that unanimous consent is given that the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is now pending—the substitute as printed in the RECORD—to which the gentleman offers an amendment.

Corrected in that way, the report of what the then occupant of the chair said will be accurate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, under the rule it is set aside for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, unless that order is dispensed with by the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to dispense with the consideration of private bills for to-day.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. DUNHAM. I ask unanimous consent to make a report.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen having reports to present may have leave to file them with the Clerk.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that that leave apply to reports of a general nature.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, gentlemen having reports to present from committees, whether of public or of private bills, will be allowed to file them with the Clerk.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

GEORGETOWN AND TENNALLYTOWN RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. ROWELL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 11811) to amend an act "to incorporate the Georgetown and Tennallytown Railroad Company of the District of Columbia," which was received by the President August 10, A. D. 1888, and became a law without his approval; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-BOAT ON OYSTER BED SHOAL, HUDSON RIVER.

Mr. CLARDY, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with amendment the bill (H. ADMISSION OF DAKOTA.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now I call up the unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD] for the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken on agreeing to the substitute of Mr. MACDONALD; and the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

A division was demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 75, noes 86.

Mr. BURROWS, Mr. FARQUHAR, and others called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 117, nays 122, not voting 83; as follows:

So the substitute was rejected.

During the vote,

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan, said: Mr. Speaker, how am I recorded?

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen is not recorded at all.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think that if there is any way under the rules by which a member may be allowed to vote in a case of this kind, after the House has consumed two days in filibustering, he ought to have that privilege. I do not think we ought to be prevented from voting because we happen to come in here thirty minutes after the meeting of the House, supposing that the whole day would be consumed as yesterday was.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can state how he would have voted.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. McKENNA. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall when his name was called?

Mr. McKENNA. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule of the House the gentleman's vote can not be received.

Mr. McKENNA. If I had been present, I should have voted "ay."

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I was entering the House just as my name was called, but as I did not know what was before the House I was unable to respond.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman was inside the Hall when his name was called, the Chair thinks that, under the practice which has grown up, he has a right to vote.

Mr. COOPER. I vote "ay."

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, what does the Chair mean by "inside the Hall?" Is the lobby inside the Hall?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. ROMEIS. Mr. Speaker, I was in the Hall when the name of Mr. POST was called. I went into the cloak-room to take off my coat, and when I came out I did not hear my name called. I would like to vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there may be some question as to whether or not the cloak-rooms are part of the Hall, but the Chair is inclined to think that they are; and as the gentleman says he simply stepped in there from the Hall, his vote will be received.

Mr. ROMEIS. I vote "ay."

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON] was in the corridor when his name was called, and he should be allowed to vote if the gentleman from Ohio is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ROMEIS] states that he was actually in the Hall, and simply stepped into the cloak-room for a minute.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I was just as much in the Hall as he was; I was right at the door.

Mr. COX. If it will not change the result, I suggest that the votes of both gentlemen be received.

The SPEAKER. The difficulty is that in allowing members to vote upon a statement that they were within the Hall when their names were called, the Chair is really going beyond the letter of the rule.

The rule of the House is that the roll shall be twice called, and that thereafter the Speaker shall not even entertain a request for unanimous consent to vote. But it was thought the literal enforcement of this rule might in many cases impose a hardship on members, who, owing to the confusion on the floor of the House, had actually failed to hear their names. Therefore in practice the rule has been relaxed to the extent of allowing members to vote who were in the Hall when their names were called, but no further. The Chair does not think the rule ought to be further relaxed, as even under the present practice a great deal of confusion sometimes results. The Clerk will announce the pairs.

The following members were announced as paired on all political questions until further notice:

Mr. LATHAM with Mr. NICHOLS.
Mr. BRYCE with Mr. WILBER.
Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, with Mr. WICKHAM.
Mr. HAYES with Mr. THOMAS H. B. BROWNE.
Mr. SIMMONS with Mr. MCCULLOGH.
Mr. BURNETT with Mr. DELANO.
Mr. PIDCOCK with Mr. BROWER.
Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi, with Mr. DAVENPORT.
Mr. BRIGGS with Mr. MORROW.
Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, with Mr. GOFF.
Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, with Mr. WEST.
Mr. WHITTHORNE with Mr. BUTLER.
Mr. MCSHANE with Mr. LAIRD.
Mr. SNYDER with Mr. BOWEN.
Mr. WISE with Mr. JOHN R. BROWN.
Mr. PENINGTON with Mr. BUNNELL.
Mr. NEAL with Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas.

The following-named members were announced as paired for this day:

Mr. COCKRAN with Mr. KETCHAM.
Mr. RUSK with Mr. BOUTELLE.

The following members were announced as paired on this vote:

Mr. COLLINS with Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana.
Mr. CLEMENTS with Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa.
Mr. WILKINS with Mr. HAYDEN.
Mr. WASHINGTON with Mr. BINGHAM.
Mr. CRAIN with Mr. PUGSLEY.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire now to submit an amendment to section 3 of the substitute.

PRINTING OF STATISTICAL ABSTRACTS.

The SPEAKER. Before that question is submitted, the Chair, if there be no objection, will present two propositions for changes of reference. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], from the Committee on Appropriations, asks that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of Executive Document No. 50, relating to the printing of the statistical abstract annually prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and that it be referred to the Committee on Printing. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

CHARTING THE SKY.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] also asks that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from the further consideration of Executive Document No. 46, relative to the proposed international project of charting the sky, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; which order will be made if there be no objection.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

ADMISSION OF DAKOTA.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 3 of the substitute insert:

"Seventh. That at the election for delegates to the constitutional convention in South Dakota each elector may have written or printed on his ballot the words "For the Sioux Falls constitution of 1885," or the words "Against the Sioux Falls constitution of 1885;" and if a division of the Territory is authorized as provided in this section, and if a majority of all votes cast on this question shall be "For the Sioux Falls constitution of 1885," then it shall be the duty of the convention which may assemble at Sioux Falls as provided herein to resubmit to the people of South Dakota, for ratification or rejection, at the election provided for in this act, the constitution framed at Sioux Falls and adopted in November, 1885, and also the articles separately submitted at that time, including the selection of the temporary seat of government, with such changes only as relate to the name and boundary of the proposed State, to the reapportionment of the judicial and legislative districts, and such other amendments as may be necessary in order to comply with the provisions of this act."

Mr. SPRINGER. I move the previous question on this amendment and the third reading of the bill.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I hope that motion will not prevail. I am very sorry my friend from Illinois should undertake to move the previous question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I thought we had given every opportunity to the other side up to this time. I must insist on the previous question. If the gentleman from New York desires to state a request I will hear what it is. If it be reasonable I think it ought to be granted; otherwise we ought to go on and bring this matter to a conclusion.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I think there are considerations to be submitted in connection with this question other than those already presented to the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. We have been engaged all the week on this subject; and I have yielded everything in reason to the other side, even allowing them to have the vote in such a manner that they could fix up the substitute which this side of the House desired to offer. Now I think we ought to bring this question to a decision.

Mr. BURROWS. This amendment is just offered, and there ought to be at least a little debate upon it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Five minutes on each side?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Oh, no; that is not fair.

Mr. SPRINGER. We have had a fair hearing of this all round, and I now insist we shall have a vote. If gentlemen desire a short time for debate I would like to know just exactly what time they do desire.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. The gentleman from Illinois offered this same amendment yesterday. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois to say that this is the same amendment offered by him yesterday?

Mr. SPRINGER. Substantially, but not in words.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I think it is different.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is different, as I have stated, but it is satisfactory to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Not the Delegate.

Mr. SPRINGER. No, not the Delegate. I have conferred with the Delegate from Dakota on everything up to this time, but I can not see everybody.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. But the gentleman says it is satisfactory to the gentleman from Dakota. Now, what gentleman from Dakota does he refer to? I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to say that he has not submitted it to the Delegate from Dakota.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman is opposed to it of course we can not help it.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Of course we understand that if we do not like it we can lump it; but that is not the sort of an answer we expected from the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, I trust the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], chairman of the Committee on the Territories, will not insist on his demand for the previous question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I must insist on my demand for the previous question, as we have been on this subject since Tuesday last.

Mr. WARNER. While it is true there has been general discussion on the other bill, it is also true that there has been no discussion on the gentleman's substitute, and the fact is but few members have read it or know anything about it. Reasonable time certainly should be given to debate.

Mr. COX. How long does the gentleman desire?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Of course we ought to have a reasonable time.

Mr. COX. What time does the gentleman propose?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. We ought to have an hour at least.

The SPEAKER. The House must come to order.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York demand the regular order?

Mr. COX. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The regular order, then, is on ordering the previous question on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] state how much time is wanted on the other side?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. An hour.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has demanded the regular order.

Mr. SYMES. Unless we have an hour for debate and to offer additional amendments we will filibuster against that amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no objection to continuing the debate for one hour, the time to be divided equally between the two sides of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. This matter has interrupted the consideration of the regular appropriation bills, and I ask the gentleman from Illinois not to take up any time with unnecessary debate.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am now between two opposing forces and I must insist on my demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The question then recurs on the demand for the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 74, noes 2.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. No quorum has voted.

Mr. CUTCHEON. If necessary we will have the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. SPRINGER and Mr. BAKER, of New York.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois what length of time is asked for debate?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. A reasonable time is all we ask.

Mr. SPRINGER. To be equally divided between the two sides of the House.

Mr. COX. How long?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. One hour.

Mr. SPRINGER. We will agree to that if the debate is to end entirely on the bill in one hour.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. One hour on this side.

Mr. SPRINGER. Very well. Then I will take ten minutes to reply to all that may be said, and that will make one hour and ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is that agreed to?

Mr. PERKINS. I ask the gentleman to consent that amendments may be offered and considered as pending. There are some amendments which ought to be considered.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I understand this bill is being considered in the House as in the Committe of the Whole on the state of the Union. Several gentlemen desire to submit amendments to this substitute. Now can they offer those amendments in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. This proceeding in the House as in committee is outside of the rules and is governed by a combination of the rules and the practice of the House and of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLAND. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. And when considering matters in the House as in Committee of the Whole it is always usual to allow motions to lay on the table, for the previous question, and others which are admissible under the rules in the House; and the House has determined heretofore, upon the submission of the question by the Chair, that the House might close debate upon the bill. So there is a combination of the rules and practice in the consideration of a bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole of both practices.

Mr. BURROWS. Can the right of amendment be cut off?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so. It has been usual to allow the previous question.

Mr. BURROWS. Then this is not considering it in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. It is; it has always been the practice when considering measures in that way to allow all such motions as the Chair has just stated.

Mr. BURROWS. But in Committee of the Whole we have the right to offer amendments.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly; and so also in the House when acting as in Committee of the Whole, until by an order of the House that right is terminated.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to see, Mr. Speaker, if we can arrive at some agreement——

Mr. BLAND. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded, and the tellers will take their places.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is there any objection to the request that an hour and ten minutes shall be allowed for debate, to be divided as I stated a few moments ago?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri demands the regular order, which is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope that will be withdrawn.

Mr. BLAND. I demand the regular order. It is evident that we can not come to any understanding.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted.

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw the demand.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the yeas and nays being withdrawn, the tellers will take their places.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is it in order to withdraw the demand for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The question, then, is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I understand that under the rules of the House I would be entitled to five minutes in explanation of the amendment, and that any gentleman on the other side who chose to take the floor would be allowed five minutes to oppose it. Is that the understanding of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman states the rule correctly, but another gentleman may move another amendment and discuss that first under the rule.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I understand we are proceeding as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. And that amendments may be offered under that rule?

The SPEAKER. Unless the House shall determine otherwise.

The Chair has simply held that when the House is proceeding in the House as in Committee of the Whole amendments may be offered until the previous question is ordered by the House, or until the House determines to proceed to a vote in some other way besides ordering the previous question, or until the bill has passed the stage where it is susceptible of amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. Gentlemen on the other side desire time for debate. Now, will they be satisfied with two hours, at the expiration of which time the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the amendments, and on the engrossment and third reading of the bill?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. We will take only such time as may be absolutely necessary in our judgment.

Mr. SPRINGER. Not exceeding two hours?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Not exceeding what we consider necessary and proper.

Mr. SPRINGER. But let the time be fixed at not exceeding two hours.

Mr. REED. I think the gentleman from Illinois will find this matter will dispose of itself in much shorter time than he can dispose of it in the manner in which he is now proceeding.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from Maine assist in disposing of it?

Mr. REED. Certainly I will. If the gentleman will simply allow the matter to go on in the way in which it was understood that we were to proceed, namely, that amendments should be offered and voted upon, there is no disposition on this side of the House to attempt to delay unnecessarily or on any account the proceedings in regard to the bill. All this delay has been the result of misunderstandings.

Mr. SPRINGER. It all results from the fact that my friends on the other side will not allow this side of the House to vote upon the substitute we have prepared, but insist on preparing one for us.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. It all results from the fact that this is an attempt to throw obstructive measures in the way of the admission of South Dakota.

Mr. BLAND. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, on which ten minutes are allowed for debate, five in support of and five in opposition to it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I reserve my time.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. A question first of information as to the status of this proposition. Is it to be debated for five minutes and then a vote?

Mr. DOCKERY. We are proceeding under that rule.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Now, Mr. Speaker, this proposition, to my mind, illustrates forcibly the fact asserted here over and over again, that the scheme of the other side of the House to put through the "omnibus bill" is simply a resort to obstructive measures inaugurated and conceived and intended to prevent the admission of South Dakota. It presents a new proposition here to be rushed through the House, and does not offer the opportunity for a clear, fair, and intelligent vote upon the question of the admission of South Dakota.

We have a straight, fair, and square proposition in Senate bill 185 as it has been amended by this House. I hope the House will allow a vote upon it; and I pledge my word, and I believe I can speak for the Republicans of this House, that they will go forward in a manly way and vote and act upon a proposition for the enabling act for each of the other Territories named in this substitute.

What is the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois? It proposed originally to provide for the admission of Dakota as a whole. Now, as printed in the RECORD the day before yesterday, it provides for a division. It provides an enabling act for South Dakota, and ignores, sets aside, and disregards utterly the proposition for the immediate admission of that State. It provides, further, a mere enabling act for the other Territories. It does not facilitate their admission into the Union as States. It does not hasten the day when they may be admitted to the sisterhood of States. It does not hasten one moment when they may have representation upon the floor of Congress, but it simply retards the admission of South Dakota. It hinders, it delays, it obstructs the expression, the wishes, and the will of four hundred thousand people who have for seven years been knocking at the doors of Congress; and this amendment has no other purpose, it can have no other purpose, except to mix up the whole proposition and to distract the attention of Congress from that which is embodied in the bill which has passed the Senate and is now before the House, and it is a proposition to amend by substituting the so-called omnibus bill, a monstrosity, and which is wrong in principle and unjust to the people concerned, and a violation in fact of the constitutional rights and privileges of the people of that great Northwestern State.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this amendment should be voted down, and think that the House, in justice to itself, in justice to the people of the country, as a matter of constitutional right, and in justice to the people of Dakota, should vote down this proposed substitute, the omnibus bill, offered by the gentleman from Illinois, and give us a straight vote upon the proposition to admit at once South Dakota; and then, as I have already intimated, we will go on, and in one day, I pledge you, pass an enabling act for each and every one of the Territories deserving such an act.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman rise to propose an amendment?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I rise to discuss the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that under the rule the Chair is compelled to recognize gentlemen on one side of the proposition, and afterwards to recognize the gentlemen on the other side of the proposition.

Mr. SPRINGER (to Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois). You can make a formal amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to participate in this discussion, nor do I now intend to occupy the attention of the House but a few moments. I am not sure but that I would be willing to vote for each and every one of the Territories proposed in this amendment to be admitted as States into the Union, even including New Mexico, if submitted as separate propositions; but I do wish most earnestly, Mr. Speaker, to protest against the further keeping of South Dakota out of the Union as a State.

It has been my pleasure to visit that Territory about once a year for five or six years past, and I have witnessed the wonderful growth and prosperity of the people of that Territory. When I first visited Dakota, some six years ago, I stopped at a town of five or six hundred inhabitants. I was there a few days before this session of Congress convened, and I was glad to see that it had trebled its population. It had just erected a school-house at a cost of $17,000, I believe, that would be creditable to a town of three or four times its size. Its streets were lighted with electric lights, and they have there an agricultural college with from two hundred and fifty to three hundred students, I think, attending every day. I allude to this to show the character of that people, and you may travel from one end of Dakota to the other and find the same characteristics. I have gone through the northern portion of it; I have gone to the Missouri River through the southern portion, and from the southern part north to the center of the Territory, visiting their towns, and I have found in every part of that Territory of wonderful fertility and beauty where I have gone an intelligent, energetic, enterprising people; and yet they have been kept out of this Union, until yesterday it was proposed by my friend from New York to so amend the bill under consideration as now to give Southern Dakota two Representatives in the Congress of the United States. And yet my colleague, Mr. SPRINGER, and the other side of the House are still, it seems, disposed to add further obstacles to the admission of that Territory into the Union as a State, and to obstruct it by attaching to it Territories which ought not, perhaps, to be admitted until they have made further progress in the way of population and improvement, and which certainly have no such claim to admission as Southern Dakota.

Mr. SPRINGER. Did you not just now vote for the amendment in favor of these other Territories?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I voted for it because it does not obstruct the admission of South Dakota as a State. And I give my colleague to understand that I will not vote for any proposition that will do so; and if the other side of the House are disposed to commit further wrong and outrage upon the people of Southern Dakota they can do so. I will not vote for nor support any proposition which does not provide for the admission of Southern Dakota, and that at the very earliest day which can be agreed upon for such admission. There are four or five hundred thousand people in the southern part of Dakota. They are an intelligent people. They are of our own blood and kindred. They demand admission into the Union, and they ought to have it at the earliest possible moment.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. I listened with pleasure to the eloquent remarks of the gentleman from Illinois. I am in favor of the admission of Southern Dakota. I began on this and within the lines of my own party until the last session of this Congress. We have progressed from time to time until we have a proposition now in the third section of this bill for the division of Dakota. That is an advance. My friend approves of that advance. He approves of giving two Congressmen to South Dakota. That is an advance. Now we propose this amendment in the third section of the bill; a further advance, much further than our Democratic caucus went, much further than gentlemen are disposed to go in party questions; and therefore, looking to the good of our Government and with a view to favoring South Dakota, and having my eye at the same time on the Senate, and after reading the reports of all the committees that have reported for several years, I think——

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. COX. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. The gentleman states that he has his eye on the Senate. Does he expect to move to Dakota? [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I never had any ambition to be anything except a member of Congress and to cultivate the graces of my friend from New York. [Laughter.] They tendered me an office in New York City, which I declined, I am so happy to be with you gentlemen here, where even my word is taken on a matter of doubtful veracity. [Renewed laughter.] But, Mr. Speaker, I meant to say this, that gentlemen who are really patriotic, who desire to help these people in their enterprises, who are proud of the progress of our people in all that makes up modern civilization, might defer a little to the general sentiment of the country just now, and if we can not get all that we want in any one measure, let us refer certain matters of a local character to those amendments which come in organic legislation, and to the Legislatures of the Territories to be established in these States.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. COX. I have not much time.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. It will be a simple question.

Mr. COX. I know it will be simple [laughter], but I can not yield.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Can my friend give me one single, solitary good reason why his side of the House should not now vote for the admission of South Dakota?

Mr. COX. That is not a simple question. That is complicated. [Laughter.] When the gentleman votes for the admission of South Dakota under this bill, he will have solved the complications which my distinguished friend from Illinois is in the habit of making in this House. So that I propose now, out of general good-will, that we vote for this amendment, which has come up gradually into prominence; vote for this amendment, and vote for these other Territories also, and then we can say to the people of these Territories, "We have done the best we can for you, and we submit the matter to your judgment both on questions of division and on other local questions pertaining to the Territories."

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ADAMS. I desire to put a question to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. I will answer both of them together, then I will not be complicated. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS. I ask the gentleman from New York to explain the exact effect of this proposed amendment which is now actually pending before the House.

Mr. COX. This amendment proposes to submit the Sioux Falls constitution to the people. I am democratic enough to desire that we shall infuse the least possible public sentiment into the convention and let the people reratify the constitution if necessary.

Mr. ADAMS. Is that all? This is not what is printed in the RECORD. It omits an essential feature.

Mr. COX. Here it is [holding up the manuscript].

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Nobody can read that.

Mr. COX. It was read in the gentleman's hearing.

Mr. STRUBLE. I do not think it was understood when it was read. I did not understand it.

Mr. COX. Well, if the gentleman from Iowa and I can not understand it no one else can. [Laughter.]

Mr. STRUBLE. I think that when it was read there was too much noise for any one to understand it.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, I would ask, in order that the House may know what is before it, that the amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee on Territories this morning be now reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will again read the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, I certainly shared in the general joy that was experienced yesterday at the confession by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] that there had been a change of heart on the part of the chairman of the Committee on Territories, a change in the direction of the interests of the people of the Territories. I felt that we were progressing. But I can truly say that certainly there has been no advancement made by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois since he offered his amendment to section 3 of the substitute upon yesterday. This morning he carefully omitted from that amendment the very provision that gave it vitality, that gave it force, that rendered possible an early admission of South Dakota. I now desire to read for the information of the House the amendment as offered yesterday by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], to be found on page 953 of the RECORD.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I would like to ask whether the amendment as just read is the same as that offered a little while ago. Has there been any change since it was first read this morning?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir.

Mr. WARNER. The amendment as now offered omits words which were important. I think I heard the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] asking this side of the Chamber yesterday whether we were willing to provide that the admission of South Dakota should be declared by proclamation of the President of the United States, and the answer was "yes." One clause of the amendment as submitted yesterday provided:

And if a majority of the votes cast on the ratification or rejection of the constitution shall be for the constitution irrespective of the articles separately submitted, then the President of the United States may issue his proclamation declaring the State of South Dakota admitted as a State in the Union from and after the date of such proclamation.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. That is left out of the amendment as now offered.

Mr. WARNER. That, by an inadvertence——

Mr. STRUBLE. That is stating the matter very mildly.

Mr. WARNER. Is intentionally omitted from the amendment as offered this morning. [Laughter.] So that the progress which has been made since yesterday has been rather that of the crawfish.

A MEMBER. The crab.

Mr. WARNER. Yes, the crab. I am willing to yield that the gentleman from Illinois, in whose fairness and candor in these matters I have implicit confidence, may state to the House why this change has been made. Is it in the interest of South Dakota? Is it designed to hasten the admission of that Territory—this empire, of which the gentleman talks so eloquently—into the sisterhood of States, or is it to retard it?

A MEMBER. Or is it a trick?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly it can not be a trick.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman's time is up, I will take the floor.

Mr. WARNER. Certainly; I would be pleased to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will take the floor in my own right.

Mr. WARNER. Certainly; of course.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I will tell the gentleman why this change has been made by me. The election at which this constitution is to be voted on will take place, under the provisions of the substitute as it now stands, on the Tuesday following the first Monday in November next. Upon the same day the people of North Dakota, under this substitute, will vote on the ratification or rejection of their constitution; and I assume that both North Dakota and South Dakota will ratify their respective constitutions. It would be impossible for the President of the United States to receive official information of the result of the vote in regard to ratification or rejection before the 1st day of December—say thirty days thereafter. That would be within a week, at most, of the time when Congress could pass upon this question, and admit both these States together. It would be very inconvenient for the people of North Dakota to have a Territorial government organized for the brief period of one week. In view of the confusion which might thus result, and as a period of only a week or ten days at most would elapse before both States could come in together, I thought Congress, as a matter of justice, ought to have the right to determine whether South Dakota had accepted these donations of land and the other conditions of the bill in the terms enacted by Congress and had agreed to assume her portion of the debts of the Territory of Dakota.

Mr. WARNER. Now, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER. Under the amendment as offered by the gentleman yesterday no Congressional action was required to secure the admission of South Dakota after the approval of this constitution. That is true, is it not?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER. The amendment as offered yesterday left it simply with the President of the United States to issue his proclamation; that is true, I believe.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER. Now, you propose to take away that hope and compel these people to come back for Congressional action before they can be admitted.

Mr. SPRINGER. This proposition can not delay the matter more than a week or ten days at most.

Mr. WARNER. Wait a moment. We can understand something of the delay which may occur when we remember that South Dakota has been here now for three years——

A MEMBER. Seven years.

Mr. WARNER. Yes, seven years, knocking at the doors of Congress, in season and out of season, for admission; and yet there has been no action up to this time.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman will treat this matter frankly. Does he not concede that it would be very inconvenient for North Dakota to be compelled to have a Territorial government which could not last beyond a week or ten days at most, during which time the various Territorial officers would have to be qualified, and there would be great confusion as to their status?

Mr. WARNER. It might be inconvenient for the people of North Dakota to be kept out of the Union a week or ten days under a Territorial form of government, but it would be a greater inconvenience, hardship, and wrong upon the four hundred thousand people of South Dakota to keep them out of the Union awaiting the action of the next Congress, involving a delay, whether of a week, a month, a year or years, instead of admitting them certainly within the coming summer.

Mr. SPRINGER. On the first day of December next both branches of Congress will be Republican, and there will be a Republican President.

Mr. WARNER. Yes, thank God; and that is the hope of the Territories of this country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Yet the gentleman will not trust his own party to deal with this question.

Mr. WARNER. Oh, yes, I will trust my own party. I am thankful that the action of my party at the last election has stricken the scales from the eyes of the gentleman, so that he now proposes to do something that he refused and scorned to do before the ides of last November.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes; we were struck with "blocks of five."

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Allow me a question.

Mr. SPRINGER. In one moment. I assume, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that no injustice can be done to South Dakota, because at that time she and her Representatives will be in the hands of her own friends.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Allow me a question.

Mr. SPRINGER. Therefore, there is no advantage taken.

Mr. WARNER. Pardon me further.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Wait a minute and allow me to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Missouri wishes to ask me another question, and I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. WARNER. The gentleman has not answered the question I have already put to him. Is not the effect of the amendment which the gentleman offers to-day instead of the one offered yesterday of necessity to delay the admission of South Dakota? Let me ask the gentleman further whether, when he offered the amendment yesterday and wanted the previous question to be ordered upon it, he had not then fully considered all its conditions? Why, then, does he now propose to change it?

Mr. SPRINGER. I have stated why it was changed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the committee——

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. I can only answer one question at a time.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. But you have not answered even that question.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from New York can submit his question, and I will try to answer both together.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I wish to be courteous to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. Proceed.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Is my friend willing that South Dakota shall be admitted now, at this session of Congress?

Mr. SPRINGER. I am willing that she should be admitted under the terms of the substitute now pending.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. And that, the gentleman from Illinois will admit, is simply an enabling act in effect.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman understands it as well as I do.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. And that is the reason I so stated.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to call the attention of the House to the proceedings of a meeting held in Minnehaha County, one of the largest counties in Southern Dakota, one day last week, in a convention, composed of Democrats and Republicans, called by the chairmen of the committees of both parties to appoint delegates to a convention held this week. They did appoint delegates; and let me read what they said:

"Whereas serious defects exist in the Sioux Falls constitution, notably that limiting the State indebtedness to $500,000, when the bonded debt made on behalf of the public institutions located in South Dakota already exceeds $667,000, while from present prospects the State of South Dakota is liable to begin business without a dollar in the treasury; and

* * * * * * *

"Whereas the population of South Dakota since the choice of these delegates in June, 1885, has increased from 263,000 to over 375,000, nearly one-third of the present electors having had no voice in what was then done.

* * * * * * *

"Be it resolved by the electors of Minnehaha County in mass convention assembled, That the interests of all classes will be best subserved by admission into the Union under a constitution which does not contain the objectionable features found in the Sioux Falls constitution, and which will give every legal voter now in South Dakota an equal voice in determining certain disputed provisions of the constitution, the choice of temporary State capital, and the selection of State officers, members of the Legislature, and Congressmen.

"Resolved, That we, electors of Minnehaha County, firm in the belief that the quickest, best, and most satisfactory way of getting into the Union will be under a new constitution, favor the calling of a new constitutional convention for the making of a new fundamental law for the State of South Dakota.

"Resolved, That the delegates chosen by this convention to represent Minnehaha County in the statehood convention at Huron, on Wednesday, January 16, be instructed to urge that convention to ask the Legislative Assembly of Dakota, which is now in session at Bismarck, to pass a law providing for a new constitutional convention for South Dakota, whose delegates shall be apportioned upon the total vote polled at the late election for Delegate."

On the call for a division of the house it developed that of the one hundred and fifty persons, more or less, who were present, all but twelve or fifteen favored the resolutions.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Allow me to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Does not the gentleman know that at this moment there is in session at Huron, Dak., a representative convention which not only asks but begs and implores to be admitted into the Union under the Sioux Falls constitution?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Does the gentleman set up here against the action on the part of South Dakota the action of one county only? Does he call that equity, justice, fair play, to the people of the great Territory? One hundred and fifty counties against one.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think this is a pretty long question.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I beg the gentleman's pardon. What I wished to say was that there is there a representative convention of delegates coming from the people, who know what they want, who can read and write, and who have as much right to be in this Union as a State as the State of Illinois, which the gentleman in part represents.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will my friend be satisfied now that he has answered his own question?

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Yes, sir; and far better than the gentleman dared to do.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the House further to a letter which I have received from a distinguished citizen of Minnehaha County, sending me these resolutions, in which he says:

The sentiment of our people (barring a few politicians who assume to be the Territory politically) is decidedly opposed to what is known as the "Platt bill," and while our people all want statehood there are great divisions of sentiment, even among the Republicans, as to the division and admission under the Sioux Falls constitution. Now in case that constitution was submitted to a vote of the Territory it would, in my opinion, be voted down by a large majority in the south part of the Territory. * * *

As between the adoption of the Platt bill and the question of admitting the Territory as a whole—the latter would carry to-day by a large majority.

A very objectionable thing to South Dakota—

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Will the gentleman now take up and read about twenty-five letters which I have in my desk right on the other side?

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman can read them in his own time.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCCREARY). The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. STRUBLE. I wish to ask the attention of the House for a few moments.

This proposition to compel the people of South Dakota, with all their intelligence, to vote twice upon the adoption of the constitution, which has been already adopted by that people, is in very strange contrast to the position my friend from Illinois has taken on the question of the admission of the Territory of New Mexico, about which he seems overly anxious.

Mr. SPRINGER. I believe that I am entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. STRUBLE. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a paper, the Santa Fé Herald of December 29 last, copies of which most of us, if not all, have received, containing a letter written by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Territories to Governor Ross, of that Territory, which letter is quite interesting as illustrating his liberality to one Territory as contrasted with his peculiar and marked illiberality to the people of South Dakota, who are really solicitous, and have been for a long time, for admission into the Union. I will read this letter; it is as follows:

STATEHOOD FOR NEW MEXICO.

We are permitted by Governor Ross to publish the following letter from Congressman SPRINGER, received by the governor a few days ago. The letter explains itself:

"HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
"Washington, D. C., December 20, 1888.

"My DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 15th is received. I am very glad to have your views as to the admission of New Mexico.

"There is an impression here that New Mexico does not desire admission. Therefore I hope you will prepare a memorial to Congress praying admission, through an enabling act, and ask to be included in any bill that may pass for that purpose. Set forth your population, resources, and claims. Sign yourself officially, and get signatures of leading officials and citizens of the Territory.

Send to Mr. JOSEPH and let him present it. If your Legislature meets this winter, have a joint resolution passed asking to be included in any bill for the admission of Territories, etc. You know what is wanted. This is very important.

"The subject will be taken up January 15, and will be disposed of, I think, in two days. Have your memorials, etc., by that time.

"I think we can pass the omnibus bill, with the caucus amendment for division of Dakota.

"I am, very truly, yours,

"W. M. SPRINGER.

"Hon. E. G. ROSS, Governor of New Mexico."

Here is a spectacle, Mr. Speaker, that we have before us to-day of a leading Democratic statesman trying to work up a State-admission sentiment in the Territory of New Mexico, when for fourteen years her Legislature has met regularly biennially and never passed resolutions favoring admission; and although this Territory has had its Delegates here for fourteen years in Congress none of them has ever presented a bill asking or claiming admission into the Union. But notwithstanding that fact, here is a prominent Democratic statesman, the chairman of the Committee on the Territories, trying to urge the people of New Mexico to make this move and take the initiative steps in regard to this matter. I repeat, sir, it is in marked contrast with the action of the gentleman from Illinois in regard to the admission of Dakota. It illustrates the inconsistency with which the gentleman has been acting in regard to this matter, the inconsistency of one of the great leaders in his party; and in my opinion the vote we are soon to take ought to show, and I believe it will show, that his proposition now will receive at least the unanimous and unqualified disapproval of the Representatives on this side of the Chamber. [Applause.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, in answer to what the gentleman from Iowa has stated I want to call his attention to the fact that I have received official notice from the president of the senate of the Territory of New Mexico that a resolution had been unanimously adopted by that Republican body tendering the thanks of the people of that Territory to the honorable Delegate and myself for our assistance to the Territory in getting into the Union. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the thanks of the people of New Mexico are hereby extended to Delegate ANTHONY JOSEPH and Chairman WILLIAM M. SPRINGER, of the House Committee on Territories, for their able efforts in behalf of statehood for New Mexico.

The resolution was adopted unanimously.

So while I may not have the approval of the gentleman from Iowa himself for my course in regard to the people of New Mexico, the Republican Legislature have unanimously indorsed my action in the matter.

Mr. DORSEY. How about the people of Dakota? What have they done in regard to it? [Laughter.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, in reference to the sentiment of our people regarding the adoption of the present constitution and the passage of the Platt bill, our Territorial Legislature is now in session and I have received information by telegraph from the president of the council that a memorial has passed the legislative body unanimously approving of the Platt bill and the admission of South Dakota under the present constitution. It is on its way here to the Capitol at this time.

I have also a telegram from the convention called at Huron and from delegates to that convention from Minnehaha County, who were selected at the last meeting the gentleman spoke of, which convention has passed or adopted unanimously the following resolutions in regard to the admission of the State:

Resolved, That we favor the immediate admission of South Dakota by the present Congress.

Resolved, Second, failing in this, that we ask the President-elect to convene a special session of Congress to provide for the admission of the Dakotas; and, third, failing in both of these, that we ask——

Mr. SPRINGER. I want to call the attention of the House to the last resolution.

Mr. GIFFORD. Very well—that we ask the Territorial Legislature to provide for a new constitutional convention for South Dakota.

In case there is no action at all, either by Congress at this session or in case that a special session is called——

Mr. SPRINGER. Why are they willing to have another convention? Why not stand by the Sioux Falls constitution?

Mr. GIFFORD. Simply because they think it is the most expeditious way of getting into the Union. One word in reference to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

I had some little hope when this amendment was offered, and it was printed in the RECORD this morning, that something could be done to hasten the admission of Dakota, even by our friends upon the other side of the Chamber. One provision of this amendment was that in case our people voted favorably on the adoption of the Sioux Falls constitution at the election of delegates for the constitutional convention to be held in May, that South Dakota might be admitted upon the proclamation of the President.

The amendment that he proposes this morning postpones the admission of Dakota far longer, if I understand the purport and meaning of this amendment, than the ten days that he mentioned. It depends wholly on another act of Congress. Now, by the amendment he proposed yesterday South Dakota might be admitted, well, say, in July, or as soon as the constitutional convention convenes. South Dakota could be admitted by the 1st of August, 1889; and under his present amendment there is no possible way for South Dakota to be admitted except by an act of Congress at its next session.

This amendment, which is now before the House and which was presented by the gentleman from Illinois, is of no earthly benefit to the people of Dakota. We want nothing of that sort. The Senate bill contains all the details which our people desire. It is a complete, perfect act within itself. It admits South Dakota under the present constitution. This amendment, which is now presented to the House, is of no earthly use. It will not further the admission of Southern Dakota at all.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

Mr. SYMES. The gentleman has given me the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized.

Mr. SYMES. The first statement I desire to make to the House this morning is that I somewhat misinformed the House yesterday as to the contents of the amendment or substitute which was to be offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD]. I had been informed by the Delegate from Dakota [Mr. GIFFORD] and by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD] that that amendment consisted of nothing more, as I understood, than the substance of the Senate bill with the amendments that we had adopted, immediately bringing in the State of South Dakota or admitting it in by the month of June or July next.

Now, sir, I appealed yesterday to this House and to the fairness of the chairman of the committee to allow the omnibus bill or substitute to be amended by the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota and stop all the trouble and caviling and all the delay. Mr. Speaker, from the explanation made by the gentleman from Minnesota as to the particular purpose of his amendment—I took that amendment this morning early, and I went over every section of it and made an abstract of it. I find, sir, that it has correctly incorporated in it the Senate bill, with the amendments to that bill adopted by this House for bringing in the State of South Dakota next June or July. So far so good. I supposed that to be all there was of the Macdonald amendment; but, sir, in addition to that it goes on and incorporates in it also substantially the provisions of the omnibus bill brought in as a substitute here by the chairman of the committee for enabling acts for Montana, for Washington, and for New Mexico, and for their admission in due time.

Now, I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that the first thing I proposed to do this morning, if the opportunity had been offered me, as I understand it was to be, but by mistake in the agreement of the gentleman from New York I was deprived of that privilege, was to have appealed to this House to amend the Macdonald substitute by striking out all these provisions for Montana, Washington, and New Mexico, so that it would not interfere with the substitute of the chairman of the committee except so far as to incorporate in it the provisions of the Senate bill for the immediate admission of South Dakota.

Mr. Speaker, I hope I am now understood in my position before this House, which I labored all day yesterday to have presented before it in a fair form. Mr. Speaker, after a great deal of canvassing in this House upon this important question I am fully persuaded that all the Republicans of this House and quite a number of Democrats upon the other side of this House are in favor of the Macdonald amendment to the substitute of the chairman of the committee, which we took so much time and spent so much work upon to perfect for the purpose of bringing into the Union a number of the great Territories thereof.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman from Colorado will be allowed five minutes more.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. SYMES. Now, Mr. Speaker, acting upon the proposition that a majority of this House was in favor of the substitute omnibus bill of the chairman of the Committee on Territories if they could not have it before them in a separate form, with one single amendment which should accomplish the object of the Senate bill, to bring in the State of South Dakota during the coming summer, I have labored to give this House, and an honest majority of this House, an opportuniry to vote upon that proposition. But the difficulty has been, Mr. Speaker, that whenever we were about to do it there has been conduct which has prevented us from doing it. I am not here at this time to criticise that conduct. I say that the amendment which was offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] yesterday was somewhat in accord with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana and voted into this omnibus bill—the amendment which allows the people to vote on the constitution which they adopted in 1884. I voted for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana. I believe it was right, sir, to let Montana vote upon that constitution, because, to my knowledge, it is as good a constitution as a new constitutional convention could get up. Now, Mr. Speaker, what does this amendment do? I appeal to this House to vote down the previous question until there shall be an opportunity for the majority of this House to vote upon the proper amendments to perfect the omnibus bill, so as to bring in South Dakota during the coming summer. That is all we ask. That is all the gentlemen representing Dakota ask. That is all the Republicans of this House ask. That is all, as I am persuaded, that a large number of Democrats in this House ask.

Now, how shall we do it? It is very simple. It is a mere matter of detail. But the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee this morning, as has been shown so well by my friend from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] does not accomplish that object. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] last evening would bring in the State, but it has been changed this morning from the amendment offered last evening, so that the people of South Dakota are placed in the same situation that they would be without any amendment. Mr. Speaker, the people of South Dakota, so far as I can see, will be delayed in admission into the Union until the time when all these other Territories can come in, unless this amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is amended and perfected in accordance with the provisions of the Macdonald amendment or in accordance with the provisions of the Senate bill.

In conclusion let me say that all we ask now is an opportunity to present a fair amendment which shall bring in South Dakota within three months, and an opportunity for gentlemen upon this side of the House—those who desire it—to vote upon the question whether or not they wish to bring New Mexico into the Union. I appeal to the chairman of the committee, and I appeal to the fair-minded Democrats upon that side of the House, to give us that simple opportunity. We can agree upon the details, we can perfect it in fifteen minutes, and all this wrangling and all this trouble, and all this silly partisanism will cease and the people of South Dakota will be made happy and have simple justice done them.

Mr. MANSUR. Mr. Speaker, according to the statement of the gentleman who has just taken his seat the difference between the two sides of the Chamber is narrowing greatly. According to him, they desire in Dakota to come into the Union next summer. Under our bill, if it should become a law, the State could come in in December, and in the mean time, as there is no general election pending, I can not see that there is anything left to differ about except the very short period of time between the summer and the winter. Two or three days ago I very much sympathized with and felt inclined to advocate the proposition for the admission of South Dakota under the Sioux Falls constitution, but more thought and investigation, and especially what I have heard said in this building within the last day or two, have changed my opinion greatly. First and foremost, the Sioux Falls constitution, even under the Senate bill, has to go back to be remodeled in several respects. The name is to be submitted to a separate vote. It is not what the people originally adopted, and who adopted it? Thirty-one thousand people only voted, and that was over three years ago. The vote last fall shows that there are from 65,000 to 70,000 voters there, and more than half of those voters have been practically disfranchised so far as the adoption of this constitution is concerned, because they have had no opportunity of voting upon it.

Again, the boundaries have been changed by the Senate; and you undertake, without submitting the matter to the people, to turn out of South Dakota and to put into North Dakota a large number of people—how many I am unable to say—even when, according to the Sioux Falls constitution, they had voted and declared their desire to become a part and parcel of South Dakota. Here you undertake to override that expressed desire of those people——

Mr. SYMES. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that when the Sioux Falls constitution was voted upon it was voted upon by the people of South Dakota only.

Mr. MANSUR. The gentleman has not understood me. You propose to change the boundaries; and by the new boundaries, as proposed in the Senate bill, you cut off a part and parcel of those people from South Dakota, where they would be under the Sioux Falls constitution, and put them into North Dakota without their assent.

Mr. SYMES. Mark you, by the amendments as adopted in the House to the Senate bill two days ago, that matter has to be submitted to a vote of the people of both North and South Dakota.

Mr. MANSUR. I do not understand that the people of North Dakota, under the bill as it came from the Senate, have anything to do with the question. I am talking now about the Senate bill and your amendments changing the boundaries of South Dakota.

Mr. SYMES. My friend will pardon me a moment. The amendments adopted by this House the other day fix the time for holding the election by the people of South Dakota and North Dakota, and provide that both North Dakota and South Dakota shall vote on this question.

Mr. MANSUR. That does not meet my point. By the terms of the bill as it came from the Senate you undertake to transfer to North Dakota against their will part of the people who voted to be in South Dakota.

Mr. GIFFORD. Has the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MANSUR] received a single intimation that that is distasteful to the people of North Dakota?

Mr. MANSUR. It does not make any difference. Here is the action of those people; and we have heard nothing indicating that they desire a change in this respect.

Again I would say to the gentleman [Mr. GIFFORD] that by another amendment, which he introduced himself within the last forty-eight hours, it has been agreed to submit the location of the capital anew to a vote of the people, and that by a separate vote. I have been informed by prominent Republicans that this was done on the demand of one of your Senators-elect, who stated that unless this was submitted to a new vote of the people he would oppose the adoption of the Sioux Falls constitution.

Then, there is another thing. It is now being stated around the House that whereas that constitution, in section 1 of article 17, provided that no corporation should be created or established except by general law, such was the dissatisfaction of the railroad corporations and others with this provision that $50,000 was spent to secure the adoption of section 3, which is in direct conflict with section 1. If any gentleman will turn to sections 1 and 3 of article 17 of this constitution the conflict will be apparent; for there, upon a condition of holding its charter subject to the constitution, it is provided the Legislature can pass a general or special law for the benefit of any business corporation. This is the information that has come to me within the last forty-eight hours. Two days ago, as I have stated, I was almost persuaded it was well to let the people of South Dakota——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MANSUR. I would like to occupy five minutes more.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think this courtesy ought to be accorded to the gentleman, as it has already been given to another gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to allowing the gentleman from Missouri to continue his remarks five minutes longer? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANSUR. I now appeal to every member on the other side of the House to examine this constitution, which is embraced in the report of the committee before us, and to observe the conflict between sections 1 and 3 of article 17. If it be true that this conflict is the result of the influences I have suggested, then, without dispute, there ought to be another constitution framed.

Again, by a separate vote the people of South Dakota were called to pass upon the question of prohibition. By a majority of only 300—15,000 and odd votes being cast on each side—the proposition on that subject was adopted. Since that time, from all that we have been able to see and learn in committee, a great change has come over the people of South Dakota. They are to-day, under local option, voting for high license, which a large number of their counties have adopted. It comes to us in various ways, so that there can be no doubt of the fact, that if this question were again submitted the action had at the former election would be overthrown; and to prepare the way for this it is proposed by the other side of this Chamber to submit that question again as a separate matter.

So that we are to have some four or five separate votes on different matters connected with this new constitution, namely, on boundary, on its name, on the location of its capital, and on prohibition. Why not submit the whole question of a new constitution, instead of tinkering it up in this manner? The people of that Territory are now assured by the dominant sentiment here, not alone on the other side, where I may say it is unanimous for their admission, but also on this side, that we desire to let them into the Union at the earliest practicable period, while giving at the same time every facility to South Dakota for obtaining a constitution which shall be in accord with the wishes, not of a majority of 31,000 of their voting population three years ago, but of the body of the people as now existing, embracing 70,000 voters. I repeat all this can be accomplished this summer or next fall; and there will be no delay to those people. In the next Congress, as my distinguished colleague [Mr. WARNER] has said, the other side will have control of this House and Senate. Certainly gentlemen on the other side can trust the action of the next Congress; and in view of what we have heard within the last few days, which may account for whatever dissatisfaction in Dakota may exist in regard to the constitution as already voted upon, I ask, why should we not send it back and authorize a new convention to be called to form a new constitution?

Do that and you will treat the people there fairly. Do that and you will do it in a way that all Democrats would like to be treated, and in a way that all Republicans would like to be treated; and that is, that they shall pass upon the organic law upon which their new State is to be launched into the Union. Do that and you will do no injustice. Do that and you will deprive no one of any substantial right. Do that, and if there be delay it will only be for three or four months, and when the people understand the reasons for the delay they will thank us for having given them the opportunity to pass again upon their organic law, although it may have caused some little delay.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ADAMS. I desire to offer an amendment by striking out all after the words "which may assemble at Sioux Falls, as here provided," and inserting "to certify such votes to the President of the United States, and the President may thereupon issue his proclamation declaring the State of South Dakota admitted into the Union."

Mr. SPRINGER. So that it will read——

A MEMBER. What section does it come in?

Mr. ADAMS. My amendment will come in about the middle of the substitute, where it is provided it shall be the duty of the convention "which may assemble at Sioux Falls, as here provided, to resubmit," etc., and my amendment comes in there.

The SPEAKER. It is the amendment to the amendment now pending.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the amendment be read as it would be if the amendment to the amendment were adopted.

The amendment as proposed to be amended was then read.

Mr. SPRINGER. What becomes of the question when you get your constitution? You accomplish nothing. You have a State without an officer, or——

Mr. ADAMS. Does this come out of my time?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman yields it does.

Mr. ADAMS. I did not yield.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not deduct it from the gentleman's time.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I of course do not pretend that an amendment to an amendment to a pending proposition will make the whole proposition a perfect one. I admit to my colleague that some further amendments will have to be made in order to make my colleague's substitute a perfect one.

Now, the purpose of my amendment is simply this: It is provided that the people of South Dakota shall have an election in June. At that election they are to choose delegates to a convention to frame a new constitution. But by this new amendment proposed this morning they are also allowed at that same election to express their preference for a constitution already made at Sioux Falls. If they do express that preference, then the delegates chosen to make a new constitution are not permitted to frame one, but must resubmit the constitution already made. That is, they shall ask the people of South Dakota to accept for the third time a constitution which at the election of delegates they have already accepted the second time. This is absurd. If at the June election the people of South Dakota are permitted to express a preference for the Sioux Falls constitution, they ought at the same election to be permitted to take all other steps necessary to make South Dakota a State in the Union under that constitution. If the delegates elected in June are not to be permitted to frame a new constitution because the people have expressed a preference for the old one, the bill should be amended so that the duty of the convention will be to report to the President of the United States the fact that the people of South Dakota have accepted the Sioux Falls constitution with certain modifications, and the President can then issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted.

Now the proposition of my colleague as it was printed in the RECORD this morning had some force and effect. It provided that after the people had ratified the constitution next November it would not be necessary to wait for the slow process of passing a bill through both branches of Congress. The President could issue his proclamation next November, and South Dakota would then be a State in the Union. The proposition as presented to-day is very different. The provision for an admission of the State by proclamation of the President has been omitted. Its only effect as it stands is to prevent the delegates chosen next June from proceeding to frame a new constitution. The duty of the convention ought to be either to frame a new constitution or to report to the President that the people of South Dakota prefer the constitution already made, with the modifications necessary by the change of name and boundaries. As I have already said, if my amendment is adopted some changes will have to be made in other parts of the bill to make it a consistent whole.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that if this proposition is adopted, when the vote is taken, and the people have agreed to the Sioux Falls constitution, they will have a constitution in force without a single State officer to execute any of the provisions of the law, because I assume that the other provisions of the bill will be agreed to, which provide for the election of State officers only in November next, and until that time there would be no officer in that State. An anomalous condition of affairs would exist in regard to the separate articles and the location of the capital, and the other provisions of the bill, all of which have been carefully considered by the Committee on the Territories; and this amendment, Mr. Speaker, shows how difficult it is for a gentleman who has had no experience in such matters to undertake to fix up a proposition and pass it through the House after a few moments' discussion—a proposition which has been considered for two years by the committee—and that, too, after he has given but about five minutes' attention to it.

Mr. ADAMS. Oh, no, not exactly that, for I have felt that I could at all times rely upon the almost infinite knowledge of my colleague to supply any defects in the other parts of the bill in order to carry out the intention which he seems at some time to have to admit the State of South Dokota into the Union.

I will ask the gentleman now whether this election to which he refers in June to declare the sense of the people of South Dakota in favor of the general features of the Sioux Falls constitution, whether the same election could not declare the wishes of the people with regard to any modification of that constitution?

Mr. SPRINGER. Oh, yes; if you submit them seriatim.

Mr. ADAMS. Further, can not that same election declare or provide for the election of the State officers?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS. That is all I want. If the gentleman will give me time I will prepare the other amendments which are necessary.

Mr. SPRINGER. Oh, if the gentleman will give the Committee on the Territories time—say about two weeks—we could probably evolve something rational out of his amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. I am perfectly willing you should have that time.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, I think we have had debate enough to understand the amendment, and I demand the previous question upon it.

Mr. SYMES. I appeal to my colleague on the committee to give opportunity, of which we are now availing ourselves, to prepare and offer an amendment to incorporate in substance the provisions of the Senate bill, or the first part of the Macdonald amendment, which will bring in South Dakota.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the previous question only upon the amendment of his colleague from Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman from Illinois desires to withdraw that amendment and allow the gentleman from Colorado to formulate his views in another, I have no objection, but am entirely willing to agree that he shall do it.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to some remarks which were just made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MANSUR].

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois withdraw the demand for the previous question?

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw it.

Mr. GIFFORD. I refer to the criticisms made upon the constitution by the gentleman from Missouri, and also to some statements which he made in that connection; and I wish to read now the two sections of the constitution relating to corporations to which he has referred, and the House can judge for itself as to whether there is any inconsistency. The constitution, article 17, section 1, in regard to corporations, provides as follows:

SECTION 1. No corporation shall be created or have its charter extended, changed, or amended by special laws, except those for charitable, educational, penal, or reformatory purposes, which are to be and remain under the patronage and control of the State; but the Legislature shall provide by general laws for the organization of all corporations hereafter to be created.

Section 3 provides as follows:

SEC. 3. The Legislature shall not remit the forfeiture of the charter of any corporation now existing, nor alter nor amend the same, nor pass any other general or special law for the benefit of such corporation, except upon the condition that such corporation shall thereafter hold its charter subject to the provisions of this constitution.

Now, further, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman from Missouri let me say that I certainly hope he will not bring in to make mere capital the gossip of Dakota in regard to this matter or any other matter bearing upon the question. He referred to some statement or story he heard in reference to the location of the temporary capital of Dakota. First the gentleman from Illinois commences to criticise our action because every separate proposition in that constitution was not submitted to a vote of the people. I sent to the Speaker's desk an amendment and proposed to submit it, and now the gentleman from Missouri rises to criticise that action of mine.

Mr. SPRINGER. Did you offer that on yesterday?

Mr. GIFFORD. No, sir; on the first day——

Mr. SPRINGER. But when you had the right to amend your bill on yesterday you did not offer that amendment.

Mr. GIFFORD. It was overlooked by the Clerk, but I propose now to ask unanimous consent that it may be taken up. It was a mere oversight.

I never heard a single statement from any gentleman in Dakota, not a statement made to me, that any opposition would be made to the constitution provided these propositions were resubmitted in respect to the location of the temporary capital. Now I would like the gentleman from Missouri to tell us who it was to whom he referred when he spoke of a matter of $50,000 being expended in reference to this corporation clause of the constitution. It is a piece of gossip that I have never heard of, and I would like to know where it comes from. It is mere gossip floating around there through the atmosphere that is bound to come to the surface sometimes in the discussion of such a question as this. Such gossip may be found in all localities, and, as I say, it is bound to come to the surface at some times.

They come to the surface, but they are mere matters of gossip that should have no effect upon the result or decision of this question. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that the matter of the relocation of the capital, or any special section of this constitution, ought to have any bearing upon this question in bringing the House to a decision. These are matters which our people have attempted to settle, and if gentlemen on the other side will permit us we will settle that to our entire satisfaction.

Every proposition in that constitution will be placed before our people to vote upon; so that they may reject or accept them as they see proper. It is our purpose to do that. This matter of boundary is a mere matter of adjustment between North and South Dakota. It is perfectly acceptable to those people. The same is true as to these propositions in the constitution—the questions of prohibition, or minority representation, or re-election of officers, and the adoption of the constitution as an entirety. All this has been done to meet the objections of our Democratic friends in the House and the Senate. And if the gentlemen will keep their noses—if I may be allowed to speak so harshly and perhaps discourteously—out of the business of Dakota, we will get along very well.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Dakota to the fact that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MANSUR] is not in his seat, and therefore he can not expect a reply from him.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask whether the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] on yesterday is the pending amendment?

The SPEAKER. The amendment which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] offered yesterday afternoon was withdrawn in order that a vote might be taken upon the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD]. That vote was taken, and now the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has offered his amendment as a substitute, and to that the gentleman from Illinois has proposed an amendment, which is now pending; and during that no other amendment is in order.

Mr. PERKINS. I understood that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] had withdrawn his amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to offer an amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], if it is in order.

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order at this time.

Mr. GIFFORD. I have an amendment that I desire to offer.

Mr. ADAMS. At the request of the gentleman from Dakota [Mr. GIFFORD] I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. Then I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 3 of the substitute insert:

"Seventh. That at the election for delegates to the constitutional convention in South Dakota each elector may also have written or printed on his ballot the words 'For the Sioux Falls convention of 1885,' or the words 'Against the Sioux Falls convention of 1885'——

Mr. SPRINGER. It should be the "Sioux Falls constitution." It is a mere clerical error.

Mr. PERKINS. I have taken the words as the amendment was printed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will make the correction.

The Clerk then read as follows:

"Also have written or printed on his ballot the words 'For the Sioux Falls constitution of 1885,' or the words 'Against the Sioux Falls constitution of 1885," and if a majority of all votes cast on this question shall be 'For the Sioux Falls constitution of 1885,' and if a division of the Territory is authorized as provided in this section, then it shall be the duty of the convention which may assemble at Sioux Falls as herein provided to resubmit to the people of South Dakota, for ratification or rejection at the election provided for in this act, the constitution framed at Sioux Falls and adopted November 3, 1885, and also the articles and propositions separately submitted at that election, with such changes only as relate to the name and boundary of the proposed State, to the reapportionment of the judicial and legislative districts, and such amendments as may be necessary in order to comply with the provisions of this act; and if a majority of the votes cast on the ratification or rejection of the constitution shall be for the constitution irrespective of the articles separately submitted, then the President of the United States may issue his proclamation, declaring the State of South Dakota admitted as a State in the Union from and after the date of such proclamation. And the Territorial government of the Territory of Dakota shall continue in existence thereafter and apply to that portion of the Territory not embraced in the State of South Dakota until the State of North Dakota is admitted into the Union; but the archives, records, and books of the Territory of Dakota shall remain at the capital of North Dakota until an agreement in reference thereto is reached by said State."

Mr. SPRINGER. The last word should be "States."

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now I want to ask the gentleman, if he desires a vote upon the amendment, if he will not agree to insert, so as to make it clear, after the words "separately submitted," "including the proposition in reference to the location of the seat of government."

Mr. PERKINS. I am offering this as a substitute to the amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. My proposition is merely to make it clearer, so that there may be no misunderstanding or misconstruction. Let it include the question of relocation of the permanent seat of government as provided in my proposition.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. PERKINS. The Delegate from Dakota has an amendment which he desires to offer; and to give him the opportunity to do so I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. GIFFORD. I offer as an amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois the amendment which is sent to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand that the gentleman from Dakota has sent up a proposition here that it will take an hour to read.

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, no.

Mr. SPRINGER. I submit now that good faith requires that you [Mr. GIFFORD] should offer amendments to this proposition, and not try to rehabilitate the Macdonald proposition.

Mr. GIFFORD. This relates only to Dakota.

Mr. SPRINGER. I know; but you are going to try now to eliminate propositions which were settled by the vote of the House, and you are doing what is not in accordance with the agreement.

Mr. GIFFORD. No; this simply relates to Dakota; nothing else.

Mr. SPRINGER. I know; but it takes Dakota all out of this bill, and furthermore, it will take an hour to read it.

Mr. WARNER. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WARNER. I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to say that he rose to a question of order. He stated no question of order, but at once entered into a dispute with the Delegate from Dakota.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has presented no question of order. The amendment of the gentleman from Dakota has not yet been read, and the Chair does not know what it is, or whether it is in order or out of order. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. GIFFORD. I have no desire to have this amendment read at length.

Mr. SPRINGER. It seems to me that the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber are determined that this side of the House shall not have any vote at all upon this question. I have never seen such persistent violation of faith in my whole parliamentary career.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. My point of order is, this amendment is not germane to the amendment that is pending.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the amendment now pending, offered by the gentleman from Illinois, is one which relates to the methods of taking the vote in South Dakota.

Now the gentleman from Dakota proposes a substitute for that, which the Clerk is about to read, which relates to Dakota and to the admission of that Territory as a State.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is an amendment that is not germane to the pending proposition. I can demonstrate that in a moment; and I now ask the gentleman from Dakota to state what it is that he proposes to do.

Several MEMBERS. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. SPRINGER. It will take an hour to read it.

Mr. GIFFORD. I can state in a very few words——

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I insist upon the reading of the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. GIFFORD is as follows:

That the State of South Dakota is hereby declared to be a State of the United States of America, and is hereby admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever; and that the constitution which the people of South Dakota have formed for themselves be, and the same is hereby, accepted, ratified, and confirmed, subject, however, to the provisos hereinafter contained.

SEC. 6. That sections 16 and 36 in every township of the public lands of the United States within said State, and where such sections, or any part thereof, shall be mineral lands, or shall have been sold or otherwise disposed of by the United States according to law, other lands equivalent thereto, in legal subdivisions of not less than one quarter-section, are hereby granted to the said State for the support of common schools; and such sections shall not be subject to pre-emption or entry, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, but shall be reserved for school purposes only.

SEC. 7. That thirty entire sections of the unappropriated public lands within said State, to be selected and located by direction of the Legislature thereof, with the approval of the President, shall be, and are hereby, granted, in legal subdivisions of not less than one quarter-section, to the said State for the purpose of erecting public buildings at the capital of said State for legislative and judicial purposes, to be disposed of in such manner as the Legislature shall prescribe. The lands may be selected out of the public lands within the boundaries of said State, whether surveyed or unsurveyed.

If any of the lands granted by said act of February 18, 1881, and lying within the boundaries of said State, have been sold under the provisions thereof, then the proceeds thereof shall go to said State in lieu of the land sold.

SEC. 9. That ninety sections of land, to be selected and located as provided in section 8 of this act, are hereby granted to said State for the use and support of an agricultural college in said State, and none of the lands granted by this act, or the proceeds thereof, shall be used for any other purpose than that for which the grant is specifically made whatever; and for the maintenance of a school of mines at Rapid City, Dak., there is hereby granted, with the conditions aforesaid, fifty sections of land.

SEC. 11. That 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of sales of all public lands made by the United States within the limits of the said State, prior or subsequent to the passage of this act, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, be, and the same is hereby, granted to the said State of South Dakota for the support of public schools.

SEC. 12. That all mineral land shall be excepted from the grants provided for in this act.

SEC. 13. That immediately after the taking effect of this act the governor and the commissioner of school and public lands of said State shall proceed to ascertain the number of sections 16 and 36 within the limits of said State which are mineral lands, or which shall have been sold or otherwise disposed of by the United States according to law; and the said officers shall then proceed to select, from any unappropriated public lands in said State, a number of sections equal to such mineral lands and the lands so sold or disposed of; and said officers shall also, in addition thereto, select a number of sections equal in number to the total number of sections granted in this act for other than common-school purposes; and when such selections shall have thus been made said officers shall certify a list of the same to the Secretary of the Interior, and if the same shall be approved by him the title to the same shall vest in the said State of South Dakota.

SEC. 14. That all lands herein granted for common-school purposes shall be sold only at public sale and at a price not less than $5 per acre and in parcels not exceeding one quarter-section to any one person, the proceeds to constitute a permanent school fund, the interest of which is only to be expended in the support of common schools.

SEC. 15. That the State of South Dakota shall constitute one judicial district, which shall be called the district of South Dakota, and the circuit and district courts therefor shall be held at the capital of said State for the time being. The judge of said district shall receive a yearly salary of $5,000, payable in four equal installments, on the 1st days of January, April, July, and October of each year, and shall reside in his district. There shall be appointed clerks of said courts, who shall keep their offices at the capital of said State. There shall be appointed for said district one district judge, one United States attorney, and one United States marshal. The regular terms of said courts shall be held at the place aforesaid, on the first Monday in April and the first Monday in November in each year. For judicial purposes the district of South Dakota shall be attached to the eighth judicial circuit, and only one grand jury and one petit jury shall be summoned in both of said courts.

SEC. 16. That the circuit and district courts for the district of South Dakota, and the judges thereof, respectively, shall possess the same powers and jurisdiction and perform the same duties possessed and required to be performed by the other circuit and district courts and judges of the United States, and shall be governed by the same laws and regulations.

SEC. 17. That the marshal, district attorney, and clerks of the circuit and district courts of the said district of South Dakota, and all other officers and other persons performing duty in the administration of justice therein, shall severally possess the powers and perform the duties lawfully possessed and required to be performed by similar officers in other districts of the United States, and shall, for the services they may perform, receive the fees and compensation allowed by law in the State of Nebraska to other similar officers and persons performing similar duties.

SEC. 18. SEC. 27. That at the time of the election herein provided for, the people of said proposed State of South Dakota shall have submitted to them, for their ratification or rejection, the constitution heretofore stated as having been formed and adopted, together with each of the separate articles thereof, in conformity with the schedule of said constitution, not including the selection of the temporary seat of government, and at said election there shall be elected the State, judicial, and other officers and members of the Legislature of the said State of South Dakota, provided for in the constitution of said State; and also two Representatives in the House of Representatives of the United States Congress; and if a majority of the votes cast at said election upon the acceptance of both change of name and boundaries and of said constitution shall be in the affirmative, as hereinafter provided, the governor, judicial, and State officers thus elected shall have power to at once quality and enter upon the duties of their respective offices, and they and the members of the Legislature thus elected shall hold their offices until the next general election in November, 1890, unless otherwise provided by the laws of said State, and until their successors are

SEC. 28. That said election shall be governed in all respects by the laws of the Territory of Dakota governing elections and the canvass and return of the votes thereof. Within twenty days after the day of said election, the respective officers and county canvassers having by the law of the Territory of Dakota such duties in charge, shall make returns of the votes so cast for and against each of said propositions to the governor of said Territory of Dakota. And this act of admission shall then have full force and effect, and said constitution shall be deemed amended so as to conform to said changes. But if a majority of said votes so cast shall not be in favor of both of said propositions, and not in favor of the adoption of said constitution, then this act, so far as it relates to South Dakota, shall cease to have further force or effect.

SEC. 34. That said convention, having formed such constitution as provided in this act, shall provide by ordinance for submitting the same to the people of said State for their ratification or rejection, at an election to be held at such time and places and under such regulations as said convention may prescribe.

SEC. 36. That on receipt of such certification of the votes so cast at said election, showing adoption of said constitution by the people of the said State as aforesaid, and a copy of such constitution and ordinances, the President of the United States, if said constitution and ordinances shall conform to the requirements of this act, shall thereupon transmit a copy of said constitution and ordinances and result of said vote to Congress, and thereupon the said State shall be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States by a special act of Congress for that purpose.

SEC. 55. That in respect of all cases, proceedings, and matters pending in the supreme or district courts of the Territory of Dakota at the time of admission of said State into the Union, arising within the limits of said State, whereof the circuit or district court by this act established might have had jurisdiction under the laws of the United States had such courts existed at the time of the commencement of such cases, the said circuit and district courts, respectively, shall be the successors of said supreme and district courts of said Territory; and all the files, records, indictments, and proceedings relating thereto shall be transferred to said circuit and district courts, respectively, and the same shall be proceeded with therein in due course of law: Provided, however, That in all civil actions, causes, and proceedings, in which the United States is not a party, such transfer shall not be made except upon the written request of one of the parties to such action or proceeding filed in the proper court.

SEC. 56. The Clerk read the first three sections of the amendment.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I withdraw the demand for the further reading of the amendment.

Mr. SOWDEN. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio proposes to withdraw his demand for the reading of the amendment, but if the regular order is demanded, of course that is the regular order, and the Clerk will continue the reading of the amendment.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, sufficient has been read to inform the House of the nature of the proposition, and I hope the demand for the regular order will be withdrawn.

Mr. SOWDEN. I withdraw the demand for the regular order.

Mr. GIFFORD. I have no desire to be captious about this at all. I do not desire the reading of the amendment at length, but only so far as may be necessary for the information of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard a moment in regard to this. I understand that it is a proposition to insert in this part of the bill the Senate bill itself and fifty-seven sections of the MACDONALD proposition which was voted down this morning. Is that it?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPRINGER. To insert the Senate bill at this place in the pending bill and the greater part of the MACDONALD proposition?

The SPEAKER. If the amendment is the same as the Senate bill, the Chair thinks it is not in order, because the question now pending before the House is simply the question between the substitute and the Senate bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. That was the point of order that I made.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Is it not a substitute which relates to the same matter?

The SPEAKER. If the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Dakota contains any substantial provisions which are not contained in the Senate bill, the Chair thinks it would be in order to offer it as a substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois; but it would not be in order to offer as a substitute the identical provisions of the Senate bill. That is the question now pending before the House.

Mr. SYMES. I can state that there are in the amendment as now offered provisions quite different from the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. The amendment has not been read, and therefore the Chair has not been informed as to its contents.

Mr. SYMES. I have read it carefully and made an abstract of every section of it. I am sure my statement is correct.

Mr. SPRINGER. I appeal to the other side of the House whether we have not conceded everything they asked when we gave them a vote upon the Macdonald amendment before we were allowed to vote on the substitute I have offered; and I have now consented to admit the proposition of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] and have a vote upon it, that being an amendment in good faith to the pending substitute. But to undertake now to inject into this substitute the whole of the Senate bill and the greater portion of the Macdonald substitute, when the pending proposition is to strike out the Senate bill and insert what I have submitted, is entirely foreign to the rules and to the understanding which was had.

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order, as the Chair has said, to move to insert the Senate bill, but it is stated that this amendment contains provisions different from those of the Senate bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no idea what they are.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. Then we had better have the amendment read. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. GIFFORD. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire, then, to reoffer the amendment I heretofore presented.

Mr. STRUBLE. Let it be reported again.

The Clerk read the amendment of Mr. PERKINS, as follows:

At the end of section 3 of the substitute insert:

"Seventh. That at the election for delegates to the constitutional convention in South Dakota each elector may also have written or printed on his ballot the words 'For the Sioux Falls constitution of 1885,' or the words 'Against the Sioux Falls constitution of 1885;' and if a majority of all votes cast on this question shall be 'For the Sioux Falls constitution of 1885,' and if a division of the Territory is authorized as provided in this section, then it shall be the duty of the convention which may assemble at Sioux Falls as herein provided, to resubmit to the people of South Dakota, for ratification or rejection at the election provided for in this act, the constitution framed at Sioux Falls and adopted November 3, 1885, and also the articles and propositions separately submitted at that election, with such changes only as relate to the name and boundary of the proposed State, to the reapportionment of the judicial and legislative districts, and such amendments as may be necessary in order to comply with the provisions of this act; and if a majority of the votes cast on the ratification or rejection of the constitution shall be for the constitution irrespective of the articles separately submitted, then the President of the United States may issue his proclamation, declaring the State of South Dakota admitted as a State in the Union from and after the date of such proclamation. And the Territorial government of the Territory of Dakota shall continue in existence thereafter and apply to that portion of the Territory not embraced in the State of South Dakota until the State of North Dakota is admitted into the Union; but the archives, records, and books of the Territory of Dakota shall remain at the capital of North Dakota until an agreement in reference thereto is reached by said States."

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Kansas, before the vote is taken upon his amendment, to accept an amendment which merely perfects the text and does not change the substance of the proposition a particle. I ask the gentleman to accept this amendment:

After the words "propositions separately submitted at that election" insert "including the question of locating the temporary seat of government."

Mr. PERKINS. If there is no objection on the part of the gentleman from Dakota [Mr. GIFFORD] to the proposition, I will accept it.

Mr. GIFFORD. I have no objection.

Mr. PERKINS. Then I accept it.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be so modified. The question is now upon the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, as modified, being proposed as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. MACDONALD. I am in favor of the adoption of this amendment; I was about to offer it myself. I want to say a word in the nature of personal explanation on this subject in order to place myself right with reference to the action of this side of the House upon my amendment this morning. I did not make any effort to press my amendment this morning, because I was led to believe that the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] was the one now pending and which is printed in the RECORD to-day. But that amendment and the one submitted by that gentleman are not the same, and, as shown, omits providing for South Dakota being admitted by the proclamation of the President. Therefore, so far as I was concerned I was misled. I make this statement in justice to myself, as otherwise it might appear singular that I made no more effort than I did to press my own amendment. The amendment about to be voted upon is satisfactory to me, as far as it goes.

In this connection I wish also to state that my amendment or bill was not in conflict with what was agreed upon in the caucus held by the Democratic members. That caucus simply decided that the committee should report an omnibus bill, as it is termed, providing for the organization and admission of the Territories named in the bills under consideration, and that the question of division should be resubmitted to the people of Dakota. This was all that was decided by the caucus, and my amendment or bill provided for all this and more. Our caucus did not decide that the bill proposed should not permit the admission of South Dakota without another constitutional convention being held therein.

I make this statement because it has been stated to gentlemen upon this side that the introduction of this bill by me was in violation of what had been determined upon in caucus, which is not true. Such a decision of the caucus, if it had been made, would not have been entitled to respect; but it was not, and no doubt for this reason.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. PERKINS as modified, it was agreed to.

Mr. PAYSON. I move to amend by striking out, in line 12 of section 12, the words "1st day of January, 1890," and inserting "survey of said section or the passage of this act."

Mr. SPRINGER. I am willing to accept that amendment.

Mr. PAYSON. The provision in the bill is that all actual settlers may make settlement up to the 1st day of January, 1890. This would cut out those who might settle upon unsurveyed lands at any time thereafter. The amendment I have submitted obviates this objection and should commend itself to the good judgment of the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOOLE. I offer the amendment which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding to section 2 as amended the following:

"And thereupon the President of the United States may issue his proclamation declaring the State of Montana admitted as a State into the Union from and after the date of such proclamation."

Mr. SPRINGER. This puts Montana in precisely the same position as South Dakota.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. That is all right. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Now, there should be the same in regard to Washington.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, I move an amendment, in line 17 of section 12, to strike out the words—and I ask the attention of the chairman of the committee—"not less than $6 per acre."

Mr. SPRINGER. And insert what?

Mr. WARNER. Insert no amount. Leave these lands to be paid for at their appraised value.

Mr. SPRINGER. Other school lands can not be sold for less than $10 per acre.

Mr. GIFFORD. I suggest to the gentleman that he move to strike out "six" and insert "ten," and then it will be in accordance with the other provisions of the section.

Mr. WARNER. I yield to the gentleman from Dakota for a moment.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Missouri will withdraw his amendment for a moment I will move to strike out all of that section after the word "company," in line 9 of section 12, all the remainder of the section. I think it should all go out.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] has just put in an amendment that this provision shall not apply except to settlements before surveys were made.

Mr. GIFFORD. I think this whole provision is objectionable all through. But I will withdraw the amendment temporarily and allow the gentleman from Missouri to proceed.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, I offer this amendment, and think it would be in the interest of the public schools of that Territory if it was adopted. It provides that these parties who have settled upon the school lands shall be permitted to take them at their assessed value exclusive of improvements. That is all the amendment provides.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope that amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. PAYSON. Let the amendment be read.

The amendment was stated at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. PAYSON. I move to amend the amendment by inserting the necessary words to provide that these lands may be taken, under the circumstances specified, at $1.25 per acre, and I desire to be heard upon the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. PAYSON. This section provides for securing to the people who have gone on these public lands affected by the operation of this provision in advance of survey the right to the lands under certain conditions. They went onto the lands without any anticipation of the fact that the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections would eventually be reserved for public-school purposes. I insist that after they have made their settlements under the general land law of the United States, and did all that was required of them under the law, they should not now be required to pay a high price for availing themselves of that opportunity which the law gave them. They are there and went there in good faith. This legislation is against the interests that they are attempting to build up for themselves; and when they made their settlement, being invited thereto by the existing law, they had a right to take these lands at $1.25 per acre, and because this bill provides that if any settlement so made shall interfere with the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections to which Dakota would be entitled under the general law when admitted, then I hold that these settlers who went in good faith upon the lands, and I think it will not be disputed as a matter of right, should be allowed to take them at the rate at which they could obtain them under the general law. It is a perfectly clear proposition. Why have an appraisement fixed upon the lands hereafter, when the only reason against securing a title now is the fact that the lands are unsurveyed? The Government invites the settler to go upon the unsurveyed lands and under the pre-emption or homestead laws—under the pre-emption if payment is required—he may acquire his title by complying with the conditions of the law and upon the payment of $1.25 per acre. You now supplement these laws by this legislation, giving the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections to the States for school purposes, and because these lands so revert to the State we should not require these settlers who have gone on them in good faith to pay more than they would have been required to pay under the general land law.

Mr. LIND. Let me suggest to the gentleman that he is proceeding upon the assumption that these settlers went upon the lands with the anticipation that they could acquire title to them from the Government. That does not seem to be correct, for the bill says, "with the intention in good faith of purchasing such lands from the State upon its admission." So that in this connection the amendment of the gentleman would be wholly improper, I think. The gentleman provides for a contingency which can not arise.

Mr. PAYSON. The section seems to be intended to provide for the disposal of the occupied school lands settled upon prior to survey.

Mr. LIND. No, prior to a certain date.

Mr. PAYSON. Then it has been amended.

Mr. WARNER. If the gentleman will have it read, he will see that he does not want the amendment to this provision. It will be a robbing of the school funds.

Mr. DORSEY. It will give the settlers on school lands the same right as on other lands.

Mr. LIND. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. PAYSON. In order to save time I will withdraw my amendment, reserving the right to renew it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, which is to strike out the words read by the Clerk.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WARNER. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 48.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. STRUBLE. I propose an amendment to section 2.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman from Iowa permitted to renew his amendment?

The SPEAKER. He withdrew it on that condition. The Clerk will read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following words from lines 18 and 19 of section 2: "But no elector shall vote for more than two persons for delegate to such convention."

Mr. STRUBLE. It will be noticed by gentlemen who are giving this attention that this section provides for the election of three delegates from the respective districts. These words which I propose shall be stricken out limit the electors to two votes for these delegates in these Territories, with a view of adopting the minority principle of representation. The minority principle may be popular in the State of Illinois. For one, I am opposed to it. I want it left out of this bill, and therefore I hope that members will join me in giving it the "grand bounce."

Mr. SPRINGER. It simply provides that in each of the districts there shall be elected three delegates to the constitutional convention, and that each elector shall vote for two of those three. That is giving the minority a chance to be represented in the constitutional convention, while the majority has the right to control. I am informed by my friend from Pennsylvania that the delegates to the last constitutional convention of that State were elected in the same way. It is proposed in a spirit of fairness to everybody.

Mr. STRUBLE. Let these people make this provision when the Territory has become a State; then they can pass on it for themselves.

Mr. SPRINGER. They may make that provision.

Mr. STRUBLE. Very well; but do not force it upon them.

Mr. SPRINGER. This is to provide for delegates before the convention meets; after they are in convention they can fix it for the future as they like. South Dakota submitted this proposition, and over 11,000 people voted to put it or a similar provision in the constitution for the election of members of the Legislature. I hope in deference to that large number this concession will be made.

Mr. STRUBLE. I have no objection to the State making that provision, but I do not think Congress ought to force it upon them.

Mr. GIFFORD. I desire to state that, so far as our people are concerned, they do not desire this proposition. I have not said anything about it up to this time because it related to the other Territories; but we want no minority representation in Dakota at all.

A MEMBER on the Democratic side. Of course not.

Mr. GIFFORD. It is true it was voted upon when it was submitted to the people; but there is no demand for it. There is no discussion there; none of these people desire it or care anything about it; and we really do not want it, so far as we are concerned. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that he was unable to determine how the House had voted.

The House then divided; and there were—ayes 72, noes 74.

Mr. STRUBLE. I felt disposed to ask for tellers upon this; but I will not.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 5 the following: "And if it shall appear therefrom that the provisions of this act have been complied with in connection with the Territories of Washington and New Mexico, and a majority of the votes have been cast in favor of the constitution, the President of the United States shall thereupon issue his proclamation declaring such States admitted to the Union; and thereupon said States shall be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States without any further action on the part of Congress."

Mr. VOORHEES. The purpose of this amendment is to place the Territories of Washington and New Mexico, with reference to a speedy admission into the Union, in precisely the same attitude in which the Territories of Dakota, North and South, and Montana have already been placed by amendments recently adopted; and I know of no good reason why the Territories of Washington and New Mexico should be deprived of such an opportunity of a speedy method of admission into the Union. I therefore hope my amendment will be adopted.

Every one understands the uncertainty incident to and attendant upon an effort to secure legislation through Congress, and although the objection might be urged that Washington and New Mexico at this time are not provided with constitutions, it is as certain as anything that has not yet transpired that they will adopt constitutions. The purpose of this amendment is simply to give to Washington and New Mexico the same privileges accorded to Montana and Dakota, and I think it is no more than just and right that the amendment should prevail.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it competent to ask for a division of that question? We have voted separately in regard to Dakota and in regard to Montana, and I do not see the propriety of putting these propositions together.

Mr. VOORHEES. I simply want to treat all the Territories fairly. I have no objection to striking out New Mexico and letting the Delegate from that Territory offer the proposition. Let my amendment be confined to Washington.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Washington Territory to the fact that this is not putting the other Territories upon the same footing with South Dakota and Montana, for the reason that South Dakota and Montana have presented constitutions which are before us now and have been printed, and upon which we have passed for ourselves and satisfied ourselves that they are republican in form; but no constitutions have been formed in Washington, New Mexico, or North Dakota, and therefore we have simply reserved to Congress the right to admit those Territories when they come here with constitutions in accordance with the terms of this act.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. Speaker, in response to the observations of the chairman of the Committee on Territories, I desire to state that Washington did adopt a constitution in 1878, and the only reason we are not before Congress to-day asking for action upon that constitution is that, because of the policy of non-action which has characterized Congress in connection with this matter, we have grown away from the constitution made in 1878. For that reason, and for that reason alone, we are not here with a constitution.

Mr. SYMES. I hope the amendment will be adopted. Several States have been admitted into the Union upon the proclamation of the President, the last being the centennial State—Colorado. That State was admitted into the Union without the constitution being brought here and submitted to Congress. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is very well to say that Congress does not know what kind of a constitution will be adopted; but I think the President of the United States is an intelligent gentleman, familiar with the rules which govern republican institutions in this country, and I think that the people of this great Territory are as competent to-day to judge whether a constitution is republican in form and to provide for emergencies in their organic laws as are the members of Congress of any of the States in this Union, and I hope that this amendment will be adopted, and that Washington Territory will be admitted into the Union under the proclamation of the President, as other States have been.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. VOORHEES, and it was rejected—ayes 58, noes 64.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now demand the previous question, and pending that I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], who desires to offer an amendment to the twelfth section.

Mr. WARNER. I also wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. PAYSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk, to come in at the end of section 7.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Provided, That the rights of all settlers on unsurveyed lands under the general land laws, upon land found upon survey to be within sixteenth or thirty-sixth sections, where their settlements were made before survey, or the approval of this act, shall be preserved, and where payment shall be required it shall be at the rate of $1.25 per acre.

Mr. SPRINGER. With that modification I have no objection to the adoption of that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the previous question. The question is upon ordering the previous question upon the amendment and upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 72, noes 5.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. No quorum.

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw the demand for the previous question in order to allow the gentleman from Florida to offer his amendment.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

In line 7 of section 1, after the words "New Mexico," insert "Utah and Arizona."

Mr. SPRINGER. I make the point of order that that amendment is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already decided this question of order upon a proposition offered by the gentleman from Illinois himself at the beginning of these proceedings. The amendment must be ruled out as not germane.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman from Florida [Mr. DOUGHERTY] desires to be heard five minutes, I have no objection.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I would like to be heard.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House upon which debate is in order.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I move to amend by striking out the last word. My purpose in offering the amendment which was read was to secure the admission of Utah and Arizona as States of the Union. I am unable to understand why a bill which is characterized as an "omnibus bill," coming from the Democratic side of the House, should undertake to bring in all the Republican Territories of the United States and exclude the Democratic Territories. [Laughter and applause.] If I were in charge of this measure the plan I would pursue would be to exclude the Republican Territories till after the next Presidential election and admit all the Democratic Territories. This ought to have been done long since, and all naturally inclined that way would now be Democratic States. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. REED. The Democratic party has done one-half of what you want.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. If I had my way I would do the whole thing, because I believe it to be right in principle and good policy also.

Mr. REED. You are a more sincere Democrat than the rest of them.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I hope I am as much so as any.

Mr. Speaker, why are the people of Utah excluded? It is in my judgment because of their religious belief. They are among the most reliable Democrats in this country. They have been persecuted into that political faith. [Laughter and applause.] Mr. Speaker, does this interruption come out of my time? A gentleman suggests that I should always be willing to yield for applause; but, sir, applause from the Republican side of the House is not usually pleasant to me. I do not often get it, and when it comes from the Republican side it frightens me; I fear I may be going wrong.

Without passing any opinion as to the religious belief of the people of Utah, for it is none of my business, I know they are right in their political belief when they belong to the Democratic party. [Renewed laughter and applause.] These other Territories, had they been promptly admitted by the Democratic party while in the majority here, would now, in all probability, have been reliable Democratic States.

A great deal has been said as to the constitutions under which these Territories are to be admitted. A great deal of talk has been indulged in on that subject; and I am ready to believe that it has changed just as few votes as what I am saying will change, because on a question like this no speech ever delivered on this floor ever changed, in my experience and observation, a single vote. Gentlemen who are here as representatives of the American people are competent to make up their minds upon a subject without information from other members, and usually do so.

But, recurring to these constitutions, every gentleman here knows well that, once admitted to the Union, those Territories, having become sovereign States, can do as the other States of this Union are at liberty to do—alter, revise, or amend their constitutions at pleasure. Still, while I believe it is not competent for the Congress of the United States or the whole Government to interfere with a man in his religious belief, it is competent for Congress in the organic law for the admission of Utah to put restrictions which will prevent the practice of a religion in such a way as to be violative of the law of the land. It is a wise provision in the Constitution which prohibits any interference with the religious opinions of any person, but there is nothing in it to prevent the inhibition of the practice of any religion which is shocking to the moral sense of civilized mankind and contrary to the law of this country. I believe that all these Territories should be admitted. Certainly Utah has all the qualifications which have been urged in favor of the admission of these other Territories. She has population, she has industries, she has resources. Her people are honest, thrifty, and industrious. Why should she be kept out? She has offered a constitution forever doing away with her curse of polygamy.

I believe that it is bad politics for any party to admit Territories in such a way as to increase the strength of their opponents and keep out Territories which would add to their own strength. [Applause and laughter.] It is bad politics, and in my judgment it is bad leadership, or, worse, it is none at all. Just such alleged leadership as this, that of alleged statesmen upon this floor, has put the Democratic party in the position it now occupies. The leaders of a party should do all that is honest and fair to strengthen their party. While it is right to control by law the action of men, it is not just or right to deprive them under democratic institutions of any privilege because of religious opinions entertained by them. Let them believe as they see fit, but control by law their actions. Let in Arizona and Utah; they will both be Democratic States. New Mexico will also be Democratic. Put into the hands of every resident of that Territory who can read, and into the heads of those who can not, the substance of the views of the Republican minority of the Committee on Territories, and if they have one particle of self-respect that document will make them, or a majority of them, reliable Democrats.

But a disregard of such a policy and the leadership of such statesmen as have been described are what have brought about, in the language of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr ALLEN], in a speech of his the other day, "the condition and not the theory which confronts us." [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I now ask the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks the previous question on the amendments and on ordering the bill to be read the third time.

Mr. KERR. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think we have had enough amendments. I insist upon the demand. I hope the gentleman will let us have a vote.

The question being taken on ordering the previous queston, there were—ayes 85, noes 5.

Mr. KERR. No quorum.

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw the call for the previous question, and yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR].

Mr. KERR. I move to amend by striking out, in line 12 of section 3, the words "both those events," and inserting "either of those events."

Mr. Speaker, the provision of the bill, as it stands, requires that both Territories shall, by their votes, declare in favor of division, otherwise there shall be no division. Now, in view of the fact that the people of these Territories have already declared by their vote in favor of division, and in view also of the fact that three-fourths of the population of these Territories are now in South Dakota, it would be a manifest injustice to allow the seperate statehood of South Dakota to be dependent upon an affirmative vote in North Dakota in favor of division. I insist, therefore, that the amendment I have submitted ought to be in the bill. I will say further that I am in favor or the bill, if this amendment be made. I believe that these Territories, including New Mexico, ought all to be admitted into the Union as States, if they have the requisite population, and I believe they have. But if this provision is not inserted in the bill, and the separate statehood of the great Territory of South Dakota is made to depend upon the will of another Territory, I can not vote for the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman does not intend to vote for it anyway, I believe.

Mr. KERR. I do, if this amendment be agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now move the previous question upon the pending amendments, and upon the third reading of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The question being taken upon the amendment of Mr. KERR, it was not agreed to, there being—ayes 74, noes 92.

DAKOTA.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Several members demanded a division.

Mr. SPRINGER. We had better have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 133, nays 120, not voting 69; as follows:

So Mr. SPRINGER'S substitute was adopted.

On motion of Mr. BAKER, of New York, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL with Mr. GOFF, until further notice.

Mr. RUSK with Mr. YOST, until further notice.

Mr. MCMILLIN with Mr. HOUK, until Monday next.

Mr. ENLOE with Mr. WHITE, of New York, for this day.

Mr. FORD with Mr. BINGHAM, for this day.

Mr. ROWLAND with Mr. WICKHAM, for the rest of the day.

Mr. HARE with Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, for the rest of the day.

Mr. GRANGER with Mr. HAYDEN for this day.

Mr. STAHLNECKER with Mr. NUTTING, for the rest of the day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The question recurred upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. Upon the passage of the bill I demand the previous question.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Pending that, I move to recommit with the following instructions.

The SPEAKER. The instructions will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Recommit the bill with instructions to report forthwith: First, a bill providing for the admission of South Dakota into the Union; secondly, enabling acts for North Dakota, Montana, and Washington Territories, respectively.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. On that I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. On the motion to recommit with instructions I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. This simply leaves out New Mexico and brings in a separate bill for each Territory——

Mr. BAKER, of New York. It does not interfere with New Mexico at all.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 118, nays 131, not voting 73, as follows:

So the motion to recommit with instructions was rejected.

On motion of Mr. WHEELER, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Alabama, with Mr. LYMAN, on all political questions, until further notice.

Mr. MATSON with Mr. GAINES, for the rest of the day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the demand for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, before the question is taken on the passage of the bill, I ask the indulgence of the House for five minutes. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. Under the rules the gentleman is entitled to an hour to close the debate.

Mr. SPRINGER. I only want five minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that the proposition which is now pending and which will soon be put upon its passage provides for the admission of five States into the Union, if the people of Dakota shall determine on the division of that Territory. If they shall not favor such division, it will bring in four States at the beginning of the next session of Congress. The advantages of this measure over the Senate bill are these, that the Senate proposition only deals with Dakota while this deals with four of the present Territories and makes possible the creation of five great States.

If the House should pass this Senate bill it would be all the legislation which we could reasonably expect in reference to new States at this session. South Dakota has no just grounds to claim this distinction, this special favor, this partiality at our hands, while more populous to-day than any other proposed State; yet North Dakota, Montana, Washington, and New Mexico have each a population above the ratio of one member in the House of Representatives, and are equally entitled to admission. Let them all come in together, not only upon an equal footing with the original States, but upon an equal footing as to each other.

It is idle to speculate upon the future politics of these new States. All predictions on this subject are worthless. No man can tell what a year will bring forth in any of the Territories of the West. In 1892 South Dakota may cast her electoral vote for the nominees of the Democratic party, and Montana and New Mexico may be found on the other side. Nor should we consult our fears in a matter of this kind. Fear not the American people—they may all be safely trusted. Those who go West to better their conditions are generally the bravest, the wisest, and the most progressive. The broad plains and lofty mountains invariably expand their ideas and liberalize their minds. [Applause.] The man of contracted vision in the East becomes, in the West, broad-gauged and full of charity for all mankind. The great West is destined in the near future to furnish the country with its profoundest jurists, its wisest philosophers, its greatest statesmen. [Renewed applause.]

It is a great mistake to suppose that the arid regions are worthless. The extensive systems of irrigation now being perfected by private enterprise and contemplated by Congress will, in the near future, reclaim the waste places and produce food products in marvelous abundance. The most stupendous works of the ancients were the irrigating canals of the Pharaohs, of the Arabians, of the Assyrians, and of the Peruvians and Aztecs. By the irrigating canals the deserts of the Old World as well as those of the New were reclaimed thousands of years ago and made to furnish sustenance for unknown millions of inhabitants. With the superior skill and enterprise of our people, with more salubrious climate and productive soils, what possibilities does not the future offer in this respect! The results already realized demonstrate that irrigated lands are more productive than those depending upon natural rainfall. The wonderful development of Southern California furnishes conclusive proof on this point.

It will cost less of human effort to reclaim the arid regions of the West than it has already cost per acre to subdue the forests of Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana. Hence there will be no waste places or unproductive plains in this country in the near future. Our deserts are already responding to the touch of husbandry, are already furnishing food and fruits for millions of our people, are fast filling the land with wealth and plenty. The deserts having been reclaimed and made available for homes for the people, immigration will rapidly move westward, new and great commonwealths will spring into existence in place of our sparsely-settled Territories; cities which will rival New York and Philadelphia in magnificence will within the next century dot the plains and nestle in the foot-hills of the Rocky Mountains. The center of population within the next quarter of a century will be at a point near the banks of the Mississippi River, and within fifty years from this time two hundred millions of people will find happy homes and remunerative employment and enjoy the blessings of freedom in the States of the American Union. [Applause.]

As the course of empire is rapidly moving westward let us prepare our Territories for the coming tide of population. Let us clothe them with all the habiliments of statehood. Let us extend to their people all the rights which we of the States enjoy. Under the bill which I have proposed two Dakotas may be admitted if the people there desire it; and Montana, Washington, and New Mexico, five States in all, may be added as bright stars to the constellation of the Union.

The population of these prospective States is over 1,100,000 at this time, and with the dawn of the twentieth century they will have at least 5,000,000 inhabitants. Their combined area is nearly 500,000 square miles, an area larger than the thirteen original States and Great Britain and Ireland combined. Their resources, now in their infancy, will soon contribute untold millions of dollars to the wealth of the nation. Their conservatism and patriotic devotion to our flag will add new strength and security to the Union. Other Territories of equal promise for the future will soon be ready for admission into the Union as States, and the time is not far distant, I trust, when there will be no Territorial provinces within our jurisdiction to mar the perfection of the Republic.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. SPRINGER and Mr. SOWDEN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The queston was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 145, nays 98, not voting 79; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

During the call of the roll, on motion of Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Before announcing the result of the vote the Chair will lay before the House the following personal request.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ENLOE requests leave of absence, on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the leave will be granted.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to amend the title of the bill so as to correspond with the act, and send the proposed title to the Clerk's desk; and on that I move the previous question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I desire to move an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has demanded the previous question.

The amendment of the title proposed by Mr. SPRINGER was read, as follows:

A bill to enable the people of Dakota, Montana, Washington, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments, and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, to provide for the division of Dakota into two States, and to make donations of public lands to such States.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I suppose that on that question we have a right to debate.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is ordered before there is any debate, there will be thirty minutes for debate.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I move to recommit the proposition with instructions to report the following as a substitute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that a motion to recommit an amendment is in order in the House. This is an amendment to the title of the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand the regular order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Do I understand the Chair to rule that this motion to recommit is not in order?

The SPEAKER. The motion to recommit an amendment is not in order under the rules of the House, and by reason of the rules alone. Under the express rules of the House it is in order to recommit a bill after the previous question has been ordered, but a motion to recommit an amendment is not in order, and has never been in the House. It is at the other end of the Capitol, but not here. Under the rules of the House there are thirty minutes allowed for debate.

Mr. GROSVENOR withholds his remarks for revision. [See Appendix.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I reserve the time on this side.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Speaker, upon the final vote upon this measure I felt constrained to vote in the negative. It would have been a great pleasure to me had the bill been so protected that I could have voted in the affirmative. I voted for the so-called Macdonald amendment. I also voted for the motion to recommit with instructions. But there is that in this bill which I can not support, in that it indefinitely postpones the admission of Dakota, or any part of Dakota, while it keeps the word of promise to the ear and breaks it to the hope. I can explain in but one way the course of our Democratic friends on the other side. If they had passed the Macdonald amendment this morning, then on the first Monday of next December there would have been here two Representatives from Dakota, and two Republican Senators at the other end of the Capitol, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], and those who follow his lead, were not willing to witness that spectacle.

The gentleman has told us that the proposition which has just been adopted will make a difference of only a few days; yet he well knows, from his long experience in this House, that no measure is going through the next Congress in the first ten days, or the first thirty days, or the first ninety days. He knows perfectly well that the rejection of the Macdonald amendment means the keeping of Dakota out of the Union until the close of the first session, and probably until the close of the second session of the Fifty-first Congress. Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to enable every one of these Territories, including New Mexico. I believe myself that we can not draw the line upon the number of educated people in a Territory nor upon the number that speak English tongue. I believe that New Mexico ought to be enabled, in due course, to prepare herself for the duties and responsibilities of statehood. But, Mr. Speaker, I am utterly, positively, and forever opposed to tying this carcass of New Mexico upon the living body of Dakota. Let it stand upon its own basis. Let each stand upon its own merit. Let them come in in due order and sequence, when they shall have complied with their several enabling acts. But to longer keep out this magnificent Territory of Dakota, which long years ago was ready for all the functions, duties, and responsibilities of statehood, is an outrage, not only upon that great community, but is equally an outrage upon the community from which those, our fellow-citizens, have gone forth to make their home upon the Western prairies.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment to the title.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the title was amended; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the preamble.

Mr. SPRINGER. Upon that I ask the previous question.

Several MEMBERS. Let it be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the preamble.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the people of that part of the Territory of Dakota lying south of the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude did, on the 25th day of September, 1885, by a convention of delegates called and assembled for that purpose, form for themselves a constitution and State government, which constitution is republican in form and in conformity with the Constitution of the United States, and has been adopted by a popular vote; and

Whereas said convention and the people have asked the admission of that part of said Territory included within the boundaries of the proposed State into the Union of States on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever: Therefore, etc.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to strike out the preamble.

Mr. STRUBLE. No, no. That is the best thing there is in the bill now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the question is, Will the House agree to it?

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 71, noes 82.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to move to make the preamble apply to the other Territories?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The preamble is no part of the bill in a parliamentary sense. It must be agreed to or disagreed to.

The question was taken on agreeing to the preamble; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 91, nays 108, not voting 123; as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY). This being Friday, and the hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the House, in accordance with its standing order, takes a recess until half past 7 o'clock to-night, the evening session to be devoted to pension business.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past 7 o'clock p. m., and was called to order by Mr. MCCREARY as Speaker pro tempore.

The Clerk read the following:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 18, 1889.

SIR: Hon. JAMES B. MCCREARY is designated to preside as Speaker pro tempore at the session of the House this evening.

JOHN G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

REBECCA H. LYON.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Invalid Pensions requested their chairman to ask unanimous consent for the passage of the bill (H. R. 11757) granting a pension to Rebecca H. Lyon. The chairman of the committee, being unavoidably detained from the House this evening, has asked me to submit the request. This is one of the saddest cases that has ever come before our committee. The bill is for the relief of a lady who served as an Army nurse and is now living in this city, utterly helpless, and dependent upon charity, having spent her whole fortune—some $20,000—for the benefit of the soldiers. On behalf of the committee I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, and that it be now considered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Rebecca H. Lyon, a nurse in the late war, and pay her a pension of $25 per month.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11757) granting a pension to Rebecca H. Lyon, have considered the same and now submit the following report:

The claimant herein, as appears from the papers before the committee, was a volunteer nurse in the Union Army during the late war. She was not regularly enrolled as a nurse, but served faithfully as such, paying her own expenses, and contributed freely of her own means, in consequence of that service, to the amount of $20,000. While engaged as such nurse, at Camp Parole and Fairfax Seminary, she contracted rheumatism. For more than twenty years she has been a helpless cripple, unable to walk or even to lift her hand to her mouth. She is completely and permanently disabled and depends wholly on private charity. The Washington Gazette of July 9, 1882, contains the following in relation to the claimant:

"In speaking of art I am reminded of a very pathetic picture I saw a few days since. Miss R. H. Lyon, one of the volunteer nurses during the late war, contracted rheumatism from exposure, and for the last fifteen years she has not walked one step. Her hands drawn out of shape, her fingers turned to a purple, deathly hue, are a sight to bring tears to one's eyes. I recently visited her, at 318 Pennsylvania avenue, and found her actually painting in oil colors a landscape some one had ordered.

"A servant held the canvas up for her, another one supported her arm and kept it in position, and in this way Miss Lyon makes her 'daubs,' as she calls them. 'Oh, dear,' she says, 'what an effort I have to make to reach the top of those mountains!' What a picture I saw! A woman who gave her time and money, health, and more than life for the Union and the 'boys in blue,' painting with these poor deformed hands to earn something to support herself! Verily, we are a patriotic, grateful people!"

From the evidence before us, we find that claimant was a sound, healthy woman prior to her service as a nurse; that she incurred rheumatism while engaged in said service, which has increased in severity until she became totally helpless; that she is now in entirely destitute circumstances, and dependent upon charity for subsistence. We believe the case is one which justifies Congressional action, and we therefore submit a favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the special order; and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that the course heretofore pursued be adopted this evening; that is, that the names of members be called in their alphabetical order, commencing where the Clerk left off on the last occasion, and that each member as reached be permitted to call up a bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN] that in Committee of the Whole House this evening the proceedings be conducted as heretofore, each member being permitted to call up a bill when his name is reached in alphabetical order, and that the Clerk commence the call where he left off at the last session for pension business? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. CHIPMAN, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the special order, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

Mr. SAWYER. I understand that the call stopped somewhere in the letter S. My name was first on the list upon the last call, but I was not here when it was reached. I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted now to call up a bill.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

ROWLAND WARD.

Mr. SAWYER. I call up the bill (H. R. 11578) to increase the pension of Rowland Ward.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Rowland Ward, late private of Company E, Fourth Regiment New York Heavy Artillery, to $50 per month.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11578) to increase the pension of Rowland Ward, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Rowland Ward served as private in Company E, Fourth Regiment New York Heavy Artillery, from September 29, 1862, to June 23, 1865, when discharged on account of gunshot wound of face received at Ream's Station, August 25, 1864.

The nature of the wound and its effects are fully set forth in the report of the case in the Medical and Surgical History of the Rebellion, of which the following is a copy:

"Private Rowland Ward, Company E, Fourth New York Heavy Artillery, aged forty-six, was wounded at Ream's Station August 25, 1864, by a fragment of shell, which destroyed and completely carried away the inferior maxillary bone and soft parts, commencing 2 inches anterior to the angle on the right side, carrying away the chin and all the soft parts down the neck, on a level with the hyoid bone, destroying the floor of the mouth completely, allowing the tongue to protrude and hang down on the neck. Three of the right lower incisor teeth, with the corresponding alveoli loosely connected with the tissue, remained, and were allowed to stay in that position until the healing process took place, as they gave a partial support to the tongue and submaxillary gland, which was not injured. The wound extended across to the left side, carrying away all the teeth and jaw bone, except those previously mentioned, to a point as high up as the angle of the inferior maxillary on the left side. He was admitted to Lincoln Hospital, Washington, August 28, 1864. The patient did well, and improved rapidly. On December 9 he was furloughed for thirty days, and at the expiration of his furlough he was readmitted to hospital.

"On January 20, 1865, an operation was performed to construct a floor for the mouth—no anæsthesia was used. Preliminary to the operation, two molar teeth were extracted from the right-hand fragment of the lower jaw. An incision was made 2½ inches in length down the median line of the neck, terminating 1 inch above the thyroid cartilage; two lateral incisions, one upon each side, of equal length, right-angled to the vertical incision, these incisions corresponding to the base of the jaw. These flaps were then carefully dissected up, brought together at the middle incision, and secured by three hare-lip needles, the parts being supported by adhesive straps. Frequent application of dry lint was made to protect the parts from the injurious effects of the saliva, which was being constantly secreted. The healing proceeded rapidly, the parts uniting by first intention. Power of articulation and degustation was much improved. The needles were removed on the third day.

"On April 22, 1865, the parts being in a favorable condition, ether was administered and a second operation was performed. Two incisions, one on the right and one on the left, parallel to the inferior border of the inferior maxillary bone, each 3 inches in length, severing both the facial arteries, which were secured by ligatures. The upper flaps were carefully dissected up as far back as the angle of the jaw upon each side. The anterior edges of these flaps were freely incised, as well as the superior edge remaining after the first operation. The flaps were then brought into apposition and retained by four hare-lip needles, two in the upper flap forming the lip, and one upon each side, uniting the lower edge of the flap to the freshened edge of the parts after the first operation. Dry lint dressings were applied, and the patient was fed through a gum catheter. The hare-lip pins were removed from the longitudinal incision on the third day, the others being removed on the fourth day, at which time the remaining pins, together with all the sutures, were removed, the parts being supported throughout the remainder of the treatment by straps of adhesive plaster.

"On the morning of the 27th of April, secondary hemorrhage occurred from the left facial artery, which was readily controlled by digital compression. Owing to the constant secretion of saliva from the sublingual gland, which was carefully preserved during the operation, a slough was produced at the junction of the inferior angle of the flaps. This was checked by the application of a weak solution of nitric acid. On June 23 the patient was discharged at his own request, a fistulous orifice, one-fourth of an inch in diameter, only remaining, in consequence of the constant secretion of saliva from the sublingual gland, which prevented the parts from closing by granulation. He is able to articulate quite plainly, which he has hitherto been unable to do since the date of his injury.

"Until the completion of this operation the patient was compelled to assume a recumbent position to receive his nourishment or even a swallow of water. He can now take his food and drink in an erect posture without any difficulty. By the use of a rubber button, properly adjusted to the fistulous orifice, the secretion of saliva was prevented from making its exit externally. The photographs were printed from negatives prepared at Lincoln Hospital, under the direction of Surg. J. C. McKee, United States Army, who was the operator in the case." (See First Surgical Volume of the Medical and Surgical History of the Rebellion, page 373.)

For this terrible wound and its effects upon the general system, Ward was allowed a pension under the general law at the various rates, until it was increased to $30 per month, under the act of March 3, 1883. On July 5, 1884, Congress passed an act further increasing his pension to $40 per month. Since that date the disability has further increased, as is shown by medical evidence, by reason of heart disease, which first made its appearance in 1872, and chronic diarrhea, caused by inability to appropriate sufficient nutriment from the food he is capable of masticating. This is shown by the affidavit of Dr. B. T. Kneeland, the attending physician, dated September 28, 1888, who also states that pensioner in consequence of his disabilities has but very little vital energy left.

Ward is now seventy years of age. His condition is surely deplorable, and in fact worse than that of persons who have lost both hands or both feet, for which disabilities a higher rate of pension than that asked for in the bill is provided.

The committee are clearly of opinion that the increase asked should be granted, and therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH CLOVER.

Mr. SHERMAN called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 11629) granting a pension to Elizabeth Clover.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll the name of Elizabeth Clover, mother of A. S. Clover, late a private in Company G, Forty-fourth Company New York State Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 a month.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions were read, as follows:

Strike out, in line 5, the word "mother" and insert "widow."

Strike out, in line 6, the word "company" and insert "regiment."

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11629) granting a pension to Elizabeth Clover, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Elizabeth Clover is the widow of Albert S. Clover, who served as private in Company G, Forty-fourth Regiment of New York Volunteers, from September 25, 1861, to October 11, 1864, and died of phthisis pulmonalis October 29, 1881.

Her claim for pension has been rejected by the Pension Bureau because, in the opinion of the medical referee, the death cause is not shown to be chargeable to the soldier's military service.

Soldier was a pensioner on account of chronic diarrhea and bayonet wound of left hand. The last medical examination, bearing date of August 10, 1881, shows the following:

"Age, forty-four years; height, 5 feet 9 inches; weight 100 pounds. This man is under weight, is extremely nervous, and we believe the disability to be caused from diarrhea; his tongue is red and dry."

Dr. Clement T. Guillaune, a physician of good repute, testifies that he treated the soldier from July 1, 1880, until date of his death. His physical condition at the former date was as follows:

"A variable number of fluid and semi-fluid evacuations daily; colicky pains about the umbilicus; appetite poor and variable; food did not digest well; dryness and constriction of skin, which was shrunken and sallow; nervous system deranged; troubled with much headache and vomiting; some cough. Affiant treated the soldier principally for chronic diarrhea and irritability of the stomach. About nine weeks before his death soldier had an attack of hæmoptysis, after which there was diarrhea, emaciation, pyrosis, and death. For two months and more prior to his death he was confined to his bed. In another affidavit the same physician states that the cause of soldier's death was phthisis pulmonalis and marasmus."

Your committee are clearly of opinion that the fatal disease was directly chargeable to the diarrhea admitted by the Pension Bureau to have been contracted in the military service of the United States, and therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill and ask that it do pass, amended, however, by striking out the word "mother" in line 5, and insert therein instead the word "widow."

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WALTER N. SMITH.

Mr. SPOONER. I call up the bill (S. 2981) granting a pension to Walter N. Smith.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Walter N. Smith, late a captain of Company B, Eleventh Massachusetts Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SPOONER) was read, as follows:

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions (Report No. 1572 of the present session) is full and exhaustive, and discloses the following facts:

Said Walter N. Smith was a captain in Company B, Eleventh Massachusetts Volunteers, and while returning in the evening and on horseback from carrying a message or dispatch from his commanding officer (Colonel Blaisdell), and by his orders, he rode into a well which had been dug that day and left uncovered, whereby the horse which he rode was so badly injured that he died or was killed on account of his disabling wounds, and Captain Smith was seriously injured and permanently disabled. This was on or about the day after the retreat of General McClellan from Fair Oaks, Va.

Captain Smith's claim for pension was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that "the records fail to show that the alleged disability was incurred in line of duty, and claimant is unable to establish that point," although the fact that Captain Smith was directed by his commanding officer to obtain the adjutant's horse and carry the message or dispatch referred to is verified not only by Captain Smith's own testimony, but also by the testimony of Major McDonald, Corporal Kavanagh, and Private Donahoe, all of said Eleventh Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers. As to his injury and its cause there is no question, while his disability therefrom, as stated by the medical examining board, is equal to the loss of a limb.

The real cause of rejection seems to have been based upon hypothetical suggestions sustained by no testimony, and upon an imaginary state of affairs which there is no good reason to suppose existed and which are negatived by the testimony on file.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri (when his name was called), said: I have a bill which I wish to call up, but at present it is not at my desk.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman's name will be passed, with leave to return to it when he gets the bill.

There was no objection.

EMILY ROMINE.

Mr. STRUBLE called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 10289) granting a pension to Miss Emily Romine.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-rolls the name of Miss Emily Romine, helpless daughter of William Romine, of Company C, Thirteenth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, who died in the service of the United States, and that she be paid a pension of $18 per month during life.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

The claimant is the poor, helpless daughter of William P. Romine, who was a private in Company C, Thirteenth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, from October 12, 1861, and died in service, from typhoid fever, on the 20th of March, 1862. The mother of the claimant died in the year 1852.

The claimant was born August 10, 1851, and was a pensioner from the date of her father's death until she reached the age of sixteen years.

The testimony before your committee, in the nature of affidavits and a petition numerously signed by residents of Campbellsville, Ky., show that the claimant is almost blind, a cripple, weighs but 60 pounds, and is unable to perform any labor of any kind. She is dependent upon the charity of neighbors and friends, and a brother-in-law who has contributed to her support is now insolvent.

There are precedents in support of pensioning helpless children of deceased soldiers, and your committee reports the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendtion that it do pass.

GEORGE W. FOGLE.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR called up the bill (S. 2333) granting a pension to George W. Fogle.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George W. Fogle, Company G, Sixty-second Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio), was read, as follows:

They adopt and make part hereof the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The Senate report is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 1065, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill granting a pension to George W. Fogle, have examined the same, and report:

The applicant was a private in Company G, Sixty-second Ohio Volunteers. He enlisted October 7, 1862, and was discharged June 1, 1863. Shortly after entering the service he was taken sick from exposure and was sent to the hospital, from which he was discharged for disability. He filed a declaration May 11, 1882, alleging trouble with spine, kidneys, and disease of lungs. The claim was finally rejected by the Department after two special examinations, on the ground of insufficient evidence to show origin of disease in the service. The claimant is aged and completely broken in health, and although unable to furnish such evidence as is required by the Department, the special examiners in their report give it as their opinion that the case is meritorious.

After a careful review of the evidence the committee feels justified in recommending the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ENOCH B. VICE.

Mr. THOMAS, of Kentucky, called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 9946) granting a pension to Enoch B. Vice.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Enoch B. Vice, late private in Company C, Tenth Kentucky Cavalry, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

Enoch B. Vice enlisted as a private in Company C, Tenth Kentucky Cavalry, on the 10th day of August, 1862; was mustered September 9, 1862, and was honorably discharged September 16, 1863. Declaration for pension filed February 25, 1875; number of claim, 201846. The claimant alleges that while in line of duty near Covington, Ky., about September, 1862, he was thrown from his horse, breaking his right arm and injuring his right shoulder, causing paralysis of said right arm and shoulder.

The claimant was in action at Mount Sterling, Ky., and captured, and paroled in March, 1863, and was absent March and April, 1863, on parole by Colonel Clark.

The claimant alleges that he was not treated in hospital in service. After injury was treated in a farm-house near Covington, Ky., by a surgeon of an Indiana regiment, name unknown. The first surgeon who treated him after discharge is dead, Dr. John Shackleford.

Lieut. A. T. Wood states that while the regiment was at Covington, Ky., about September, 1862, he was sent on a scout, General Kirby Smith being in the vicinity. On said scout claimant Vice was thrown from his horse and so much injured that he was sent back to camp; thinks the accident occurred while they were making a charge on a house to surround it, believing it to be occupied by rebel soldiers; is not positive, however, but is positive as to claimant's being injured by being thrown from his horse.

Capt. W. E. Rice says that claimant was brought to him in October, 1862, in a disabled condition from a fall from his horse; was disabled in left side and right elbow; supposed some ribs broken.

The claim was rejected by the Pension Office for the reason that "no disability to a pensionable degree from injury to arm and shoulder as alleged since date of discharge." The claimant states that the reason he could not furnish further evidence in regard to his wounds is because he can not find anybody else to prove it by, and that Dr. John Fleming, the surgeon of the regiment, says he has lost his records from a fire during the war and can not state anything definite in regard to his disabilities. The claimant is now unable to do any labor, has a family, and can do no work to support them. He has been an inmate of the poor-house in Bath County, Kentucky, for several years.

The proof in his case shows that he was a strong, healthy man when he entered the service, and was disabled and in bad health when mustered out, and is now a physical wreck.

This is a meritorious case, and your committee make this favorable report and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ISAAC N. HAWKINS.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri, called up the bill (S. 3221) granting a pension to Isaac N. Hawkins.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Isaac N. Hawkins, late a captain in the Seventy-third Regiment Ohio Volunteers, at the rate of $45 a month.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions is adopted, and the passage of the bill is recommended.

SENATE REPORT.

The claimant enlisted as a private in October, 1861, and was discharged May 15, 1865, on account of wounds received in action. He is now receiving a pension of $36 a month by special act passed in the Forty-ninth Congress, and asks that that pension be increased.

The following extracts describe the wounds for which claimant is receiving pension:

"He was shot on three different occasions. Recovering sufficiently from his first injuries, he rejoined his regiment, when he received his last and most terrible wound. A musket ball entered his right shoulder and passed down into his body, being afterward taken out from beneath his shoulder-blade. * * * While he can move the fingers of his hand, the arm is almost as useless as though he had it not. * * *

"The Medical and Surgical History of the War of the Rebellion, Surg. Vol. II, page 523, reports case 1496, Lieutenant Hawkins, of Seventy-third Ohio, as follows: 'Wounded at Bull Run, August 30, 1862, right arm; at Lookout Valley, October 29, 1863, left ankle; in front of Atlanta, August 5, 1864, right shoulder, the ball going through the body; the head and 2 inches of the arm bone (humerus) were taken out.'"

In addition to this wound, he was previously wounded at the battle of Second Bull Run, in the same arm, shattering the bone just below the shoulder, and he was confined in hospital for about four months on this account, and his wound required attention for some time after he returned to his company. Again, on October 29, 1863, at Lookout Valley, he was wounded in the left ankle, which wound was about three months healing. Then followed the wound for which he is now pensioned.

The claimant has suffered ever since to such an extent that, having studied law, he was compelled to abandon his profession, and having attempted several other employments, has been forced to leave them off on account of his disabilities. A section of the bone was taken out between the shoulder and the elbow, and the result is that the arm hangs useless, and can only be lifted by use of the hand on the sound arm.

In view of claimant's long and faithful service, the three wounds he received therein, his long suffering since, and his inability to provide for himself in any line of employment, your committee recommend the passage of the bill, with the following amendment: Add to line 7 the words "at the rate of $45 a month."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SQUIRE WALTER.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 10448) granting a pension to Squire Walter.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Squire Walter, father of George W. Walter, deceased, late of Company H, Second Regiment of West Virginia Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10448) granting a pension to Squire Walter, having considered the same, report as follows:

The applicant, Squire Walter, is now nearly seventy-five years of age. On October 26, 1883, he filed an application for pension as dependent parent of George W. Walter, who was a corporal of Company H, Second Regiment West Virginia Volunteers. It was approved by the evidence on file that George W. Walter enlisted June 28, 1861; that he was unmarried; that before enlistment he contributed to the support of his father; that he continued to do so after his enlistment by sending to his father a portion of his pay.

The soldier's captain testifies to his upright character as a man and soldier. It appears that the soldier was drowned near the Chain Bridge in the Potomac River, District of Columbia, September 13, 1862, while bathing. His captain swears that he went bathing with the knowledge and consent of his officers with numbers of others daily, and was drowned on that day while bathing. It is also proven that Squire Walter has had piles ever since 1861; that since then he has been disabled fully one-half for the performance of manual labor, and that he was largely dependent upon his son during his lifetime for support. Four of his neighbors testify that since 1861 he has not made enough to pay his debts, and that interest, sickness, and living have kept him behind. It is in testimony that two of these men loaned him $275, without note or other evidence of indebtedness, to help him buy a small tract of land, and not until some years after did they take note or security, and then did it for fear of other creditors; that it took him several years to reduce this small debt to $200 and pay the yearly interest, and then some one else aided him in taking up that sum, paying these creditors and taking a new mortgage and note. The whole testimony shows that he was an afflicted old man who tried hard but could not get on.

This claim was rejected by the Pension Office because—

"The soldier was in the exercise of a privilege and not in performance of duty incident to his service; that he was amusing himself and while bathing took his own risk and was not in the line of duty when drowned, as it is not shown that he was under orders while bathing."

But it appears that the soldier was bathing with the knowledge and consent of his officers. It has heretofore been held by the Attorney-General and not overruled or recalled that—

"To determine the right of pension the question is not whether when the cause of disability or death occurred the party was on duty or not, in active service or on furlough, or on leave, in arrest or not, but whether in any of the possible conditions of service the cause of disability or death was appurtenant to, dependent on, or connected with acts within, or acts without the line of duty." (7 Op. Atty. Gen., 150.)

The soldier's captain states that the man was bathing with permission and not in disobedience of orders or army regulations. December 13, 1887, the case was submitted by the examiner for admission, but was rejected by the Pension Office January 6, 1888.

There is some evidence showing that claimant had property subject to taxation, but it is abundantly proven that he could not pay his debts, that he had no income from any source, and was indebted to those who gave him employment. Upon the whole case we feel warranted in recommending the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLOTTE AYRES.

Mr. TURNER, of Kansas, called up the bill (H. R. 11316) granting a pension to Charlotte Ayres.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to place upon the pension-roll, at the rate of $25 per month, the name of Charlotte Ayres, the dependent mother of Benjamin Ayres, a private soldier of Company I, Fifth Regiment Kansas Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

Charlotte Ayres, the claimant under this bill, is the aged mother of Benjamin Ayres, who was enrolled as a soldier on the 1st day of October, 1861, in Company I, Fifth Regiment Kansas Volunteer Cavalry, and died of disease in the regimental hospital near Little Rock, Ark., September 13, 1863.

Franklin Ayres, the husband of the said Charlotte Ayres, and father of the said Benjamin Ayres, died near Hicksville, Ohio, in 1852, and on his death-bed gave his estate to the said Benjamin Ayres, with the understanding that he, the said Benjamin Ayres, was to support, during her lifetime, the said Charlotte Ayres.

The said Benjamin Ayres moved to Kansas in 1860 to secure for himself and mother a home, and soon thereafter enlisted as a soldier and lost all his property; that the said Charlotte Ayres has been, since the death of the said Benjamin Ayres, wholly destitute of means of support and dependent, and is now, in her old age, entirely destitute and helpless, and that she has applied for a pension and her claim has been rejected on the ground that the soldier left a widow. The widow drew a pension during her widowhood, but she has since remarried, and no one is now drawing a pension on account of the death of this soldier.

Your committee unhesitatingly recommend the passage of the billl, with an amendment striking out "at the rate of $25 per month" and inserting "subject to provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DANVILLE A. RICKER.

Mr. VANCE called up for consideration the bill (S. 2646) granting a pension to Danville A. Ricker.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Danville A. Ricker, father of Henry G. Ricker, late private in Company K, Seventh Regiment Maine Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2646) granting a pension to Danville A. Ricker, having considered the same, beg leave to adopt the report of the Senate committee as its own, which is as follows:

"This is a bill to pension Danville A. Ricker, father of Henry G. Ricker, late a private in Company K, Seventh Regiment Maine Volunteers. The son was enrolled on the 21st day of August, 1861, at Augusta, Me., and died in regimental hospital, Camp Griffin, January 15, 1862.

"The claim was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that the father was not dependent on his son at the time of his enlistment.

"A number of witnesses testify to the son's assistance in supporting the family up to the time of his enlistment. On this point Benjamin F. Teague testifies that he knew the soldier before his enlistment; that in the spring of 1860, soldier's father left home and went to New York to sell fruit-trees; that the soldier remained at home and took care of the farm and the family; that he did so up to his enlistment; that at this time the claimant was involved in debt, that the farm and personal property, except what was exempt, were sold to pay his indebtedness; that affiant was an officer and attached some of the property; that the soldier was the only son upon whom the family depended.

"Thomas G. Bendin lived in same school district with claimant eight years prior to son's enlistment; knows that soldier contributed to support of family, for the reason that he paid affiant for supplies.

"Solon Chase swears that he knew the soldier from his boyhood; that he worked for affiant, and his wages were paid to his father; that he contributed in various ways to his father's support.

"There is other and ample evidence to show that the son, prior to enlistment, was his father's main support.

"Philip Bradford testifies that he has known claimant for forty years; that in 1861–'62 he was one of the selectmen and assessors of the town of Turner; that claimant's income from the land owned by him would not exceed $50 per annum. His opinion is based upon knowledge gained as assessor and neighbor.

"About the time of the son's enlistment it appears that the claimant was employed to sell fruit trees, from which he says he made enough to live on; but since his marriage, January 1, 1867, he has been supported by his wife. In 1862 his leg was broken, and since that time he has been lame, and, to some extent, disqualified for active occupation. His first wife died in 1863. His son, the soldier, died in 1862; his son John died in 1863, and his daughter, a child of two years old, died in 1863. The history of the case shows that the claimant was continuously in debt and embarrassed; that he had numerous afflictions, and extraordinary expenses, incident to sickness and funeral expenses; that whatever property he had was incumbered beyond its value; that he became insolvent. His second wife had property in her own name, over which he had no control, and which explains his saying that she for a time supported him.

"The Pension Office charges him with the admission that he was physically sound at the time his son enlisted. In a letter in the hands of the committee he qualifies that statement by saying that his appetite and digestion were good, but he walked with a cane—sometimes with two—for support. In a letter addressed to the Commissioner of Pensions he says, after two years' sickness, from 1868 to 1869, he found his indebtedness was more than he could pay. He mortgaged his little farm for $500, what he paid for it. He had ten small children, except one grown up and away from home, and his soldier son, who assisted in supporting the family. In 1860 he was advised by physicians to give up manual labor. In consequence of his poor health Mr. Kelley, of Rochester, N. Y., offered him employment, and to give him all he could earn. He sent home his earnings, which, with his son's bounty money, supported the family. In 1862 his property was all sold under attachments. Then followed the breaking of his leg. His family was broken up. He says he is a dependent father to-day; no means of support, and seventy-three years old.

"The postmaster at Canaan, Conn., whose name does not appear, writes a 'confidential' letter to the Pension Office, in which he says:

"In 1869 D. A. Ricker was keeping the Stevens House at Canaan, Conn., and continued to do so until 1880. The Stevens House was a good country hotel, worth at one time $15,000, but was sold a year and a half ago by claimant for about $9,000. The real estate was in the name of his wife, as well as the personal property. Claimant had nothing in his own name.

"This statement is not sworn to, and there is no reason why it should not be in the form of competent testimony if it is true. There are witnesses whose testimony under oath is in direct variance with this statement; and from which it appears he was at work on his farm, was agent for a Rochester nursery, and had no permanent abiding place during all the eleven years this confidential letter says he was keeping a hotel.

"The evidence shows that he was dependent upon his son at the time of enlistment and death. The inference is that he married a wife who had some property in her own name, which she controlled; that he was in continual poverty and distress; that that is his condition now."

Your committee report the bill back favorably and recommend its passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHRISTIAN SANDERS.

Mr. WALKER called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 11177) granting a pension to Christian Sanders.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Christian Sanders, late a private of Company D, Seventy-ninth Regiment Enrolled Missouri Militia, subject to the limitations and regulations of the pension laws.

The report by (Mr. WALKER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11177) granting a pension to Christian Sanders, have considered the same, and now report:

Christian Sanders was mustered in as captain of Company D, Seventy-ninth Regiment Enrolled Missouri Volunteers. In October, 1864, he with his company reported to the constituted authorities at Cape Girardeau, Mo., and remained there until about November 5, 1864.

In his application he alleges that while stationed at said place, in the discharge of his duty, on or about October 4, 1864, without any fault or negligence on his part, he incurred the following disabilities:

"Injury to the right side of his face and head and right ear, causing severe continuous pains in his head in the region of his eyes and injury to the hearing of his right ear, caused by the side of his head being forced in contact with a wet tent cloth while asleep, the tent being much crowded; that a frost occurred during said night, and the cold and dampness then existing injured him as stated."

The physician who treated him at the time and for some time after is dead.

He alleges that he was disabled at the time and was reported by the orderly sergeant as unfit for duty. Samuel J. Leasly, a member of claimant's company, corroborates the claimant's statements. It is also corroborated by Joseph Chandler and others who were members of said organization and by physicians and others since the alleged incurrence of said disabilities, and that the same have continued up to the present time.

The committee, being satisfied that the injuries alleged were received by the soldier while in the service and line of duty, report the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH HARPER.

Mr. WASHINGTON called up the bill (H. R. 11089) granting a pension to Elizabeth Harper.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to place on the pension-roll the name of Elizabeth Harper, widow of William S. Harper, late a private in Company G, One hundred and twenty-third Pennsylvania Volunteers, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11089) granting a pension to Elizabeth Harper, submit the following report:

In this claim of Elizabeth M. Harper, widow of W. S. Harper, late of Company G, One hundred and twenty-third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, the Pension Bureau rejected it on the ground that the death cause, disease of lungs, was not accepted as due to the service. The facts are as follows:

W. S. Harper enlisted August 7, 1862, for nine months, and was discharged with his company May 13, 1863. He was wounded in the left shoulder about 2 inches below the collar-bone, at the battle of Fredericksburgh, Va., December 13, 1862, and was absent the rest of that month and January and February following. On April 27, 1863, on the march to Chancellorsville, he gave out, was sent to division hospital, Third Division, Fifth Corps, by Assistant Surgeon Stewart, and was never able to return to his regiment.

In evidence taken by the Pension Department many witnesses testify to having seen the scar from the bullet-wound on the left breast. Several of his soldier comrades testify to having seen him at the time he was shot; others saw his wound while he was in the hospital, and many witnesses who knew him and worked with him from 1864 until his death, which occurred May 7, 1874, from hemorrhage of the lungs, testify that he never recovered; that he had frequent hemorrhages of the lungs from the close of the war until he gradually wasted away and died as stated.

Dr. George P. Henry states that he knew the soldier, W. S. Harper, since 1868, when he began to treat him for lung trouble, which patient claimed was due to the wound; on examination found partial solidification of one lung; was troubled with hemorrhages, increasing in severity until he died, in 1874; soldier's condition impressed deponent that the fatal disease was due to the wounds and exposure, or to want of attention, as the soldier had claimed.

The following is the affidavit of Hugh Harper, father of the soldier:

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA, Allegheny County, ss:

I am the father of the late W. S. Harper, who was a member of Company G, One hundred and twenty-third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and who was the husband of Elizabeth M. Harper, of Nashville, Tenn. I am past eighty years of age, and have been a resident of Allegheny, Pa., since the year 1833. My ancestors lived to be very old. My wife died at or near a critical period in a woman's life. I had four sons in the Union Army, John, William, Robert, and Joseph. They were all spared to get out, but not without wounds or injuries.

"Robert lost an eye and draws a pension. Joseph was wounded at the battle of Williamsburgh, Va., and receives a pension. John was wounded and was troubled with catarrh after his return from the Army, and when it went to his wounded lung it caused congestion of the lungs, of which he died. William S. was wounded at the battle of Fredericksburgh, Va., and his health was never the same after his return from the Army. He was always a healthy child and a fine-looking young man when he enlisted in the United States Army to help put down the rebellion. My oldest son, Thomas, is now sixty years of age and has a large family. I now have seven living children, three sons and four daughters. My youngest daughter is the mother of four children. I have thirty-two grandchildren. There was no hereditary consumption in my family. Most of my children reside in Allegheny City, Pa., and those who do not reside in Allegheny County, Pennsylvania.

"HUGO HARPER.

"Signed and sworn to on the 24th day of December, 1887, before L. Blattner, notary public, Allegheny, Pa."

The following is the affidavit of Lieut. Reuben Bartley, of the soldier's company:

"STATE OF INDIANA, County of Harrison, ss:

"In the claim of W. S. Harper, a corporal in Company G, One hundred and twenty-third Pennsylvania Volunteers, I would state said W. S. Harper was wounded at Fredericksburgh, Va., December 13, 1862, and sent to hospital. I saw him leave the field soon after being shot. Then on the march to Chancellorsville, Va., on April 27, 1863, he (Harper) gave out and was sent to division hospital (Third Division, Fifth Corps) by Assistant Surgeon Stewart, of our regiment. This was the last time he was on duty. The regiment was mustered out on May 12, 1863, at Harrisburg, Pa.

"I was intimately acquainted with said Harper for some years after his return, and know he never regained his health. I know the facts stated from personal observation, having kept a diary and making entries daily of what transpired; and further, I am not related to said claimant and have no interest in this claim.

"REUBEN BARTLEY,
"Late Second Lieutenant One Hundred and Twenty-Third
"Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry.

"Signed and sworn to before James A. Barnes, notary public, Harrison County, Indiana, July 2, 1885."

In view of these facts and after a careful examination of all the papers and proof on file, your committee conclude that the evidence warrants the belief that the soldier's death was the result of his wound contracted in the line of duty at Fredericksburgh, Va., and therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

During the reading of the foregoing report,

Mr. KILGORE said: Mr. Chairman, I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry or two.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HEARD). The gentleman will state his inquiry.

Mr. KILGORE. In the first place, I wish to say that there is a great deal of confusion in the Hall, and these reports are very entertaining and we ought to be able to hear them.

The CHAIRMAN. The point made by the gentleman from Texas is well taken, and the Chair will endeavor to preserve order upon the floor.

Mr. KILGORE. Now another. The Clerk is reading a little too fast and I can hardly keep up. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JULIA M. EDIE.

Mr. WHEELER called up for consideration the bill (S. 3325) granting an increase of pension to Julia M. Edie.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Julia M. Edie, widow of the late Capt. and Bvt. Maj. John R. Edie, Ordnance Department, United States Army, and daughter of the late Commodore C. S. McCauley, United States Navy, at the rate of $40 per month, in lieu of the pension which she now receives.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3325) granting an increase of pension to Julia M. Edie, beg leave to submit the following report recommending its passage, and append hereto the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions giving the reason, namely:

The beneficiary under the bill is the widow of a brilliant ordnance officer of the Army, and daughter of a late distinguished commodore of the Navy. Bvt. Maj. John Rufus Edie, who was graduated at West Point in June of 1861, went directly into service, and won commendation at Bull Run in July; was assistant to chief of ordnance at Fredericksburgh, Chancellorsville, and Gettysburgh, and chief of ordnance through the heroic campaign of the Wilderness. The heavy responsibilities cast upon the young officer were made more onerous because he was then a sufferer from malarial poison contracted among the swamps of the Chickahominy, and which eventually destroyed his health, mind, and life—he having died in the Government Hospital for the Insane—leaving to his widow the care and support of the two children which were the fruit of their marriage.

The widow is now receiving the pension due to the rank of her deceased husband; but it is thought that, in consideration of the exceptional services performed by this husband, resulting in an end so sad and tragical, accompanied with loss of fortune and with the loss, also, of the protection and support of her gallant father, the late Commodore McCauley, the country can not show its regard for the memory and services of both husband and father more appreciatively than by aiding to make comfortable the life of the widow and her children.

Among the testimonials placed before the committee in support of the bill is one from Brigadier-General Benét, Chief of Ordnance, which is herewith given:

"ORDNANCE OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
"Washington, July 11, 1888.

"SIR: In connection with the bill for an increase of the pension of Mrs. Julia M. Edie, I have the honor to inclose an official copy of Dr. Nichols' certificate of her husband's death and of the cause of it. Major Edie was a young officer of ordnance of great promise, who during his short career had done most excellent and distinguished service, and whose untimely death was caused by malarial poison contracted amid the swamps of the Chickahominy under General McClellan.

"His widow is justly entitled to this small increase of her pension proposed in the bill and I strongly recommend it.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"S. V. BENÉT,
"Brigadier-General, Chief of Ordnance.

"Hon. T. W. PALMER,
"United States Senate."

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this bill will be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, that bill was only read with an agreement that no objection would be made, provided it should be reported favorably to the House, the previous question ordered upon its passage, and that the bill should go over to a full House, with thirty minutes' debate. The gentleman from Indiana, I understand, will object unless this arrangement is concluded.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be reported with a favorable recommendation, and the gentlemen can make the arrangements in the House.

Mr. CHEADLE. I want the understanding to be distinct; because I do not desire to be compelled to keep in mind the particular number of each case.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest, then, that the bill be laid aside with the recommendation to the House that the previous question be considered as ordered on the third reading and passage of the bill, that thirty minutes be allowed for general debate, and, further, that the consideration of the bill be fixed at some time in the future. When would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. In a full House.

Mr. WHEELER. That is the understanding.

Mr. CHEADLE. I do not care when the time is fixed. The gentleman can select his own time.

Mr. WHEELER. Then I would suggest next Friday, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection this bill will be reported to the House, then, with the recommendation stated, and its consideration be set for Friday next immediately after the reading of the Journal.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I understand the rule to be that where a bill is called up in this manner and does not go through, that the member has the right to call up another one. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the gentleman has had his opportunity.

JAMES T. TEEPLE.

Mr. WHITING, of Massachusetts, called up the bill (H. R. 10025) for the relief of James T. Teeple, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions with an amendment.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, directed and authorized to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James T. Teeple, late of Company A, Seventh Michigan Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10025) for the relief of James T. Teeple, report:

The claimant is now, and has been for years, totally blind. He alleges sunstroke as the primary cause. The history of the case in brief is as follows:

"Claimant was drafted February 13, 1864, and discharged on November 30, 1864. While in a skirmish on the Po River, Virginia, he had an attack of dizziness and blindness which he claims was sunstroke. His condition that day was observed by his captain, who had him go to the rear. After this, in hot weather, he was subject to these attacks, and one day a few years after the war, while at work in a log roll-way, he was seized with one of these attacks and was unable to avoid a log which struck and rolled over him. His head was severely hurt, and he became totally and permanently blind."

The Commissioner of Pensions rejects the claim on the ground that soldier prior to enlistment had been injured in a steam-boat explosion, claiming that as the primary cause of the loss of sight.

The man was drafted, which is prima facie evidence that he was sound at that time. He claims that fatigue, exposure, and hard marching brought on this vertigo, during an attack of which, as above stated, he lost his sight.

He is in needy circumstances, having been unable for many years to earn a living for himself and family, and is necessarily dependent on charity for support. He is a county charge.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment: Strike out the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws" and insert "at the rate of $40 per month."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY THOMPSON.

Mr. YARDLEY called up the bill (H. R. 11617) granting a pension to Mary Thompson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place the name of Mary Thompson, widow of Cornelius Thompson, late a private in Company D, One hundred and ninety-second Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, on the pension-roll, subject to the rules and regulations of the pension laws.

On motion of Mr. DUNHAM, by unanimous consent, the reading of the report was dispensed with.

The report (by Mr. YODER) is as follows:

Cornelius Thompson, the husband of Mrs. Mary Thompson, enlisted in Company D, One hundred and ninety-second regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, on the 27th day of February, 1865, was discharged September 1, 1865, and died August 4, 1874. Mrs. Thompson filed her claim for pension, as the widow of the deceased soldier, September 15, 1875, on account of chronic rheumatism contracted by her husband, in the service and in line of duty, from the effects of which he died. Claim was rejected by the Pension Department for the reason that there was no positive medical evidence to prove that the immediate cause of death was traceable to his service in the Army. There is no evidence on file to prove the contrary, and yet there is no positive medical evidence that the immediate cause of his death was chronic rheumatism. The evidence goes to show clearly that he was a sound, robust man when he entered the service. There is also abundant evidence on file in the Pension Department to prove that he contracted chronic rheumatism while in service, from exposure and the hardships of the service.

A number of his former employés, who are creditable witnesses, testify that he was a stout, healthy man and free from rheumatism when he entered the service, and that after his return home from the service he was suffering with chronic rheumatism and unable to perform manual labor. Mr. Louis Jennings testifies:

"I was well acquainted with above-named Cornelius Thompson a long time before he entered the United States service, as he worked for me a great deal, and I know that he was a stout, healthy man, but after his return he was badly crippled up with rheumatism, of which disease he had no symptoms before he entered the service. I know the above to be true, as he was a neighbor of mine and worked for me a great deal before he entered the service."

And many other creditable witnesses testify to the same effect. Noah Merica testifies:

"I first became acquainted with the deceased during the fall of 1869; was acquainted with him until his death, and know that during that time he was unfit for manual labor, on account of rheumatism."

J. Guy Honnell, M. D., testified as follows:

"I was personally acquainted with Cornelius Thompson three years before he entered the United States service. He was a man of good health and of sound constitution. I was called to attend him immediately after his return from the Army, and his general health was bad, and he had a severe attack of inflammatory rheumatism."

Dr. T. McCullough testifies, with regard to his last illness, that—

"The claimant resided part of the time with one family and part of the time with another, and that while professionally calling at their houses, that he did at different times prescribe for Mr. Cornelius Thompson; that he has no doubt that he has prescribed for him; that when prescribing for parties in the office, if paid at the time, does not usually keep account of said prescriptions."

A number of his intimate acquaintances and near relatives testify as to the cause of his death, and the continuous suffering from rheumatism from the time of his discharge. It appears that when he became unable to work that he lived among his relatives, and that he was too poor to have a regular attending physician, and for this reason she is unable to clearly establish the fact of the cause of his death. The symptoms of rheumatism from which he was suffering as described, and the history as given by these parties, leave no doubt in the minds of your committee that the cause of his death is directly traceable to the disease he contracted in the service. Mrs. Thompson, the claimant and widow of the soldier, is now quite old and very feeble and can not, at most, live but a short time, as she is confined to her bed in a helpless condition and without any means of support whatever. Your committee is of the opinion that this is a meritorious case, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLES A. STOCKMAN.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan, called up the bill (H. R. 10260) to place the name of Charles A. Stockman, of Dundee, Mich., on the pension-roll.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Charles A. Stockman, of Dundee, Mich., late a private of Company B, Twenty-eighth Michigan Infantry Volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10260) to place the name of Charles A. Stockman, of Dundee, Mich., on the pension-roll, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

The claimant enlisted in Company B, Twentieth Regiment Michigan Volunteers, July 23, 1862, and was mustered out June 12, 1865.

He alleges that at the battle of Chickahominy, Va., he was wounded in head and taken prisoner. His claim has been rejected on the ground of the inefficiency of the evidence in support of his allegations.

The records of the War Department show that claimant was captured at the above-named place June 14, 1864, confined at Richmond, and from there sent to Andersonville; paroled at Charleston, S. C., December 11, 1864; reported at Camp Parole, Md., December 16, 1864; furloughed December 26, 1864, for thirty days; returned January 30, 1865; sent to Camp Chase, Ohio, February 16, 1865; was again furloughed February 24, 1865, for thirty days; returned May 10, 1865, and was mustered out as above stated.

Claimant was on the skirmish line at the time he was wounded and captured. The only one with whom he was acquainted and knew of the wound was one George Miller, who died at Annapolis, Md.

Prescott M. Skinner, a reputable witness, who was orderly sergeant and afterwards first lieutenant of the company, testifies that he was not present when claimant was wounded, but that he was reported wounded and a prisoner by a member of the company and regiment and was so reported on the muster-rolls. Affiant has no doubt that claimant was wounded at the time and place stated.

Medical examination shows that ball struck over left temporal ridge about 2½ inches from orbit; scar about five-eighths inch in diameter; cicatrix quite tender; disability therefrom rated at three-fourth total.

It is not strange under the circumstances that claimant is unable to furnish direct evidence of the receipt of the wound. He was, according to his own allegation, unconscious until he arrived at Richmond on the following day, where he got among strangers. He never returned to his command after he was released. The only treatment received for the wound was at Pemberton Hospital, Richmond, Va., but there appear no records of said hospital on file.

Claimant is a credible person, and so is the witness, Skinner, who testifies to the general report in camp of the wounding of the former.

Your committee are of opinion that the claimant is entitled to the benefit of this uncontroverted statement, and therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill, and ask that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS WYNNE.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa, called up the bill (S. 3116) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Wynne.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas Wynne, late a private of Company C, United States Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $50 a month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The committee recommended an amendment striking out the words "$50 a month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "for the disabilities resulting from the gunshot wound of right leg and rheumatism, and for disabilities now found to exist."

On motion of Mr. GEST, the reading of the report (by Mr. SAWYER) was dispensed with, and it was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

It is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3116) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Wynne, have examined the same, and report:

The petitioner, Thomas Wynne, is receiving a pension of $8 a month for a wound received at the battle of Bull Run, July 21, 1861. He is now wholly and hopelessly disabled by rheumatism, believed to be the result of his service, but the Pension Office has decided that he is not entitled to increase; he therefore appeals to Congress for a rating corresponding with his helpless condition. His military history is shown by an abstract of the record of the Adjutant-General's Office to be as follows:

"Thomas Wynne was enlisted February 16, 1855, and assigned to Company C, United States Infantry. He was discharged February 1, 1860, by re-enlistment in the same company and regiment. He was wounded in the leg and taken prisoner in the battle of Bull Run, Va., July 21, 1861. He was confined at Richmond, Va., until October, 1861, when sent to Columbia, S. C., where confined until May, 1862, when returned to Richmond, and there paroled in May, 1862, and on the 25th of that month was ordered to be discharged on account of wounds.

"He again enlisted in the general service in 1862 and was assigned to duty at headquarters of the Army, where he served until September 1, 1865, when transferred to duty in the Adjutant-General's Office. He was discharged as an enlisted man in the general service August 11, 1882, by reason of an appointment as an assistant messenger in the Adjutant-General's Office. He was discharged from this position May 12, 1888, in consequence of being permanently disabled for the performance of any duty by reason of sickness—chronic rheumatism.

"The record of his several discharges as an enlisted man gives his character as excellent, and his whole service of thirty-three years in the Army and in this office shows him to have been faithful and conscientious in the discharge of his duty."

Assistant Inspector-General N. H. Davis, United States Army, certifies that Wynne was under his command, to his faithfulness and efficiency as a soldier, and to his having been wounded and taken prisoner at the battle of Bull Run.

His good conduct as a soldier is certified to by Assistant Adjutant-General Kelton, Major-General Halleck, Maj. Robert N. Scott, and Assistant Adjutant-General Ruggles.

Dr. Murphy, of Columbia Hospital, certifies that he is a cripple from chronic rheumatism, contracted, as he believes, during his imprisonment; that he is unable to perform any manual labor, and is a man deserving of every consideration.

Dr. Sothron, of Washington, certifies, May 21, 1888:

"I have this day examined Thomas Wynne, and find that he has had a gunshot injury of the middle third of right thigh, the cicatrices of entrance and exit well marked; and I further find that he is a confirmed invalid from chronic arthritic rheumatism, resulting in partial anchylosis of knee joints. In my opinion this disease is of very long standing, and no doubt brought on by exposure incident to the life of a soldier."

Surgeon O'Reilley, United States Army, in a letter to Adjutant-General Drum, states that Wynne was treated by the medical department between the years 1868 and 1882 for rheumatism and other ailments.

Surgeon-General Moore, United States Army, in a letter to General Drum, after describing chronic arthritic rheumatism, says:

"As Wynne's record and habits from the time of his discharge in 1862 are vouched for as good, I have no difficulty in accepting the opinion of the medical men who have certified in his case that his disease, which became manifest in 1869 or 1870, must be attributed to exposure during his previous service."

The claimant, during a part of his imprisonment, after he was wounded and captured, was confined in the jail at Columbia, S. C., and compelled to sleep on the floor of stone flagging, without blankets or fire.

The committee are not only of the opinion that his present allowance of $8 for his wound is inadequate, but that he is entitled to pension at the full rating for total disability.

The bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FANNY A. BOYD.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois, called up the bill (H. R. 9963) to increase the pension of Mrs. Fannie A. Boyd.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that this bill has already passed both Houses and is in the hands of the President. [Laughter.]

CAPT. MICHAEL PIGGOTT.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. Then I withdraw that, and call up House bill No. 7633, granting a pension to Capt. Michael Piggott.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Michael Piggott, of Quincy, Ill., late captain of Company F, Sixty-sixth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $45 a month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7633) granting a pension to Capt. Michael Piggott, submit the following report:

This soldier enlisted on the 11th day of September, 1861. On the 5th day of March, 1862, he was made captain of Company F, Fourteenth Regiment of Missouri Volunteer Infantry, afterward Company F, Sixty-sixth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, and was honorably discharged on the 24th day of January, 1865. On the 14th day of May, 1864, soldier received a wound in right ankle from musket-shot, which caused amputation just below the knee. This soldier is now drawing a pension for amputation of leg just below the knee. His application for increase under act of August 4, 1886, was rejected, the Department saying that—

"Inability to use an artificial limb does not entitle one to a higher rating except when amputation is above knee or elbow."

The report of the examining surgeons who examined Captain Piggot has the following statement:

"The right leg is amputated 2 inches below the knee, leaving just 2 inches of the tibia. The covering over end of bone is quite thin, firmly adherent over entire surface, and apparently very tender. He so adjusts the lly limb, which he uses, that the entire weight is borne on the knee just at the lower border of the patella, where a large callus exists. He states that he can not bear any weight on the stump below the knee because of the pain induced thereby. The muscles of the thigh are much atrophied. The thigh just above the knee measures 4 inches less than at the upper part, 5 inches less than corresponding points on left thigh. We believe the disability to be equal to amputation at the knee-joint."

This report is signed by all three of the examining surgeons. The committee, therefore, from a consideration of the evidence in this case, arrive at the conclusion that the disability of the soldier is equal to amputation at the knee-joint, and that this pension should be increased, and therefore the committee recommend that said bill be amended by striking out the words "forty-five," and insert in lieu thereof the words "thirty-six," and that the bill when so amended do pass.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELLEN SMITH.

Mr. ARNOLD called up Senate bill 2705, granting a pension to Ellen Smith.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ellen Smith, widow of James Smith, late a private in Company C, Eighty-eighth Regiment of New York Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SPOONER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2705) granting a pension to Ellen Smith, adopt the Senate report hereto attached, and recommend the passage of the bill.

SENATE REPORT.

The applicant is the widow of James Smith, late a private in Company C, Eighty-eighth New York Volunteers. The soldier was severely wounded in the left thigh and head, in the service, for which he was pensioned September 4, 1867. It appears from the evidence that he never regained complete use of his limbs, and the injuries to his head produced mental feebleness.

On the 20th of March, 1878, while walking in the streets of the city of Pawtucket, R. I., in company with two other men, he approached a railroad crossing as a train was coming. His companions easily got out of the way of the train and supposed that he would do the same, but owing to his mental condition and his physical infirmity he was unable to escape and was killed.

The widow's claim for a pension was rejected on the ground that her husband's death was in no way the result of his military service.

The evidence clearly proves that the man's death was due to his infirmity, and it also clearly proves that his infirmity was due to his military service, and for this reason the committee feel justified in recommending the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SETH F. MYERS.

Mr. ATKINSON called up the bill (S. 2595) to increase the pension of Seth F. Myers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Seth F. Myers, late surgeon of the Seventy-third Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, from $30 to $50 a month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. LYNCH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2595) to increase the pension of Seth F. Myers, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report:

The claimant was a surgeon in the Seventy-third Regiment of Indiana Volunteer Infantry in the war of 1861. He was discharged in May, 1865, upon surgeon's certificate of disability from chronic diarrhea, induced by exposure in the service, and by the hardships and privations he suffered as a prisoner of war while in the hands of the enemy. He was a pensioner from October 1, 1883, to March 15, 1884, at $12.50 per month; from last date to March 2, 1885, at $25 per month, and from last date to the present time at $30 per month.

His claim for increase has been rejected, for the reason that the chronic rheumatism and other ailments upon which it is based, from which he is now suffering, are not traceable to his pensionable disease, chronic diarrhea.

The sworn medical and lay testimony, in reference to his condition in the years 1884, 1885, and 1886, shows that he was during all those years, and had been ever since his discharge, suffering from chronic diarrhea; that he was frequently confined to his bed, requiring the attendance of a third person; when up and walking around he was yet in a very helpless condition, totally unable to attend to any kind of business. The muscles of the soles of his feet are wasted away, the skin dry and shriveled, the joints of his toes distorted, both knee-joints enlarged, the muscles of the third and fourth fingers are atrophied to the wrist, and there are other symptoms of chronic rheumatism.

When the diarrhea relaxes the rheumatism is increased, and there seems to be an intermittent contest between the two complaints—when one abates the other comes on with increased severity. He is described by the examining surgeon, Banks, May 23, 1866, as a man "totally disabled for work, though not always requiring the attendance of a third person."

We think the two diseases in this case closely related to each other, and the disability incurred by them is due to the officer's military service. We recommend an increase of his pension to the rate of $50 per month, as provided for in the bill, the passage whereof is recommended.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THIRZA S. JENNER.

Mr. BAKER, of New York, called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 12039) granting a pension to Thirza S. Jenner.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Thirza S. Jenner, the insane mother of Charles Henry Jenner, late private Company C, Twenty-second Regiment New York Cavalry Volunteers, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, and pay her pension to her husband, Charles H. Jenner, for the use and benefit of said Thirza, and in case of his death to her legally constituted guardian.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12039) granting a pension to Thirza S. Jenner, submit the following report:

The claimant in this case is the mother of Charles H. Jenner, who died of small-pox while in the military service of the United States. The evidence submitted shows that the parents are now without means of support and the mother is insane. The invariable rule of Congress has been to grant relief in cases like this, and your committee therefore report the bill back, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ERASMUS W. JONES.

Mr. BELDEN called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 11459) granting a pension to Erasmus W. Jones.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Erasmus W. Jones, late chaplain of the Twenty-first Regiment United States Colored Troops.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11459) granting a pension to Erasmus W. Jones, submit the following favorable report:

Claimant was chaplain of the Twenty-first Regiment United States Colored Troops. He enlisted May 21, 1864, and was honorably discharged April 25, 1866. His application was rejected by the Pension Department because of claimant's inability to furnish the required evidence corroborating his own. In his application for pension claimant alleges deafness, resulting from malarial fever contracted at Hilton Head, S. C., in September, 1865, and rheumatism. He was granted a leave of absence of twenty days September 9, 1865, because of malarial fever, which leave was several times extended for the same cause.

Claimant swears that after this fever he was troubled with roaring sounds in his head and his hearing became impaired. The trouble increased until 1879, when the hearing of his left ear was wholly gone, and three years later the hearing of both ears was totally gone. He also suffered from rheumatism from time of discharge.

The deafness was so gradual in its development that he can not furnish other evidence than his own of its origin. He did not have medical treatment therefor for some time after discharge. Dr. H. G. Jones, a physician who has made the treatment of the ear a specialty, and who has treated Mr. Jones, says in an affidavit filed with the committee that deafness results from malarial fever. Claimant is a minister of the gospel, seventy-three years old.

His character for absolute truthfulness is vouched for by Rev. W. F. Markham, presiding elder of Mr. Jones's district; by Hon. Ellis H. Roberts, member of the Forty-second and Forty-third Congresses; by Hon. C. D. Prescott, member of the Forty-sixth and Forty-seventh Congresses, and by E. P. Bailey, now postmaster of Utica, who writes of him:

"I have such faith in him that it is to me inconceivable that he would make a claim upon the Government to which he could not subscribe with a clear conscience."

Your committee think the claim has merit, and recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HENRY B. DAVIDSON.

Mr. DOCKERY (when Mr. BIGGS's name was called). I ask unanimous consent to present for consideration for Mr. BIGGS the bill (H. R. 11751) to remove the political disabilities of Henry B. Davidson. As the House knows, Mr. BIGGS is a very old and feeble man, and not able to attend these night sessions.

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all political disabilities which Henry B. Davidson, of California, has incurred under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States be, and the same are hereby, removed.

The report (by Mr. CULBERSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, having considered the bill of the House of Representatives No. 11751, "to remove the political disabilities of Henry B. Davidson," beg leave to report the same to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania (when Mr. BINGHAM'S name was reached). My colleague, Mr. BINGHAM, is necessarily absent to-night [laughter and cries of "Regular order!"], and is very anxious that I should call up a bill for him. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded.

JENNIE HARRIS.

Mr. BOOTHMAN called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 7858) granting a pension to Jennie Harris.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll of the United States the name of Jennie Harris, daughter of John B. Harris, late private of Company D, Eightieth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, war of 1861, now deceased, and to pay to her a pension at the rate of $25 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. YODER) was read, as follows:

Jennie Harris, the applicant named in this bill, is the daughter of John B. Harris, who enlisted August 1, 1862, in Company D, Eightieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, for three years. He died in hospital at Chicago, Ill., from chronic diarrhea, on the 4th day of August, 1863. At his death he was a sergeant in his company, and was known as a brave and faithful soldier. He left surviving him his widow, Louisa J. Harris, and an only daughter, Jennie, the beneficiary named in this bill, born January 31, 1861.

At the time of his death the soldier had no property or means of any extent. His widow was compelled to support herself and the child Jennie by working at such employment by the day and week as she could obtain, assisted only by the small pension granted to her as widow. In 1864 the child Jennie was, upon the advice of friends, placed in the Soldiers' Orphans' Home, at Webster, St. Louis County, Mo. While in the home, in the year 1866, she became totally blind, and has remained so ever since, with no hope of ever recovering her sight. Her mother remarried in the year 1865 to George Parcher, of Bryan, Ohio, where she now resides; and Jennie is now and has for several years last past been a member of Mr. Parcher's family. Mr. Parcher was himself a Union soldier. He is a reputable man and good citizen, but in poor circumstances, being compelled to support his own family by continuously laboring at his trade of carpenter and joiner.

Mrs. Harris, now Mrs. Parcher, drew a pension from the date of the death of the first husband up to the date of her remarriage, which was continued to Jennie until she arrived at the age of sixteen years, when it ceased under the law.

The committee feel that this is one of the cases which appeal very strongly to the sense of liberality of Congress as well as to a sense of what is justly due from the people of this nation to the helpless orphan of a faithful soldier who died at his post. We therefore recommend the passage of the bill, with the following amendment: In line 9, strike out "twenty-five" and insert "eighteen."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CLARA M. OWEN.

Mr. BOUTELLE called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 11052) granting a pension to Clara M. Owen.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Clara M. Owen, widow of William H. Owen, late of Company B, Twentieth Maine Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) is as follows:

Clara M. Owen is the widow of William H. Owen, who served as private of Company B, Twentieth Regiment Maine Volunteers, from August 29, 1862, until July 9, 1865. Her claim for pension has been rejected on the ground that his death by drowning, August 31, 1884, is not shown to be chargeable to his military service.

Soldier was a pensioner on account of gunshot wound of chest and lung. The widow alleges that the immediate cause of his death was disease of heart.

It is conceded by the Pension Bureau that the wound did produce disease of heart. The medical examinations show that the ball entered the left lung in front, between the fourth and fifth ribs, at a point nearly midway between center of sternum and anterior border of axilla, passing backward and outward, emerging close to the axillary border of left scapula at a point about 2 inches from its inferior angle, passing in close proximity to upper border of the heart, producing as a result weakness of the action of the heart, incapacitating him for any active manual labor.

Soldier was an excellent swimmer, and in the habit of bathing nearly every week during warm weather. About a week before his death he had a bad spell of heart trouble. As was his custom he went to a stream near his home, taking with him soap and towel. His body was found lying on his face near the shore. There was no grass nor weeds to entangle his feet; no evidence of a struggle; everything seemed to indicate that he had fallen dead. The depth of the water where he was found is given by some as 5, by another witness at 8 feet. His last footprints were very near the body.

Dr. Hannibal Hamlin, who was acquainted with the soldier from his discharge to death, testifies that he saw the body recovered from the water; there were no signs of death from suffocation or drowning; lungs were not filled with water, nor was the face livid or purple showing congestion. In affiant's opinion death was not produced by drowning suffocation, but by a sudden paralysis of the heart's action.

Dr. Louis C. Ford is of like opinion.

The medical referee holds that the claim can not be medically established because no post-mortem examination was held.

From the history of the case it does not appear that soldier incurred any risk, or that he did not use the care and caution which ordinary prudence would dictate should be exercised by one in a disabled condition. He was accustomed to take his baths at the same spot for years, was well acquainted with all the surroundings, and met his death at a season of the year when the water was best adapted for bathing purposes. The opinion of the physician who saw the body taken from the water shortly after death, taken in connection with the medical history of the case, leaves little doubt as to the immediate cause thereof. Three years' faithful service, and years of sufferings from disability contracted therein, should, however, be sufficient justification to solve any remaining doubt in favor of this poor widow.

The committee therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill, and ask that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. MARIA C. M'PHERSON.

Mr. BREWER called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 10523) granting a pension to Mrs. Maria C. McPherson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Maria C. McPherson, widow of Daniel McPherson, late a corporal of Company C, Twenty-fourth Michigan Infantry.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10523) granting a pension to Mrs. Maria C. McPherson, submit the following report:

Maria C. McPherson is the widow of Daniel McPherson, late corporal of Company C, Twenty-fourth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry. He enlisted in 1861, served until and was wounded at the battle of Gettysburgh, July 1, 1863, in the shoulder, dislocating the head of the right humerus, and in the second finger of the right hand, necessitating an amputation.

After he had grown somewhat better of his wounds he was transferred to the Veteran Reserve Corps, from which he was discharged October 31, 1864, on account of disability arising from said wounds, as will be observed, over a year after he received them. All this appears by the records of the Adjutant-General's Office. He never applied for a pension, not being, during his life, in need of it. He died on the 16th of April, A. D. 1880, and on the 6th of June, 1881, his widow applied to the Pension Office to be put on the pension-rolls. Her claim was rejected on the ground that the origin of the disease of which he died was not legally established.

The testimony in the case given by persons of high respectability, who knew him from his boyhood until his death, shows strongly that he entered the service a very robust, healthy young man, and came out of it physically broken down and prematurely old. As he did not improve enough in health during the fourteen months after receiving his wounds until his final discharge to be fit even for duty in the Veteran Reserve Corps, or during the remainder of his life, he was an invalid and fell into a decline, which resulted in lung disease, and died.

How much testimony is needed to connect his death with his wounds; how much to prove that a robust man, who is perfectly healthy up to the time of receiving severe wounds and is never healthy afterwards, died by reason of the wounds, may be so nice a question as to be beyond practical solution, but ordinary sense would connect the wounds with the ill health, and the ill health in its different phases with the death. At any rate there seems to be doubt, and if there is this great Government ought not to split hairs with the widow of a soldier who served years during the war, and who gave his youth and health to his country.

We recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FRANCES H. PLUMMER.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, called up for consideration the bill (S. 2091) granting a pension to Frances H. Plummer.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, the name of Frances H. Plummer, widow of Brig. Gen. Joseph B. Plummer, United States Army, and to pay her a pension of $100 a month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. FRENCH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2091) granting a pension to Frances H. Plummer, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Mrs. Frances H. Plummer is now on the pension-rolls, under special act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, at the rate of $50 per month, as the widow of the late Brig. Gen. Joseph B. Plummer.

The records of the War Department show the following facts concerning General Plummer's services: Graduated from West Point July 1, 1841, and appointed second lieutenant; promoted to first lieutenant March 15, 1848; to captain May 1, 1852, and major Eighth United States Infantry, April 25, 1862. Served in the war with Mexico at Vera Cruz and city of Mexico; subsequently in Texas and the Indian Territory, where he was stationed at the breaking out of the late war, in command of Fort Cobb. While most of the United States troops in that section of the country either surrendered or were captured, Captain Plummer, after a long and tedious march, during which the troops were on short rations, succeeded in bringing his men safely into Missouri, where he arrived at that critical moment which, for a time at least, gave the Confederate forces control of the southern and western part of that State.

Captain Plummer participated in the battle of Wilson's Creek, Missouri, August 10, 1861, in which General Lyon was killed and the Union forces, after a desperate fight against superior numbers, were finally compelled to retreat. Captain Plummer, while leading the regulars to a final charge, received a serious wound in hip from a large minie-ball, which was never removed. He continued the fight until he fell from exhaustion. On September 25, 1861, he was mustered in as colonel of the Eleventh Missouri Volunteers, and on October 22, 1861, he was promoted to brigadier-general. He served with his regiment in Missouri until March 1, 1862, being engaged with the enemy at Fredericktown; commanded the post of Cape Girardeau until he joined General Pope's expedition against New Madrid and Island No. 10. General Rosecrans, in general orders announcing General Plummer's death, says:

"At New Madrid by General Pope's order, by heavy circuitous march, he (Plummer) seized Point Pleasant, and by skillfully placing his men in rifle-pits and covering his batteries successfully held it against numerous furious assaults of the rebel gunboats, thus cutting off all supplies by transport to Island No. 10. After taking part in all the toils and privations of this army, which were crowned by the capture of Island 10, and the forces under MacKall, he commanded his brigade during the advance on Corinth and one of the divisions of the left wing during the 35 miles' pursuit of the rebels after the evacuation. Brave, honest, true, and experienced, the country, as well as his companions in arms, will mourn his loss."

General Plummer died suddenly on the 9th of August, 1862, at Corinth, Miss., of congestion of the brain, unquestionably brought on from overexertion and anxiety for the successful termination of the then pending conflict.

General Pope, in a recent letter filed with this committee, says:

* * * "In all these operations he (General Plummer) rendered most distinguished services, and was remarkable for intrepid conduct and most excellent military judgment. * * * He died in the field from diseases contracted during the fatigues and exposures of active campaign. I know no officer of the Army of his grade who has rendered more valuable and distinguished services to his country or who is better entitled to the most favorable consideration of his Government."

Major-General Schofield, in a letter addressed to this committee, and who was personally associated and acquainted with General Plummer, speaks in the highest terms of the latter's ability and devotion to the Union cause and his zealous discharge of every duty.

Mrs. Plummer is dependent upon the pension now received, not only for her own support, but for the maintenance of a daughter, who is a great sufferer from a nervous ailment which prevents her from making any exertions toward her support.

In view of the gallant services of the deceased officer and the dependent condition of his surviving family, your committee are of opinion that the relief asked for should be granted, and therefore report favorably on the bill and ask that it do pass, amended, however, by striking out the words "one hundred," in line 6, and insert therein instead the words "seventy-five."

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, if the House will indulge me just one minute I will state the facts regarding this case. The Senate unanimously allowed this widow $100 per month. The House committee struck out $100 and inserted $75. Opposition will be made to the passage of the bill, and I ask that the Committee of the Whole adopt the amendment and order the bill to be reported favorably to the House; that when in the House the record shall show the previous question was ordered, and the bill then go over to be voted on in the regular way in a full House.

Mr. CHEADLE. And that there be thirty minutes allowed for debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks that the amendment be adopted, the bill reported to the House favorably, the previous question considered as ordered, thirty minutes allowed for debate, and its further consideration postponed until next Friday immediately after consideration of the bill which has been ordered to be reported under the same conditions. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MARIA BEISER.

Mr. BROWN, of Ohio, called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 4591) granting a pension to Maria Beiser.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls the name of Maria Beiser, widow of John Beiser, late a private in Company C, One hundred and eighth Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, subject to the limitations and restrictions of the pension laws (pension claim numbered 295276).

The report (by Mr. YODER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4591) granting a pension to Maria Beiser, submit the following report:

Maria Beiser resides in Cincinnati, Ohio; is the widow of John Beiser, who was a private in Company C, One hundred and eighth Regiment of Ohio Volunteers. He was discharged from said service on June 9, 1865, after nearly three years' service, and died April 6, 1872.

The doctor who treated him during his last illness and reported his death to board of health says immediate cause of death was pneumonia. He did not give the remote cause of death, and when a special agent of the Pension Office took his testimony he could not recollect the case so as to say anything more than was in his report to the board of health.

The evidence of Adam Dilg, hospital steward, and privates Lewis Mullisk and J. Hampock and William Meyer seems to have satisfied the Commissioner of Pensions that soldier contracted the chronic diarrhea and rheumatism while in the service and line of duty, and the further testimony of Dr. Zeporlin, Dr. Querney, and of various neighbors of the deceased, shows conclusively that he came home from the Army suffering from chronic diarrhea and rheumatism, in a weak and debilitated condition, and that he gradually failed in health and grew weaker from month to month, and that for a year or more before his death he was only able to walk around a square in the city by the aid of a cane, and that he was confined to his bed for a month or more before his death.

The Commissioner of Pensions rejected Maria Beiser's application for pension because he died of an acute disease, pneumonia, not incident to the service.

Your committee are aware that there is no positive testimony showing the pathological connection between the diseases contracted in the Army and pneumonia, yet they are convinced from the history of the case that pneumonia was the result of chronic diarrhea and rheumatism, and therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM H. MARSTON.

Mr. BURROWS called up the bill (S. 3112) granting an increase of pension to William H. Marston.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to increase the amount of pension allowed William H. Marston, late of the Seventeenth Michigan Infantry, to the sum of $45 per month, in lieu of the amount he is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

The following is the Senate report on the bill, which is undoubtedly correct in statement of facts, and we adopt it:

Claimant enlisted in Company B, Seventeenth Michigan Volunteer Infantry, June 2, 1861; was wounded in the tibia of right leg in the line of his military duty before Petersburgh, Va., June 18, 1864, and was discharged on surgeon's certificate of disability May 5, 1865. He is now receiving a pension of $24 per month on account of gunshot wound of right leg. Claim for increase of pension under act of Congress approved August 4, 1886, was rejected November 23, 1886. Grounds of rejection not stated.

In a letter dated June 23, 1888, claimant states that he has not been able to attend to any business during the past three weeks on account of sickness; that he has a wound in his foot, with partial loss of the bones of the heel, and that he is a constant sufferer from rheumatism, chronic diarrhea, and piles; that he thinks himself entitled to a rating of at least $50 per month; that if his health permitted he could get a salary of $2,500 per year and expenses; that he is ready to come to Washington, if necessary, at any time, and appear before any board of examining surgeons the Commissioner of Pensions may designate; that he has never made any claim for pension on account of wound of foot, with loss of a portion of the heel bone, rheumatism, chronic diarrhea, or piles.

In affidavit executed July 3, 1888, claimant states that many fragments of the bone of his right leg were removed, and that gangrene having set in his case was declared hopeless; that his general health is greatly broken down.

In affidavit filed April 12, 1866, Constant Luce, late colonel of claimant's regiment, testifies that claimant served with honor to himself and to the satisfaction of his officers from the date of his enlistment to the time he was wounded, in June, 1864.

In affidavit filed April 26, 1888, Dr. E. J. Bonine, late surgeon of claimant's regiment, testifies that claimant while on duty received a gunshot wound through head of tibia near the knee-joint, crushing the bone and cutting it nearly off; that he insisted upon amputating the leg at the time, but claimant refused to have it done; that the leg has wasted away, and that a large portion of the tibia has been removed; that he has frequently examined claimant's wound since 1865, and is satisfied that he is a great sufferer all the time from pain and nervous prostration; that claimant's condition is worse now than it would have been had the leg been amputated at the time the wound was received.

In affidavit executed July 3, 1888, Dr. Bonine further testifies that claimant is wholly disabled for manual labor, and is in a worse condition than he would be had his leg been amputated above the knee, and that claimant has lost the entire tibia from the knee to the ankle.

In a letter dated May 30, 1888, Dr. Bonine states that claimant is now suffering from blood poisoning from the wound of his right leg.

In affidavit filed April 28, 1888, Dr. William H. Smith, of Niles, Mich., testifies that claimant is wholly disabled for manual labor by reason of a gunshot wound of his right leg, said to have been incurred in the service of the United States.

In affidavit filed April 26, 1888, Dr. J. D. Bowman, of Benton Harbor, Mich., testifies that claimant's leg is in a much worse condition than it would have been had it been amputated at the time the injury was received.

In an affidavit executed May 22, 1888, Dr. John D. Bowman further testifies that he has known claimant since June, 1864, and was his family physician from 1881 to 1884, and thoroughly understands his condition; that claimant has suffered a great deal from extreme nervous prostration, due entirely to the condition of his limb, and that amputation could not be performed now without danger to life.

In affidavit executed June 19, 1888, Dr. O. P. Horn, of Niles, Mich., testifies that he personally examined claimant on the 14th day of June, 1888, and found him badly afflicted in his right leg; that he is suffering with wounds of a dangerous nature which will certainly shorten his life; that the wounds sometimes discharge matter and broken pieces of bone, and that claimant is disqualified for the performance of any kind of manual labor.

The facts in this case warrant favorable action, and your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment: Strike out the word "fifty," in the sixth line, and insert the words "forty-five."

The amendment reported by the committee to strike out "fifty," in the sixth line, and insert "forty-five" was read and agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOSEPH VAN ARSDEL.

Mr. CHEADLE called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 4763) to grant a pension to Joseph Van Arsdel.

Mr. GEST. I ask unanimous consent that in this case, and in the other cases which may be considered this evening, the bill alone be read with the recommendation of the committee. We consume a vast deal of time here in the reading of detailed statements of fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole has heard the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GEST]. Is there objection?

Mr. KILGORE. I can not consent to the course suggested.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Joseph Van Arsdel, as dependent father of William C. Van Arsdel, late Twenty-second Battery, Indiana Artillery Volunteers, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

At the beginning of the civil war Joseph Van Arsdel had four sons, William C., Isaac M., John S., and Jacob S., all of whom went into the Army, and all of whom became more or less disabled by sickness. Three of them became pensioners; two of them have died of their disabilities; the fourth has never applied for pension. The two sons now living, John S. and Jacob S., have families, and are not able to afford their father a comfortable living, but do what they can to assist him. The father, by reason of age and infirmities, is no longer able to earn his own support. During the war he had a little property, all of which was spent in taking care of his sons. He made six trips to the Army to care for them when sick, and nursed and cared for them after their discharge. Having spent all and buried two of them from Army diseases, he finds himself at the age of seventy-five poor, broken down, and dependent.

The present application for pension is based on his dependence on his eldest son, William C. It was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that the soldier left a widow and child, so that the father was not entitled under the general law.

The widow was pensioned until her remarriage, and the child until sixteen years old. Both are now dead. The second son, Isaac, also left a widow, who is now a pensioner.

It is apparent, then, that the applicant can not be pensioned under the general law and must come to Congress for a special act. The issue is simply one of legislative discretion.

In view of the age, infirmity, and poverty of the father, of the number of soldiers he contributed to the cause of his country, and of the personal services and sacrifices involved, your committee believe this is a case wherein the rules of the general laws should be relaxed, and therefore they recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS DAVEY.

Mr. CHIPMAN called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 6532) to pension Thomas Davey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas Davey, late of Company D, Sixteenth Michigan Volunteers, in the late war for the Union, and to pay him a pension of $30 per month from the date of the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

The claimant, Thomas Davey, is now pensioned at the rate of $14 per month for gunshot wound of left leg and resulting varicose veins. The examining surgeons, in their original report, certify that he was quite lame from the effect of these injuries. This was in 1877. In 1880 the board certify that "this varicose condition is quite extensive. The tumors are numerous and quite large, embracing the whole of the lower part of the leg and ankle; suffers with pain in standing or walking long." In 1884 the board certify "that they have no doubt that the claimant's disability is a serious interference with the use and strength of the leg, making it almost impracticable for him to perform any work standing or walking."

He has applied for and been refused an increase on the ground that he is rated enough already, and because the varicose condition of the right leg (for which he claimed an increase) is not a result of a wound in the left. Dr. George Duffield, of Detroit, a surgeon of high respectability and skill, certifies "that the gunshot wound of his leg so obstructed the venous circulation that an exaggerated form of varicose veins is the result, spreading over both lower limbs and preventing him from standing or walking or doing any manual work. There is also a complete femoral hernia, which is dependent on the diseased veins, and which, because of their enlargement, it is impossible to hold in place by any known truss. This interference with the circulation has produced serious changes in digestion, causing dyspepsia of an aggravated nature, with palpitation and irregularity of the heart." In this opinion Dr. Chittick, of Detroit, coincides.

Davey is undoubtedly in a very bad condition. His appearance is one of extreme disability, and grows worse from day to day, as those who have known him a few months observe. His breath is fetid. He is lame, weak, and apparently suffering. His business was that of a clerk in a retail grocery house, which he has been compelled to abandon, as his bad breath and physical inability render him undesirable in that employment. His only property is a little home in Detroit, which he manages to keep, as well as to support his family in a feeble way by odd jobs performed, which are always beyond his strength and with but little remuneration. Without at all impugning the decision of the Pension Bureau, his case is one of nearly total disability. It clearly arises from injuries received in the service, and almost isolates him because of the offensiveness of his breath. He is and always has been a man of good standing.

We recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

KATE C. VAN ARNUM.

Mr. CLARK called up for consideration the bill (S. 3422) granting a pension to Kate C. Van Arnum.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Kate C. Van Arnum, widow of John W. Van Arnum, late a private in Company D, Fourth New York Heavy Artillery.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The facts in the case are fully set forth in the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which is as follows:

"This is a bill to pension the widow of John W. Van Arnum, late a private in Company D, Fourth New York Heavy Artillery.

"The deceased enlisted December 14, 1861, was discharged November 14, 1863, was allowed a pension for asthma, which he drew until the date of his death, November 9, 1884. The Pension Office rejected the widow's claim on the ground that the soldier's death was not due to asthma, nor otherwise due to his military service.

"Appeal was made to the Secretary of the Interior, who sustained the Pension Office, simply reiterating its decision.

"It appears from the testimony that Dr. Van Arnum was a severe sufferer from asthma; that the attacks were spasmodic, occurred without warning, and he was known to fall down as one dead. These facts were all known to the medical fraternity of Washington, of which the deceased was a member.

"On the evening of November 4, 1884, Dr. Van Arnum was carried into the drug store, corner Fourteenth and P streets northwest, by two colored men, and on examination it was found that he was suffering from a severe injury of the head, causing paralysis of the right side. He died in five days after this occurrence, and an autopsy disclosed a fracture of the skull and extravasation of blood upon the brain.

"Dr. G. Wythe Cook testifies to the contusion on the head; that he presently recovered consciousness, and was taken to his home; that he grew worse and died; that the autopsy revealed extravasation of blood upon the brain.

"Dr. Francis O. St. Clair was professionally and socially intimate with him; had been with him at all hours of the day and night; knows of his personal knowledge that his attacks came on without warning; has seen him in his (affiant's) own house, in his home, in a public store, in a variety of places, and on one occasion the attack was so sudden as to threaten immediate dissolution; that these attacks were produced by over-exertion, by heat, by the odor of certain drugs, by the fumes emanating from trees or flowers. This affiant saw him on the night of November 4, 1884, at the drug store; he was perfectly rational; his speech was coherent and distinct; he assisted in taking him home and in the care of him.

"Dr. Lewis, proprietor of the drug store, testifies to his intimacy with deceased, to the violence and frequency of his spasmodic attacks, and to their occurrence at times without any cause other than the condition of the atmosphere.

"Dr. Taylor was acquainted with the deceased, and testifies to the severity of his disease. He has seen him drop down as one dead, turn black, froth at the mouth; has seen him so attacked when eating, when riding, when about to ride, and otherwise; that affiant heard of his falling at the time of his death; and then made the remark, 'It is one of his usual attacks;' affiant saw him as soon as he could (after the fall); he was then in a condition similar to that in which affiant had often seen him. Affiant has no hesitation in saying that from his knowledge the injury of which soldier died was caused by the disease for which he was pensioned—spasmodic asthma.

"The surgeon, in his certificate of discharge, says he is incapable of discharging the duties of a soldier because of asthma 'contracted in the line of duty since enlistment.'

"The Pension Office examining surgeon describes asthma, with much bronchial disease, much cough, frequent and severe attacks of difficult breathing, and says he is totally disabled for manual labor.

"He was pensioned from the time of his discharge, although it was proved to be a case of total disability and much suffering, at the inadequate and inconsistent rating of $8 a month.

"In this case there is no ground for a suspicion of foul play. His watch, money, and valuables were found upon his person, and soon after he was taken into the drug-store he recovered consciousness. If he had been hurt otherwise than in the manner shown by the testimony, he would have informed the medical attendants and devoted friends who were with him. The committee regret that it is so frequently incumbent upon Congress to extend relief by special legislation in cases that are so clearly proved.

"The bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass."

Your committee are of opinion that the claim is meritorious, and likewise recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY JANE HARRIS.

Mr. COGSWELL called up the bill (H. R. 6755) granting a pension to Mary Jane Harris.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Jane Harris, mother of George M. Harris, Company C, First Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. FRENCH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6755) granting a pension to Mary Jane Harris, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Mary Jane Harris is the mother of George M. Harris, who died August 6, 1864, while serving in Company C, First Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Cavalry. Her claim for pension has been rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that she was not dependent upon the soldier at time of his death, but was supported by her husband, who at that time was possessed of a farm valued at about $2,000, subject to an incumbrance of $600. This farm was subsequently sold and another place purchased, which remained in the possession of the parents until 1866, when it was transferred to one of the sons for and in consideration of a life support for claimant and her husband. This latter property was incumbered, however, by a mortgage of $2,200.

This son has been unable to pay off the mortgage, and the property has now passed out of his hands. Claimant's husband, the father of the soldier, died in 1875. She has supported herself a greater part of the time since by nursing and other labor, but her age (eighty years) no longer permits her to work, and in consequence is entirely dependent upon others. Claimant had four sons in the Army, who, in the aggregate, gave eleven years of service to the Government.

The case is one of extreme merit and should receive favorable consideration at the hands of Congress.

The bill is therefore returned with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. ELLEN HAND.

Mr. CONGER called up for consideration the bill (S. 3264) granting a pension to Mrs. Ellen Hand.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Ellen Hand, widow of Swalm Hand, late a private in Company D, Nineteenth Regiment Iowa Infantry.

The report (by Mr. SPOONER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3264) granting a pension to Mrs. Ellen Hand, respectfully report:

That they adopt the following Senate report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

[Senate Report No. 1890, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The husband of the beneficiary was a pensioner on account of rheumatism contracted in service. After his death his widow filed a claim for pension, which was rejected on the ground that his fatal disease, which was certified to be caused by typhoid fever, cystitis, and functional disease of the kidneys, was not "pathologically connected" with that for which he was pensioned.

Dr. C. T. Moorman, the physician who attended the soldier for the last six years of his life, and who gave the certificate of the soldier's death and its cause, states in an affidavit of April, 1885—

"Affiant frequently prescribed treatment for soldier prior to his death for rheumatism and irritation of kidneys and bladder, the rheumatism being largely dependent upon the kidney disease for its origin."

In October, 1885, in answer to an office letter of inquiry, Dr. Moorman states:

"When I gave the type of fever of which soldier had died as typhoid, I did not mean a malignant fever with inflammation of the glands of the bowels, but typhoid in character, rendered so partly by the condition of the kidneys, they failing to perform their functions properly, and leaving the blood laden with the poisonous constituents of the urine, which would have been eliminated had the kidneys been in a normal condition. The depressing influence thus brought to bear constituted a dangerous factor in the case. * * * The rheumatism with which he was troubled was largely dependent on the condition of the kidneys. I am convinced that if the condition of the kidneys had been good he probably would not have had the attack of which he died, and if he had it would have been of a different character and more amenable to treatment."

The account of the attending physician establishes the fact of intimate connection between the kidney disease and rheumatism and of the fatal influence of both when the soldier suffered the typhoidal attack; and though not the primary, his pensionable disease, with its complications, was clearly a secondary cause of his death. In this view the committee report favorably upon the bill and recommend it for passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HARRISON WAGNER.

Mr. COOPER called up the bill (S. 332) granting a pension to Harrison Wagner.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Harrison Wagner, late a nurse in general hospital No. 1, Frederick, Md., and pay him at the rate of $25 per month.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommend that the bill be amended by striking out of the bill as amended by the Senate the words "twenty-five" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "twelve," and that the bill when so amended do pass; and the committee hereby adopt and make part hereof the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which reads as follows:

It appears that the claimant was a medical student in the year 1862, and during the fall of that year, after the battle of Antietam, he enlisted in the military service of the United States as a nurse at General Hospital No. 1, Frederick, Md., September 27, 1862, and remained in the service until April 12, 1863, when he was honorably discharged.

The papers show that when he enlisted he was a strong, healthy, and able-bodied man, but that during the period he was nursing the sick and wounded, from indigestion and constipation, as the result of that service, he contracted internal bleeding hemorrhoids, from which he has been suffering ever since, so much so that in the year 1875 he was obliged to quit his profession.

The statements set forth in the petition of the claimant are fully sustained by the evidence of Dr. William H. Wagner, Dr. Luther M. Zimmerman, W. H. Myers, Mrs. Amelia J. Anders, Mrs. Mary Myers, Mrs. Mary Alcott, Elizabeth Fleming, Mrs. Esther Beck, Mrs. Mary Barrack, Benjamin Smith, James Woods, William Wilson, William Grimes, Henry Working, Samuel Myers, Jacob Hyder, George Gilbert, William Nort, Enoch Watz, Henry Hinea, Levi Pipinger, and others.

The committee addressed a letter to the Secretary of War, asking for the record of the claimant, and in reply to that inquiry received a letter from John Moore, Surgeon-General of the United States Army, which is hereto annexed, marked "Exhibit A."

As Congress has established the precedent in a number of cases of giving a pension to army nurses where they are not disabled by reason of their service as such, or at least not requiring proofs that the disability originated in the service and by reason of the duty devolving upon them, the committee is of opinion that, as the proof in this case is conclusive that the claimant, by reason of the service rendered by him as a nurse contracted the disease from which he is now suffering, and at a time when he was regularly enlisted and borne upon the rolls of the Surgeon-General's Department as an army nurse, he comes clearly within the spirit of the pension laws, and should receive recognition at the hands of Congress.

The committee would recommend that Senate bill 332 be amended in line 4, after the words "pension roll," by inserting the words "twenty-five dollars;" and as so amended the bill is reported favorably, with the recommendation that it do pass.

EXHIBIT A.

WAR DEPARTMENT, SURGEON-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D C., May 8, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 14th instant, addressed to the Secretary of War, requesting, for use of the United States Senate, a record of the enlistment of Harrison Wagner as nurse in General Hospital No. 1, Frederick, Md., and evidence of his treatment in hospital for internal bleeding hemorrhoids, and in reply to inform you that the records of this office show Harrison Wagner to have served under contract as nurse in No. 1 General Hospital, Frederick, Md., from September 27, 1862, to April 12, 1863, inclusive. That he was sick is evidenced by copies of prescriptions for medicine ordered for him, but the nature of his disease is not stated.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN MOORE,
Surgeon-General, United States Army.

Hon. CHARLES J. FAULKNER,
United States Senate.

The amendment reported by the committee, to strike out, in lines 7 and 8, the words "twenty-five" and insert "twelve," was read, and agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ANNIE MAY PIFER.

Mr. CROUSE called up the bill (H. R. 765) granting a pension to Annie May Pifer.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Annie May Pifer, invalid daughter of Cornelius Pifer, late of Company F, Second Regiment Illinois Volunteer Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 765) granting a pension to Annie May Pifer, submit the following report:

The beneficiary in this case is the invalid daughter of Cornelius Pifer, late of Company F, Second Regiment Illinois Volunteers, who died in hospital September 13, 1862. This daughter received a pension until 1878, when it ceased because she had arrived at the age of sixteen. The widow remarried, and no one is now receiving a pension on account of the death of this soldier. The evidence shows that she has been a constant sufferer all through life from a nervous affection of the left side, is unable to walk but little, and then frequently falls; that she is mentally weak, unable to perform any manual labor or to care for herself.

This case comes clearly within the rule adopted by Congress, and your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill, with the amendment added, "and pay to her legally-constituted guardian, for her use and benefit, a pension of $18 per month."

The amendment reported by the committee, to add to the bill the words "and pay to her legally-constituted guardian, for her use and benefit, a pension of $18 per month," was read and agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SARAH R. FISHER.

Mr. CUTCHEON called up for consideration the bill (S. 3016) for the relief of Sarah R. Fisher.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah R. Fisher, mother of James K. Fisher, late Company A, Third Regiment Michigan Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3016) for the relief of Sarah R. Fisher, submit the following report:

They adopt the Senate report, which is as follows:

"The claimant under the bill asks pension on account of the death of her son, James K. Fisher, late Company A, Third Regiment Michigan Volunteers, who incurred sunstrokes in the Army, and whose death, it is alleged, was caused by such sunstrokes and their effects.

"The fact of sunstroke is proved by a comrade, who witnessed the stroke and saw the soldier carried from the field on a stretcher. The facts of robust health before service, and of continuous infirm health after, with death by what appeared to be quick consumption, but was not medically certified; the indigent but not utterly poor condition of parents for the greater part of the time since the son's death; their present state of almost helplessness, the mother being seventy-two years old and the father seventy-five, both infirm, and the father unable to labor for support; these facts are established by credible testimony, whose appeal to justice as well as sympathy is given triple force by the further fact that this venerable pair gave two sons and a son-in-law to the Union volunteers from Michigan.

"The case was bunglingly presented to the Pension Office, and failing to meet the requirements there, was rejected; but there is equity enough in it for a double pension. With this opinion the committee report favorably on the bill, and recommend its passage."

The committee add that the tendency of all legislation to provide by general law for indigent parents ought to embrace the aged woman who needs relief now, so that she may benefit by it before she dies.

We recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BAKER, of New York (when the name of Mr. DAVENPORT was called). My colleague, owing to the sickness of his wife—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

ADALINE A. SMYTH.

Mr. DINGLEY called up the bill (S. 2765) granting a pension to Adaline A. Smyth.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Adaline A. Smyth, a volunteer nurse in the war of the rebellion, and pay her a pension during life of $25 per month.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

Claimant under this bill was a volunteer nurse, having served in the Judiciary Square Hospital, at Washington, D. C., for a period of seven months, without pay from the Government, her services being tendered immediately after the battle of Gettysburgh, at that time being a resident of Lewiston, Me.

It is clearly shown that during her service in hospital claimant became seriously ill, from which illness she has never recovered.

The Senate bill proposes to grant pension at the rate of $25 per month during life. There can be no question as to the merits of the case, but as the rule of the committee is to place volunteer nurses on the roll at $12 per month, unless extraordinary services were rendered, your committee recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the words "during life of twenty-five" and substituting the words "of twelve," so that the bill will read, "and pay her a pension of $12 per month."

As thus amended your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The amendment reported by the committee, to strike out, in line 7, the words "during life of twenty-five" and insert "of twelve," so as to read "and pay her a pension of $12 per month," was read and agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

NONA J. TILLERY.

Mr. DOCKERY called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 11711) granting a pension to Nona J. Tillery, minor child of Wyatte L. Tillery.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Nona J. Tillery, minor child of Wyatte L. Tillery, late a member of Capt. J. W. Younger's company of Clay County Enrolled Missouri Militia.

The report (by Mr. WALKER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11711) granting a pension to Nona J. Tillery, minor child of Wyatte L. Tillery, have considered the same and submit the following report:

Wyatte L. Tillery, the father of the applicant, as appears from the papers before the committee, enlisted as a private in the Clay County Company of Enrolled Missouri Militia on the 28th of March, 1864, and served until July 1, 1865, when said company was disbanded. He died in 1880, and it is alleged that his death was the result of measles, contracted during his military service while a member of the above-named organization. J. W. Younger, late captain of said company, testifies that the said Tillery was with the command, and took part in a battle against Price, October 10, 1864, that he was taken prisoner, and at the same time took a severe attack of measles, and from exposure to inclement weather his health became so much impaired that he never recovered good health.

A. W. Robertson, M. D., testifies that he treated the deceased soldier for phthisis pulmonalis for a period of about three years; that he had been his family physician for several years prior to his death, and believes his disease was contracted from an attack of measles while in the service of the United States.

A. L. Chapman, who served as post surgeon of said military organization, testifies that he treated soldier for bronchitis of the lungs, and which was then believed by him to have been superinduced by an attack of measles, which the said Tillery alleged that he had a short time previously. He had no personal knowledge of the after results.

W. F. Tillery: That he knows that the deceased soldier contracted measles as stated, and that his death resulted therefrom.

The mother of claimant has remarried, and did not, during her widowhood, apply for pension. The claimant herein was born April 18, 1875.

After carefully considering all the facts in this case the committee believe that the relief asked for in the bill ought to be granted, and therefore submit a favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. McCREARY. Thirty-eight bills have been agreed to in Committee of the Whole, to be reported to the House, and I move that the committee rise in order they may be disposed of before the hour for adjournment.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Thirty-eight bills have to be disposed of this evening, and the time is very short in which to do it.

Mr. McCREARY. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. DUNHAM. Does it require a quorum to rise?

The CHAIRMAN. It does not.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 33, noes 8.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. McCREARY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the special order, had directed him to report to the House sundry bills with various recommendations.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. PHILENA T. CARPENTER.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (S. 3042) granting a pension to Mrs. Philena T. Carpenter, and put it upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Philena T. Carpenter, of Englewood, Ill., who was a volunteer nurse during the war of the rebellion, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3042) granting a pension to Philena T. Carpenter, submit the following report:

The report of the Senate committee is herewith adopted and the passage of the bill recommended.

[Senate Report No. 2313, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

Claimant was a hospital nurse in the service of the United States Army during the war of the rebellion. She now asks to be pensioned at $25 per month, and furnishes the following testimony in support of her claim:

Claimant states that upon solicitation of representatives of the sanitary commission she went to Mound City, Ill., to help care for the wounded soldiers after the battle of Pittsburgh Landing; while there she was compelled to work night and day during a part of the time; they were surrounded by water for three weeks and deprived of every comfort of life; were compelled to sleep in rough-boarded quarters, through which the rain and wind could play at will. After her service at Mound City she was sent to Cairo, Ill., in Dr. Gray's regimental hospital, and thence to Jackson, Tenn.; in both places she found the duties hard and trying to her strength. She was not compensated for her services, as the ladies of the sanitary commission failed to have her sworn in, and her name was not, in consequence, placed upon the pay-roll.

In affidavit filed June 28, 1887, Dr. William M. Gray, of Allegheny, Pa., certifies that he was surgeon in charge of the general hospital at Mound City, Ill., where twenty or thirty women were brought to him as nurses, among whom was Mrs. Philena Carpenter, whom he did not know personally, but who was prominently brought to his attention upon being transferred to the hospital at Cairo, where he was surgeon in charge of the hospital of the Sixtyt-third Illinois Infantry; that she was faithful and efficient, and could be trusted with all kinds of cases, being much superior to many of the other nurses.

Dr. Lyman Hall, assistant surgeon of the Sixty-third Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, testifies substantially as above.

During the reading of the report,

Mr. GALLINGER said: As there are numerous precedents for this class of pensions, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the report.

Mr. KILGORE. Oh, no; there may be no objection to the bill, but we should have these reports read.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report as above.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DUNHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DUNHAM. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that as I am next on the alphabetical list for next Friday night, I will waive my right.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

WILLIAM BARNES.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11999) granting a pension to William Barnes, and put it upon its passage.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I desire to make a statement before that bill is taken up. I will be the next member called. I have been present here to night and had hoped to reach it. I can not be here next Friday night.

Mr. McCREARY. I can not be here myself on next Friday night, but if the gentleman desires me to withdraw in his favor I will do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY). The Chair would like to recognize both gentlemen. The gentleman from Kentucky can send up his bill and have it read, and the Chair will endeavor to recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania also.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. All right.

The bill called up by Mr. McCREARY was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, the name of William Barnes, Company D, Third Kentucky Cavalry.

There being no objection, the reading of the report was dispensed with.

The bill was considered and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McCREARY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES MILLER.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I ask unanimous consent to extend the time for five minutes——

Mr. KILGORE. Oh, no. I am willing that the time shall be extended to finish the gentleman's bill, but no longer.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. Very well. Then I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 538) granting a pension to James Miller, and put it upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension law, the name of James Miller, of the city of Reading, Pa., late a private in Company B, of the Two hundred and fifth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers.

Mr. CHEADLE. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the report in that case be dispensed with and that it be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The report (by Mr. LYNCH) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 538) granting a pension to James Miller, submit the following report:

Soldier enlisted August 18, 1864, as a private in Company B, Two hundred and fifth Pennsylvania Volunteers, and was discharged June 2, 1865. His claim for a pension was based on rheumatism of the heart, and rejected, as it is claimed there is no medical evidence of the alleged disability and no record of its existence in the service nor until a couple of years after the discharge of claimant.

The testimony on file proves clearly that for several years before the war claimant was a strong, healthy man. He was never known to complain or suffer from pains or sickness; that this state of health and vigor continued until, in camp at Petersburgh, claimant complained of pains in the bones and rheumatism; that these pains continued, but claimant refused to go to hospital, because he said he did not want to be called a hospital bum. Soldier's comrades testify that before the exposure to bad weather without fire (which was prohibited) at Petersburgh claimant was free from pains and did not complain, but that from that time he was a sufferer. His neighbors at home, since the war, testify that claimant has suffered severely and continuously most of the time.

It would seem, from a careful examination of all the papers on file, that soldier should have based his claim for a pension on other grounds than rheumatism of the heart—perhaps malaria. Be that as it may, it is evident that while on duty in service at Petersburgh, Va., this soldier who up to that time had been a perfectly healthy, sound man, was taken with severe pains in the back, chest, and legs, which at intervals have continued to date. Upon these main facts all of the witnesses agree.

Although there is at present no great disability from rheumatism, as would appear from the medical examination, yet there can be no doubt that claimant did suffer from rheumatism while in service, and rheumatism being accepted as a potent factor of disease of the heart, which does now exist, it, together with the malarial poisoning from which he suffered during service, as shown by the record, can reasonably be accepted as the cause of his present troubles.

Your committee therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill, and ask that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was considered and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ERMENTROUT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. FANNIE A. BOYD.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have the same order made in reference to the bill (H. R. 9963) to increase the pension of Mrs. Fannie A. Boyd, widow of Capt. O. B. Boyd, as was made in the other two cases to-night. This is the bill I called up in committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that this bill is on the special-order list. The Clerk will read the order heretofore made in regard to that bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Postponed to July 12, at 8 o'clock p. m.; thirty minutes' debate.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. Then I ask unanimous consent that the third reading of that bill be dispensed with, and that it be now passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MARY THORN.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 2861) granting a pension to Mary Thorn, and put it upon its passage.

Mr. KILGORE. The hour of 10 o'clock has arrived.

Mr. JACKSON. I hope the gentleman will not object in this case. I have not been able to secure the passage of any of these bills.

Mr. KILGORE. You have had plenty of opportunities to get bills through.

Mr. JACKSON. No. Owing to circumstances beyond my control I have not had opportunities.

Mr. KILGORE. All right. Let the bill be read.

Mr. JACKSON. I ask unanimous consent to extend the time for five minutes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I object to that.

Mr. JACKSON. Then I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the bill. This is a meritorious case.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the hour has arrived for adjournment under the order of the House.

Mr. JACKSON. Let this bill be read. It will take but a moment or two.

Mr. HUNTER. No objection. Let it go through.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the bill will be reported.

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary Thorn, dependent mother of James S. Thorn, deceased, late acting hospital steward in charge of Union soldiers wounded at battle of Shiloh and taken to Marine Hospital, Allegheny City, Pa., subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws relating to dependent mothers of deceased enlisted volunteer soldiers of the late war.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

Strike out line 6 and all after that, and insert in lieu of it the following:

"Late acting assistant surgeon of volunteers, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, and grant her a pension at the rate of $17 per month."

Mr. JACKSON. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the third reading of the bill and put the bill upon its passage.

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JACKSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. GALLINGER (at 10 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

DUTIES ON SUGAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication from the Secretary of the Treasury; which was read:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., January 18, 1889.

SIR: As directed by Senate resolution dated the 8th instant, I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of the manuscript report of frauds in sugar at New York and Philadelphia, dated November 1, 1887, which was submitted by special employé F. Aubrey Byrne, of this Department. This report is the same as that referred to in the resolution of the Senate dated March 1, 1888, and its copying has progressed as rapidly as the current work of the office having charge thereof would permit. The report was accompanied by numerous exhibits, which fill a box 2⅛ by 1⅞ by 1⅛ feet. It has not been practicable to copy these exhibits owing to the demands made upon the time of the clerks by the regular business of the Department. To furnish such copies will require the services of a competent clerk at least twelve months. I will, if desired, have copies made of said exhibits for the use of the Senate, but if required at an earlier period than that stated, it is respectfully suggested that provision be made for the necessary additional clerical force.

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD, Secretary.

Hon. JOHN J. INGALLS,
President pro tempore United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution to which this is the reply was offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and the communication, with the accompanying papers, will lie on the table until he comes in, if there be no objection.

Mr. HALE. What is it that accompanies the letter?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers are contained in the package now lying on the Secretary's desk.

Mr. HALE. That is the manuscript report, but not the copy of the testimony upon which the report is based, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not examined the accompanying papers. The Secretary will read the part of the communication that refers to the papers and accompanying exhibits.

The Chief Clerk read the portion of the communication referred to.

THE REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill 9051.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? If there be none, that order is closed, and the Calendar under Rule VIII being in order, the Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Schedule E, which was passed over, will now be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SCHEDULE E.—SUGAR.

All sugars not above No. 13 Dutch standard in color shall pay duty on their polariscopic test as follows, namely:

217. All sugars not above No. 13 Dutch standard in color, all tank bottoms, sirups of cane juice or of beet juice, melada, concentrated melada, concrete and concentrated molasses, testing by the polariscope not above 75 degrees, seven-tenths of 1 cent per pound; and for every additional degree or fraction of a degree shown by the polariscopic test, two-hundredths of 1 cent per pound additional.

219. All sugar above No. 16 and not above No. 20 Dutch standard of color, 1½ cents per pound.

220. All sugars above No. 20 Dutch standard of color, 2 cents per pound.

221. Molasses testing above 56 degrees, 4 cents per gallon: Provided, That if an export duty shall hereafter be laid upon sugar or molasses by any country from whence the same may be imported, such sugar or molasses so imported shall be subject to duty as provided by law prior to the passage of this act.

222. Sugar drainings and sugar sweepings shall be subject to duty either as molasses or sugar, as the case may be, according to polariscopic test.

223. Sugar candy and all confectionery, including chocolate confectionery, made wholly or in part of sugar valued at 12 cents or less per pound, and on sugars after being refined, when tinctured, colored, or in any way adulterated, 5 cents per pound.

224. All other confectionery, including chocolate confectionery, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 50 per cent. ad valorem.

225. Glucose, or grape sugar, three fourths of 1 cent per pound.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). The reading of the sugar schedule has been completed, the Secretary informs the Chair.

Mr. ALLISON. I offered an amendment on the 16th instant in relation to cutlery, which was passed over at the request of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], which I wish to have considered.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator also passed over the question of the duty on rice.

Mr. ALLISON. We can take that up subsequently.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 116 it is proposed to strike out paragraph 173 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

173. Pen-knives or pocket-knives of all kinds, or parts thereof, wholly or partly manufactured, valued at not more than 50 cents per dozen, 12 cents per dozen; valued at more than 50 cents per dozen and not exceeding $2 per dozen, 36 cents per dozen; valued at more than $2 per dozen, 60 cents per dozen; and in addition thereto on all the above, 50 per cent. ad valorem. Razors and razor-blades, finished or unfinished, valued at not more than $4 per dozen, $1 per dozen; valued at more than $4 per dozen, $1.25 per dozen; and in addition thereto on all the above razors and razor-blades, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. VEST. That is to some extent an improvement upon the substitute as offered by the Finance Committee, and yet it is a very large increase upon the existing law and the duties proposed by the House bill. The increase under the amendment proposed by the Finance Committee is upon those articles of cutlery and pocket-knives which are most largely consumed in the United States, and not upon the higher-priced articles of pocket-knives, but upon those used by the common people of the country, and which are articles not of luxury but of absolute necessity. I do not propose to engage any more in this discussion in any generalities or abstractions. We have had too much of that. For the balance of this debate, speaking for myself, I propose to confine myself to practical matters and to items of the bill until we have finished it, and I sincerely hope that other Senators will do the same, instead of having political dissertations on Northern and Southern outrages and general economic observations which are about as old as this Capitol.

Mr. ALLISON. I fully concur in the sentiments so well uttered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. VEST. I am glad to have the concurrence of my friend from Iowa, because I think we have all suffered alike.

Now, Mr. President, what is the practical operation of this amendment? I have in my hand a statement by an expert, giving the ad valorem rates under the present law, under the Senate substitute, and under this amendment which is the particular matter under discussion. I will give the foreign cost per dozen upon four-bladed knives, which is $1.22. The present duty is 50 per cent. ad valorem, and the Senate substitute increases that to 181 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is the Senator referring now to the bill as originally reported?

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course, I am talking about the bill and this amendment under discussion. I will repeat that in the analysis which I have in my hand I am giving the foreign cost of the different classifications of pocket cutlery, then the ad valorem duty under the proposed Senate substitute, and then the ad valorem duty under the amendment to the Senate substitute. I suppose that makes it plain.

On pen-knives, which cost abroad $1.22 a dozen, and upon which the present duty is 50 per cent. ad valorem, the Senate substitute increases the duty to 181 per cent., and the Senate amendment increases it to 80 per cent. ad valorem, an increase of 30 per cent. over the existing law. Upon knives costing $1.34 a dozen, and upon which the duty is 50 per cent. ad valorem—I speak now of four-bladed knives—the Senate substitute increases it to 175 per cent. ad valorem, and the present amendment to 77 per cent. ad valorem.

On four-bladed knives costing $1.46 per dozen, the present duty of course on all these being 50 per cent., the substitute increases it to 162 per cent. and the Senate amendment to 75 per cent. On the next classification of $1.58 cost per dozen the substitute fixes the duty at 157 per cent., the present amendment 73 per cent., and so on down. I will not weary myself and the Senate by reading all the items.

I come now to the average knife, at $2.63 per dozen, upon which the Senate substitute puts a duty of 100 per cent. ad valorem and the amendment 73 per cent. On those costing $2.92 a dozen the Senate substitute is 94 per cent. and the present amendment 70 per cent., until we get down to knives at $12 a dozen, and now mark the difference. Upon knives costing $12 a dozen the Senate substitute puts a duty of 42 per cent. ad valorem, and the amendment puts a duty of 55 per cent. ad valorem, the difference in the increase between the existing law and the amendment being only 5 per cent.

Upon knives costing $16 a dozen, upon which the present duty of course is 50 per cent., the substitute puts a duty of 36 per cent. ad valorem, and the present amendment puts a duty of 54 per cent., or an increase only of 4 per cent. over the existing law. Upon the highest-priced knives, which cost $86 a dozen, the present duty is 50 per cent., the Senate substitute puts on them a duty of only 27½ per cent. ad valorem, and the present amendment puts a duty of 51 per cent., or an increase of only 1 per cent. over the existing law.

So that upon the knife for the poor man which costs $1.22 or $1.34 or $1.46 a dozen the increase of duty is from 25 to 30 per cent. ad valorem, and upon the knife for the rich man which is an absolute article of luxury, which costs abroad $86 a dozen, the increase of duty is 1 per cent., and so on through all these schedules a manifest injustice to the poorer classes of the country being committed in every one of these items with a system and regularity and pertinacity which could not have come from accident.

Now, we will take three-blade knives, and upon those which cost abroad 48 cents a dozen, the present duty being always 50 per cent. ad valorem, the Senate substitute increases the duty from 48 per cent. to 330 per cent. The present amendment puts it at 75 per cent.

Upon knives costing 61 cents a dozen abroad the Senate substitute increases the duty to 270 per cent. and the present amendment puts it at 109 per cent.

Mr. ALDRICH. What is that?

Mr. VEST. Upon three-bladed knives costing 61 cents a dozen abroad, about 5 cents a piece. I have them here, and will come to an object-lesson in a few minutes. Upon knives costing 73 cents a dozen or about 6 cents apiece the Senate substitute increases the duty to 230 per cent. ad valorem, and the present amendment increases it to 99 per cent., or an increase of 49 per cent. over the present law.

I will put all these tables in the RECORD. I have given the lowest-priced three-blade knives which the poor people of the country use—and I come to those which cost $6 a dozen, the highest price. The duty under the substitute was 50 per cent., no increase over the existing law, and under the amendment it is 60 per cent., an increase of 10 per cent.

When we come to two-blade pocket-knives, the lowest cost abroad is 37 cents a dozen, 3 cents and a fraction apiece. The present duty always being 50 per cent., the Senate substitute increased the duty to 294 per cent. ad valorem, and the Senate amendment makes it 80 per cent.

Upon two-blade knives costing 61 cents, a little over 5 cents apiece, the foreign cost, the present duty always being 50 per cent. ad valorem, the Senate substitute made it 133 per cent., and the amendment makes it 109 per cent. Upon the highest-priced two-blade knife, which costs abroad $1.95 a dozen, the Senate substitute made it 76 per cent. ad valorem, an increase of 26 per cent., and the amendment makes it 68 per cent., or an increase of 18 per cent. over the existing law.

Now we come to the commonest and cheapest knives, used by children and by the poorest persons in the country, one-blade pocket-knives.

Mr. GEORGE. Barlow knives.

Mr. VEST. No, my friend from Mississippi is mistaken; they are not as good as Barlows. The Barlow knife is an excellent knife, the best cheap knife ever manufactured, and these knives are not at all equal to the Barlow knife. Upon knives costing 18 cents a dozen, on which the present duty is 50 per cent., the Senate substitute increased the ad valorem to 302 per cent., and the amendment puts it at 117 per cent. That is, upon a knife that costs 1½ cents apiece abroad the duty under this amendment would be 117 per cent.

Now, the highest-priced one-blade knife that is made abroad is $1 a dozen, and the duty under the substitute is 75 per cent., and under the amendment is 86 per cent.; so that on the knife costing a cent and a half the increase of duty under the amendment is from 50 to 117 per cent., while on the best quality of one-blade knife, which costs $1 a dozen, the duty is only increased from 75 to 86 per cent., which would be only 11 per cent. increase upon the knife which the man in moderate circumstances, not to call him a rich man, would ordinarily purchase.

Mr. President, here are those knives. [Exhibiting.] If any Senator feels any interest in the matter, he can examine them. Here is the commonest knife, that is made at 17 cents a dozen, the foreign cost, not quite a cent and a half a piece. The present duty is 50 per cent.; the Senate substitute makes the duty 300 per cent., and the amendment makes it 120 per cent. That is on this knife. [Exhibiting.] Here is another common knife, costing 93 cents a dozen; the present duty is 50 per cent., the Senate bill puts it at 186 per cent., and the amendment at 88 per cent. Upon the highest-priced knife, costing $21.90 a dozen abroad, the present duty is 50 per cent., the Senate bill made it 35 per cent., and the amendment puts it at 52.8 per cent. Here are all these different grades, showing what I assert to be the absolute truth, that upon the lower class of cutlery, which constitutes 60 per cent. of the importations into the United States, both the substitute and the amendment have increased the duty, whilst they have not increased it by any means in the same proportion as to the higher-priced cutlery.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish the Senator would enlarge his illustration and explanation a little by showing the price of those knives now in this country.

Mr. ALDRICH. Both at wholesale and at retail?

Mr. ALLISON. Those imported, so as to give a little indication of the profits of the importers.

Mr. VEST. I have just come into the Senate and have not arranged my papers; but in the testimony which was taken by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] and myself which I thought I had before me, the prices in this country are stated by the witnesses; but the point to which I call attention is that the increase of duty is put upon the knives that are used by the common people of the country and which enter most largely into consumption.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator would go on and explain how the amendment will increase the cost to the consumers of the country by showing what price we pay now for these knives, and who receives the profit on them, I should like to hear him do it.

Mr. VEST. There is no doubt that the cutlery interests of the United States are not in so dilapidated a condition as to require this enormous increase of duties unless you propose to exclude all foreign competition. That will be the result of the adoption of this amendment as stated by the witnesses. It is true they are importers, but they are American citizens, and are as much entitled to an equal and just administration of the law as any other class of the American people, and they have testified with an unbroken testimony that the operation of this substitute and of the amendment will be to exclude all foreign competition. If Senators want to do that, let them avow it; let us know it distinctly and emphatically that they propose to shut out the foreign article entirely from competition in this country.

I am frank to say my idea in regard to the matter is that of President Garfield. If you impose duties let them be such as will permit an honest and healthy foreign competition, not to break down and destroy the American manufacture, but let the result of the whole inure to the benefit of the consumer, and not to put around this country a wall which excludes entirely all foreign competition. If that be the intention, the sooner we understand it the better. That is the case as to cutlery, and now let us look at razors.

Upon razors which cost abroad 72 cents a dozen, and upon which the duty is 50 per cent. ad valorem under the existing law, the Senate substitute—now I call the attention of the Senate to this matter—is 95 per cent. ad valorem, and this amendment increases it to 190 per cent. ad valorem, an increase of nearly 100 per cent. over the substitute. Upon razors costing abroad 96 cents a dozen, the duty on which under the existing law is 50 per cent. ad valorem, the Senate substitute imposed a duty of 78 per cent. ad valorem, and this amendment puts 154 per cent. And on razors costing $1.20 a dozen the Senate substitute imposed an ad valorem duty of 68 per cent., and this amendment puts it at 133 per cent. On those costing $1.44 a dozen the Senate substitute put 60 per cent. ad valorem and this amendment puts 120 per cent. On the next grade of razors, costing abroad $1.68 a dozen, the Senate substitute put a duty of 55 per cent. ad valorem, and this amendment puts 110 per cent. On those costing a little over $1.92 a dozen, on which the present duty is 50 per cent., the substitute put a duty of 48 per cent. and the amendment 96 per cent.

So on until we reach the highest-priced razors, at $12 per dozen, and on them the Senate substitute put a duty of only 29 per cent. and the amendment 60 per cent. The rich man who can pay a dollar and a half or two dollars or two dollars and a half for his razor is taxed to the extent under the Senate substitute of 29 per cent. and under the amendment of 60 per cent., but the poor man, the workingman, the darling of the Republican party, the object of their idolatrous worship, if he wants to buy a cheap razor that costs abroad 6 cents apiece, is made to pay 190 per cent. ad valorem, and that is the way we discriminate in favor of the poor people of this country as against the rich and luxurious.

If our friends propose by the imposition of these duties to hermetically seal the American market against all foreign competition, let them say so, for that is the result of this amendment, both as to razors and cutlery. There should be no disguise of that fact, because it is most unquestionably and absolutely true.

Mr. President, there is another statement made by the manufacturers to the effect that they want this duty so as to protect them against fraud. They stated in their testimony before the Finance Committee that cheap German goods such as I have produced here, these low-priced knives and razors, are manufactured in Germany and then put under the brands of American makers and retailed in the American market as being either of American manufacture or in some instances with the English brand—the Sheffield brand—and then sold as English goods. I assert that the testimony shows, which I will produce in a few moments, that the American manufacturers systematically and from year to year take foreign brands and put them upon their goods and retail them to the American consumer as English cutlery. I will produce the identical articles here and show the knives which are made in this country, put under the English brands and then retailed as made in England, when they never saw England, and never went out of the limits of the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. Is that because of the fact that the English goods are better, or because of the fact that they have that reputation, or both?

Mr. VEST. The witnesses state that it is principally because they have the reputation. There are persons who think they can not get a good pocket-knife unless it is made by Rodgers or Wostenholm.

Mr. VANCE. If the Senator from Missouri will permit me, I have the testimony here to which he refers.

Mr. VEST. I have it myself.

Mr. ALLISON. What is the Senator reading from?

Mr. VANCE. I am reading from the testimony taken before the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] and myself by a delegation of the American Hardware Association.

Mr. ALLISON. I was a little curious to know. I tried to find it in our volume of testimony, but could not find it.

Mr. VANCE. It was not taken before the subcommittee of the Committee on Finance; it was taken before a self-constituted committee composed of myself and the Senator from Missouri, which we offer for the consideration of the jury for what it is worth.

Mr. HARRIS. It is, I suppose, the testimony of men experienced and expert in this particular trade.

Mr. VANCE. Yes, sir; men of high character, who were both importers and manufacturers of cutlery, whose names are given:

Senator VANCE. You do not impose them—

This was table cutlery—

on anybody as American-made knives?
Mr. SAXTON. No, sir.
Senator VANCE. You do not deny the fact that they are made in Germany?
Mr. SAXTON. Not at all,
Senator VEST. Still, the point, then, I suppose they make is that there is nothing in these brands which shows that they are made here. For instance, not being an expert, if I should look at that brand I would say it was an American knife. The brand is "H. Cromwell Criterion Cutlery." Here you have Sheffield on all your English knives. Of course, when I look at that knife [indicating] I know it was made in Sheffield, England.
Mr. SAXTON. How would you know but that that was put on in America?
Senator VEST. The question is whether it shows the make; I would not know.
Mr. KORN [exhibiting]. Here is one brand, Essex Cutlery Company. This is a New York concern in Cincinnati, and this same Mr. Rockwell who comes here makes these goods for the "Essex Cutlery Company;" and that is one of the names they complain about. On each knife you see "Sheffield, England; cutlers to Her Majesty."
Senator VEST. That is all right. Anybody would know that that is an English knife.
Mr. KORN. But it is an American knife.
Senator VEST. I know you sell them, but they are made abroad.
Mr. KORN. No, they are American made.
Mr. SAXTON. That is the poorest class of goods they make.
Senator VEST. Who makes these knives?
Mr. SAXTON. All the American manufacturers.
Senator VEST. That is a clear fraud. It has the rampant lion.
Senator VANCE. Where is this knife made?
Mr. KORN. It is made in Connecticut. Here is another knife made in Connecticut [exhibiting]. They do not put down "Cutlers to Her Majesty;" they change their label; but they put down "Sheffield Knife Company, Sheffield, England."
Senator VANCE. They would not do things of that kind in New England?
Mr. SAXTON. We never do that at all.
Senator VEST. How do you know that that company does this?
Mr. KORN. We buy them.
Senator VEST. You bought the knives from those parties?
Mr. SAXTON. Certainly.
Senator VEST. That is pretty good evidence.

These samples were exhibited to the Senator from Missouri and myself in the original packages in which they had been purchased from these Connecticut manufacturers, bearing upon the package the words, "Cutlers to Her Majesty, Sheffield, England," and so on.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAIR. May I ask the Senator if the witness is a party who assists in the perpetration of the fraud?

Mr. VANCE. No, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. I understood the Senator to say that the party buys these knives with the foreign stamp for the purpose of selling them again.

Mr. VANCE. The party buys them from the Connecticut manufacturers with this stamp upon them.

Mr. BLAIR. What does he purchase them for?

Mr. VANCE. He purchases them for sale.

Mr. BLAIR. Then he assists in perpetrating the fraud.

Mr. VANCE. No, sir; he buys the articles which are offered to him, but he says he does not sell them as foreign cutlery.

Mr. BLAIR. Notwithstanding the stamp.

Mr. VANCE. He repudiates that idea.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. VANCE. I am occupying the floor by the courtesy of the Senator from Missouri. If he will yield I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PLATT. I simply desire to say about this testimony that it is not testimony taken before the committee. These same parties testified before the committee and did not make these statements. Mr. Rockwell was present when they testified before the committee, and I think they did not make these statements before the committee.

I desire to say, with regard to the statement of Mr. Korn, that Mr. Rockwell, who makes knives, as it is said, for the Essex Cutlery Company, put on them "Sheffield, England, Cutlers to Her Majesty," I understand that that is not true, and I am so informed by the best authority. I do not say that there was not a knife exhibited there which had "Sheffield, England, Cutlers to Her Majesty" upon it, but that that knife was made by Mr. Rockwell or made in Connecticut I believe is not true. It is true that on table-knives at one time, five or six years ago, for a short time, one cutlery-manufacturing establishment, at the request of dealers, put on the knives "Sheffield Knife Company, England;" but that was at least six years ago, was only done for a short period, and has been entirely discontinued.

So all of this parade is made either about a fact which does not exist, so far as Connecticut manufacturers are concerned, or out of an instance of that name having been put on table-knives at the request of dealers for a short time. It was wrong, and is wrong.

Mr. VEST. I do not know what the Senator from Connecticut means by "parade." I would hardly attach the word "parade" to the production of so ordinary an article as a penknife. We have the identical knives here, and we give the testimony for what it is worth.

Mr. PLATT. If the Senator will permit me, I did not refer to anything that has been said on the other side as a parade. I referred to this testimoney which these importers gave, as read by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. VEST. When I left the discussion I was alluding to the charge made by the manufacturers before the Finance Committee that the English brand or trade-mark was used for the purpose of imposing the cheap German-made pocket-knives upon the American public, or that the American trade-mark was used upon these cheap imported goods for the same purpose. This is denied; but in the testimony from which the Senator from North Carolina has read the statement is made that pocket-cutlery and table-cutlery both are made in this country and placed under the British trade-mark for the purpose of being sold to the American public, and that this is done by the American Cutlery Company, and that is the company that was most conspicuous in the testimony before the Finance Committee in making this charge of fraud against the importers.

Mr. PLATT. What company?

Mr. VEST. The American Cutlery Company.

Mr. PLATT. I know of no such company in the United States.

Mr. VANCE. The Essex Cutlery Company.

Mr. VEST. There was another called the American Cutlery Company.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is there any such thing as the Essex Cutlery Company?

Mr. PLATT. There is no American Cutlery Company and there is no Essex Cutlery Company manufacturing knives in the United States. It is a brand which has beeen adopted to deceive the public.

Mr. VANCE. The witness, Mr. Korn, testifies that it is called the Essex Cutlery Company, and that he bought goods from them with this false Sheffield mark upon those goods.

Mr. PLATT. He says "it is a New York concern in Cincinnati." I state that there is no Essex Cutlery Company manufacturing these knives in the United States to the best of my knowledge and belief, and I think I know about it; neither is there any concern called the American Cutlery Company. It is a brand which has been put upon foreign goods to deceive the American public.

Mr. VEST. That is a very important admission. I have not time to turn to the testimony that was given before the Senator from North Carolina and myself as to the names of these associations. They are American corporations; whether by one name or another does not affect the argument. We can turn to that afterwards as a matter of detail.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is it the purpose of the present argument of the Senator from Missouri to justify the use of American names by German manufacturers?

Mr. VEST. Not at all.

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not know but that it was; he was using it in the same connection.

Mr. VEST. The Senator certainly does not mean to be so offensive as to impute to me that I would stand here and defend any sort of fraud. I say that whoever does this thing and uses a false brand is guilty of fraud.

But these gentlemen, at whose solicitation these schedules have been so enormously increased, in order to depreciate the testimony of importers who are just as much American citizens as they are, went before the Finance Committee and said they were guilty of this fraud. I undertake to say if that rule works at all it ought to work both ways, and that the testimony shows, unless the men who came before the Senator from North Carolina and myself are willful and deliberate slanderers and falsifiers, that this thing is habitually done by American manufacturers; that they take the British brands, put them on their own goods, and sell articles as Wostenholm's manufacture that the factory of Wostenholm & Co. never saw.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is somewhat singular that this importers' association, some of whom may be American citizens, did not make this charge before the Finance Committee where there would have been a chance for cross-examination and where the American Cutlery Association was represented by its president.

Mr. VEST. Is there an American Cutlery Association?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think so.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Connecticut says there is not.

Mr. PLATT, No, I did not say there was not an association of manufacturers, but I say there is no "American Cutlery Company" manufacturing knives.

Mr. VEST. I meant the "American Cutlery Association" if I did use the word "company."

Mr. PLATT. They do not manufacture knives.

Mr. ALDRICH. They do not manufacture knives at all.

Mr. VEST. The persons who dictated or solicited this increase of duty are the persons whom I have in my mind when I make these statements.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from Missouri certainly does not wish to make any statements which are not correct.

Mr. VEST. Not if I know it.

Mr. PLATT. There is no "American Cutlery Company" manufacturing knives in the United States; there is no "Essex Cutlery Company" manufacturing knives in the United States, and this association of manufacturers does not manufacture by itself; it is one of the associations which is common in business. It is not a trust or anything of the sort, but it is an association of manufacturers.

Mr. VEST. Here is the name that is given in the testimony:

Senator VANCE. Who did that?

Mr. KORN. This American Association.

Senator VEST. Where is that factory?

Mr. SAXTON. At Bridgeport, Conn. It is closed up now. They have destroyed it.

It is the American Association.

Mr. PLATT. That is a manufactory which some importers, Messrs. Wiebusch & Co., undertook to establish in the United States in competition with American manufacturers and found that they could not carry it on.

Mr. VANCE. If the Senator from Missouri will permit me, in the statement which was taken before the committee, and therefore must be valid, this same gentleman, Mr. Rockwell, stated that foreigners—the Germans especially, have been despicable enough to place American names upon their wares, which of itself is ample evidence that American manufacturers, however slender their profits, have carefully guarded American names and reputation for good quality.

That is the same gentleman who is interested in this Essex Cutlery Association, who sold his goods under the name of "Sheffield, England, cutlers to Her Majesty."

Mr. PLATT. I do not know how many times it is necessary for me to say that that is not true. Whatever Mr. Korn may have testified to, I think I can state with absolute certainty that the gentleman referred to has never been guilty of any such practice.

Mr. VANCE. Which statement does the Senator say is not true—the one that I read now, or the one I read from the testimony before the Senator from Missouri and myself?

Mr. PLATT. The statement that the gentleman, Mr. Rockwell, to whom the Senator refers, has put that brand upon any American-made knives, or is interested in the Essex Cutlery Company.

Mr. VANCE. He asserts here that the Germans especially have been guilty of this meanness, and Mr. Korn testified that the Essex Cutlery Association, or company, with which Mr. Rockwell was connected, did the very same thing, and he exhibited original packages with the printed brands, as I have repeated again and again, upon those packages, and said that he bought those goods from the Essex Cutlery Association, or company. It may be untrue. I can not tell anything about that.

Mr. PLATT. It is scarcely worth while to be contending over a matter of evidence. I wish to state once more that Mr. Korn says this Essex Cutlery Company is a cutlery concern which does business in Cincinnati. That does not connect it very closely with Connecticut. I say there is no Essex Cutlery Company manufacturing goods in the United States.

This is one of the brands which have been put upon German knives. Now let me read a few of them, premising that none of these are actual companies—not one of them that I am going to read—but they come very near in name to representing actual companies.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I should like to ask the Senator a question for information.

Mr. PLATT. Let me read a specimen of these names that are put on German knives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. VEST. I prefer that the Senator from Connecticut would take up the debate regularly.

Mr. PLATT. Let me read these names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri declines to yield.

Mr. VEST. Of course I will yield to the Senator if he is absolutely anxious about it.

Mr. PLATT. I think it perhaps well to put in these names at this period of the discussion.

Mr. VEST. I was about to state what I believe to be the facts in regard to the matter of brands, and then the Senator can reply to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. VEST. Let the Senator go on if he insists on it.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator yields. There are placed upon knives made in Germany these brands: "New England Cutlery Company," "Bay State Cutlery Company," "Granite State Company"——

Mr. ALLISON. Where are they located?

Mr. PLATT. There are no such companies. "Pennsylvania Cutlery Company," "Western Cutlery Company," "Chicago Knife Company," "Maine Knife Company," "Ames Cutlery Company," "Fulton Cutlery Works," "Manhattan Cutlery Company," "Knickerbocker Cutlery Company," "St. Lawrence Cutlery Company," "National Cutlery Company," "Derby Cutlery Company," "Chatham Cutlery Company," New York Cutlery Company," "Essex Cutlery Company," "Windsor Cutlery Company," "Mt. Vernon Cutlery Company," and Southfield Cutlery Company." Those are only specimens of more than three hundred brands of the same character which are put upon German knives to sell them in this market. The "Essex Cutlery Company" and "American Cutlery Company" are simply companies which do not exist, nor do any of these supposed cutlery companies exist; and the brands are not put on by American manufacturers either.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I did not expect this schedule to come up, and therefore I am not able to present consecutively what I had to say, but I will try to get the facts out before I am through. In the testimony that was taken before the Senator from North Carolina and myself, the Senator from North Carolina said to the witness, Mr. Saxton, who represents the firm of Alfred Field & Co.:

Senator VANCE. It is stated here that the bulk of the cheap German knives are sold here as American knives.

Mr. SAXTON. That is not true.

Senator VANCE. I thought perhaps if there was no brand upon it, that was the reason. Is American cutlery esteemed to be any better than foreign cutlery?

Mr. KORN. I believe the average of foreign cutlery is the best.

Senator VANCE. What reason would men have for passing off these foreign knives as American knives?

Mr. KORN. They like to have some well-sounding names, because they are easier to remember, easier to talk to the people of than anything foreign which they can not speak. For instance, there was in New York the concern of Friedmann & Lauterjung, importers. They made as high a grade of cutlery as anybody did, but nobody ever could pronounce their name; no American could call it. Persons do not like to have such a name on their goods. When an American merchant wants to buy goods made on a special brand, he likes to have a name that he and his traveling man can pronounce, and not something he can not pronounce; for it is a great deal easier to put down a name with with which everybody is familiar—that everybody can speak. But American goods have been made as poorly in this country as they ever have been made in England or Germany. There have been just as poor goods made in America. Really, there have been very few good goods made in America so far as cutlery is concerned.

Mr. SAXTON. The system of special branding goods has grown up in the last fifteen years. It has come about from the fact that competition has been growing keener and keener among jobbers all the time. If a man had the same brand of knife, the same pattern in the same city, it would cut his profits to pieces; but if he has the same knife under different brands, then he can maintain his profits. That is the reason why there have been so many special brands of cutlery. We merchants, who stand between the jobber and the manufacturer, very much prefer to have our own brands, and to get our reputation on our brands, because we can not possibly put on the brands of the makers.

If an order comes in for $10,000 worth of pocket-knives we probably buy them from fifty or sixty or seventy different manufacturers, and it would be impossible to get every man's name on them. We mix them all up, and do not know where they are. We take half a dozen manufactures of a certain lot and put that up of one quality, and another batch of another quality, and so on. We grade the goods into qualities and strike brands for each grade. Here is our own brand [exhibiting]. On the best grade of goods we put our own name. We get them made. Probably the knives that come under that brand are from fifteen or twenty different manufacturers, but we grade them that way and brand them.

On the next grade we put on that brand [exhibiting], Continental Cutlery Company, the Continental brand. On the next grade we put Alexander, Fraser & Co., simply a fictitious name that distinguishes a certain quality of goods. Then we have our German goods. Here [exhibiting] is H. Cromwell Criterion Cutlery. That is part of the name of one of our partners. H. Cromwell Field is his name. The next grade is the Brandford Cutlery Company. What these people complain about is that they are sold as American goods. They are not sold as American goods.

Senator VANCE. It is your own classification for your own convenience.

Mr. SAXTON. That is all; it is for our own convenience; and that is the case with jobbers all over the country.

Senator VANCE. You do not impose them on anybody as American-made knives?

Mr. SAXTON. No, sir.

Senator VANCE. You do not deny the fact that they are made in Germany?

Mr. SAXTON. Not at all.

Senator VEST. Still, the point, then, I suppose they make is that there is nothing in these brands which show that they are made here. For instance, not being an expert, if I should look at that brand I would say it was an American knife. The brand is "H. Cromwell Criterion Cutlery." Here you have Sheffield on all your English knives. Of course when I look at that knife [indicating] I know it was made in Sheffield, England.

I have those knives here.

Mr. SAXTON. How would you know but that that was put on in America?

Senator VEST. The question is whether it shows the make; I would not know.

Mr. KORN (exhibiting). Here is one brand, Essex Cutlery Company. This is a New York concern in Cincinnati, and this same Mr. Rockwell who comes here makes these goods for the "Essex Cutlery Company;" and that is one of the names they complain about. On each knife you see "Sheffield, England; cutlers to Her Majesty."

Senator VEST. That is all right. Anybody would know that that is an English knife.

Mr. KORN. But it is an American knife.

Senator VEST. I know you sell them, but they are made abroad.

Mr. KORN. No, they are American-made.

Mr. SAXTON. That is the poorest class of goods they make.

Senator VEST. Who makes these knives?

Mr. SAXTON. All the American manufacturers.

Senator VEST. That is a clear fraud. It has the rampant lion.

Senator VANCE. Where is this knife made?

Mr. KORN. It is made in Connecticut. Here is another knife made in Connecticut [exhibiting]. They do not put down "Cutlers to Her Majesty;" they change their label; but they put down "Sheffield Knife Company, Sheffield, England."

Here is a box of these knives, which were made in Connecticut. They are branded "George Wostenholm & Sons' Celebrated I. X. L. Cutlery, Warranted." The witness goes on and states that Wostenholm & Co., with their immense reputation and large custom extending to all parts of the world, have not thought this matter of sufficient importance to stop it, although it has been drawn to their attention. So as to these knives which I have here. Here is a very cheap American knife [exhibiting], the cheapest that is made. They are manufactured in this country, and they are sold under a foreign brand. That is the commonest knife made anywhere.

Here is a knife [exhibiting] made in the United States—in Connecticut, I believe—and here is the brand. I have it here, the original package, the outside cover upon it, and all. It is made in the United States and branded, "One dozen. Warranted. No. 12. Handles and blade one solid piece, composed of shears steel. Select Sheffield Knife Company. Plated. Each knife bears our brand name, Sheffield, England." These are table-knives, with the unicorn and rampant lion and all the indicia of British manufacture.

Mr. BUTLER. That knife was made where?

Mr. VEST. It was made in Connecticut. As to these brands or trade-marks, I have a large number of them here that are placed upon cutlery in this country. These are the brands to which Mr. Saxton alludes as being fictitious: "Alexander Fraser & Co.'s Celebrated Sheffield Cutlery. Warranted." "Richmond Cutlery Company, Richmond, Ind." There is no fraud about that. "Pioneer Hardware Company. The best grade of pocket-knives, scissors, and razors." "Cleveland Cutlery Company."

Mr. PLATT. There is no such company.

Mr. VEST. Of course there may not be, but these are brands, and I have tried to make the Senator from Connecticut understand that. Mr. Saxton says there is no such company, but that these are his trade-marks, which he has a right to use.

Mr. BUTLER. Are they frauds?

Mr. VEST. These are not frauds, because there is no English mark about them. He simply takes up a certain name; for instance, in one case part of the name of one of the partners in the firm of Alfred Field & Co., but they did not say it was an English knife; they did not put Sheffield on it. Here is the "Hawk-Eye Cutlery Company's celebrated pocket cutlery, manufactured of the best quality of steel." They do not state where it is made. Here is another, the Oakland Cutlery Company. These are scissors, warranted; no place given. Here is Pribyl Brothers' trade-mark, "unsurpassed quality of cutlery; blades warranted;" no place is given. "J. B. F. Champlin. Finest scissors; made of quality surpassed by none, equaled by few; warranted;" no place given; and here is "J. B. F. Champlin's pocket cutlery." But there is no English trade-mark on them, there is no lion, no unicorn, no Sheffield, no Wostenholm & Sons; they are the trade-marks of the American importers.

Here is the "Brandford Cutlery Company's celebrated pocket cutlery, manufactured of the best quality of steel," and no place at all given. Here is a trade-mark consisting of a B with a serpent around it. "Warranted pocket cutlery manufactured by Alfred Field & Co., Sheffield." That is the English brand, made in England and sold by them as English goods, which they import from Sheffield and sell, as they have a right to do, as imported English cutlery. Here is the "Continental Cutlery Company's superior pocket cutlery, Sheffield," another brand of English goods. Here is the "H. Cromwell Criterion Company, surpassed by none, equaled by none, satisfaction warranted," with no place upon it. That is the brand which is a part of the name of one of the partners of Alfred Field & Co., and is taken and used as a trade-mark. But that is not put upon English goods; it is put upon goods bought from the American manufacturerers.

Mr. PLATT. I want to know if those are not put on German goods, every one of them.

Mr. VEST. It makes no difference whether they are put on German or American or English goods, if no place is stated. Mr. Saxton testifies that when they receive an order for a large amount of cutlery, he buys from probably fifty or sixty different manufacturers and then puts on all those different purchases this trade-mark of the firm of Alfred Field & Co. But there is no fraud in that, because he does not put England there, or Germany, or the United States. He may buy a part of the goods from an Englishman, part from a German, part from an American, but unless he makes the false impression that he gets his goods from Wostenholm or Rodgers or some celebrated manufacturer, there is no fraud in it.

Mr. HAWLEY. To assist in understanding this, let me say that when that manufacturer exhibited a handful of knives before the subcommittee of the Finance Committee, I happened to be there. I was looking over, expecting just this, knowing that if he exhibited knives at all, he would show the character of that trade. I picked up a Brandford knife, for having a town Brandford in our State, I thought possibly they might have had a little cutlery company there without my knowledge, and I asked him if that was one of these German knives. "Certainly." He did not put "England," or "Germany," or anything else upon that knife, but when "Pennsylvania," "U. S.," and "Columbia" are put on a cheap German knife it does not deceive the person who does it, because he orders it done; it does not deceive the dealers next to him in different cities to whom he sells them by the hundred dozen, but he deceives the average purchaser, and he does this thing with that intent. Now, whoever does that is a liar and a thief.

Mr. VEST. I admire the Senator's vocabulary, especially in the United States Senate.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is very likely that has been done in Connecticut at some time, but it is a dishonest business, the Senator has said that himself, to put upon a foreign knife a name that will lead everybody to think it is an American knife, or to put on an American knife the words "Sheffield, England," when it was not made there at all, or to put "Wostenholm" upon a blade, taking the name of one of the best makers in the world, when it was made here or in Germany. Those things are dishonest in trade, but the importers are full of it, and sometimes Americans do it, though I do say that most of the American cutlers are anxious to establish each for himself the value of his trademark, like the great Collins Company and others of that sort, who fight for their trade-mark in English courts and American.

Mr. VEST. I will let the Senator from Connecticut choose his own epithets. In language of my own I will say that I denounce fraud wherever it exists, whether in this country or abroad. But the question in this case is whether the ex parte testimony of these persons who went before the Finance Committee and denounced all these importers as having perpetrated fraud shall go without answer or attack. I believe the testimony of the gentlemen who appeared before the Senator from North Carolina and myself. I did not hear them before the Finance Committee, for I have not the honor of being a member of that committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator will pardon me. Both sides were before the committee.

Mr. VEST. The Senator alluded to the Brandford Company. The rule, as I understand it, which he himself adopts and to which I assent and have stated over and over again, is this: That any importer or manufacturer has a right to make his trade-mark and use it as to any article of cutlery, provided there is nothing in it which misleads. Here is the trade-mark of the Brandford Cutlery Company: "Brandford Cutlery Co. celebrated pocket cutlery, manufactured of the best quality of steel." That is a registered trade-mark.

Mr. HAWLEY. Oh, no.

Mr. VEST. Then I do not understand the testimony if it is not.

Mr. PLATT. It could not be registered as a trade-mark. The name of the place could not be registered as a trade-mark.

Mr. VEST. It is not the name of the place. It is the name of the company.

Mr. PLATT. There is no such company near there and never will be

Mr. VEST. There it is. There is the brand, and these men swear that it is a trade-mark. Here are the cabalistic letters upon it, the B with the serpent around it, and upon that branded "The Brandford Cutlery Co." No place, no country, no England, no United States, no Germany upon it; and Mr. Saxton testifies he uses that mark upon cutlery that he buys and he has a right to do it. That is a very different proposition from putting "Sheffield" on the box and Sheffield on the knives. Some of these knives are made here in the United States, and they have upon them "Wostenholm, Sheffield," and "England," and these same men go before the Finance Committee and demand an increase of duty on cutlery already bearing 50 per cent., an increase on the cheapest grades, in some instances amounting to 95 and 100 per cent., and they still say that their testimony must be taken as absolutely true, without contradiction or suspicion.

I submit for insertion in the RECORD the table of which I spoke in the earlier part of my remarks.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, before speaking of this duty I want to say once more that I think the statement which the Senator from Missouri made, that the same men, the manufacturers who come here asking for such protection of their industry as will enable them to live and carry on their business in the United States, are engaged in the fraud of putting English names upon American-made knives, is not true. The Senator has been misinformed, and that is enough for me to say. I do not desire to go into that further.

Now, upon the question of duty I wish to say that in the year 1882, prior to the enactment of the present tariff law, there were twenty-five manufacturers of pocket cutlery in the United States. To-day there are seventeen, and eight of them have been either driven out of business or have failed or left the business; they have failed. Three more have failed and reorganized. So under the present rate of duty one-half the number of pocket-cutlery establishments in the United States have been driven out of business. The capital engaged in the production has been reduced $450,000 in that time. The number of dozens manufactured per annum has been reduced 146,500 and the value $505,000. Most of these are small establishments; but one or two of them have a business of over $100,000 a year.

The capital engaged is small capital. The salaries paid are extremely meager. The concern which make the most pocket cutlery and sells it in the United States pays its president and manager $1,500 a year. Not a single company or firm manufacturing pocket cutlery has made expenses, or at least anything more than expenses, during the past year; no dividends have been declared in the cutlery business. The pocket-cutlery business in the United States has about two-fifths of the value of the trade. It has a little more than one-sixth of the amount of trade in dozens.

Now, from what I have said it is perfectly plain we do not seek to conceal the situation that either there must be an increase of this duty or the pocket-cutlery business must stop in the United States. Half of the concerns have failed since 1883; none of them are making any money; and the importation of foreign goods is increasing rapidly, while the American production is rapidly decreasing. Those producers have asked for an increase of duty. There was great objection made to the duty as proposed originally in the Senate bill. It was made by jobbers; it was made by merchants as well as importers; but I understand that except at the hands of the importers there is no serious objection on the part of American merchants and jobbers to the present proposed amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. President, this is an increase which both the Republican and Democratic parties have bound themselves to; yet it is not an increase which compensates for the difference between the labor engaged in the production in the United States and the labor engaged in foreign countries. What did the Democratic party say on that subject in its national convention at St. Louis?

Our established domestic industries and enterprises should not, and need not, be endangered by the reduction and correction of the burdens of taxation. On the contrary, a fair and careful revision of our tax laws, with due allowance for the difference between the wages of American and foreign labor, must promote and encourage every branch of such industries and enterprises, by giving them assurance of extended market and steady and continuous operations.

The Democratic party at St. Louis recognized this principle, that in revising and adjusting the tariff there must be a "due allowance"—I quote from the platform—"for the difference between the wages of American and foreign labor." Just look at this business in view of the difference in labor in the United States and in foreign countries. In the testimony before the Committee on Finance the labor cost was very carefully shown. It has not been questioned. It is accurate. It is made up from American statistics and from foreign statistics, and they have been verified until it can not be questioned, or, if it can be, it has not been.

Now, I will put in my remarks all this table. It is printed in the testimony before the committee, but I read from a paper for convenience. The table is as follows:

I wish to take one or two instances. The same disproportion of cost runs through them all. Take for instance a knife which costs 56 cents a dozen in Germany—a 4-inch jack-knife, one blade, wood covering, iron-lined. It costs 91 cents in England, and it costs $1.90 in America, and 56 cents in Germany. Why? Because the cost of the labor on that knife is 35 cents in Germany, 70 cents in England, and $1.42 in America per dozen. The duty which is proposed by the Senate amendment does not compensate for the difference in labor.

Now I take another class of knives. A brass-lined, two-and-a-half-inch pen-knife, two blades, with ivory or stag covering, costs 81 cents in Germany to produce, in England $1.39, in America $2.92. Why? Because the labor in Germany is 57 cents, in England $1.15, in America $2.30. The duty which is proposed here does not equalize that difference in the cost of labor.

Take another of a higher price. Take a three-and-a-half-inch pen-knife, three blades, pearl or shell covering, which costs in Germany $4.42 a dozen, in England $6.25 a dozen, in America $12 a dozen. Why? Because the labor in Germany costs $1.82, in England $3.65, in America $7.30 per dozen. There is no such protection here as there is difference in the cost of labor. The Democratic party, as well as the Republican party, is committed to that doctrine; and the only hope that the producers of American pocket cutlery have is that by this increase of duty the importation and sale of these goods may become somewhat less profitable to the importer and the jobber, so that there may be some chance of getting them to handle and to deal in American knives of better quality, which can be sold at the same price.

Just take the knives which the Senator from Missouri has shown us. Here is a one-bladed knife which he says cost abroad 17 cents a dozen. I never heard it put at less than 18 cents a dozen before. That knife is sold to the boy or the girl that the Senator desires to protect for 5 cents. See what an immense profit there is between the manufacturer in Germany and the consumer here. Now, you may put on the duty which is proposed by the amendment and that knife will still be sold at 5 cents to the consumer. So with the knife that is sold to him at 10 or 15 or 20 cents. Those knives will not cost any more to the consumer. There will still be a margin of profit for the importer and the jobber and the retailer, but it will more nearly approach the margin of profit which there is for the importer and the jobber and the retailer and the consumer when an American makes the knife. That is all. It will not shut out this manufacture. It is not a prohibitory duty. It is a duty such as the St. Louis convention said they were willing to put upon articles of American manufacture.

That is all there is in this matter, and it seems to me that the principles which have been adopted on both sides of this Chamber and everywhere, that we should put a duty upon the goods manufactured by this established industry now waning and likely to be destroyed, which will enable them in some degree to compete with foreign manufacture and which will to some extent equalize the difference between the cost of labor in this country and in foreign countries.

The Senator from Missouri said a good deal about the higher duty being imposed upon the cheaper knife. It is true that the American producer is better able to compete with the manufacturers of high-priced knives, with Rodgers and Wostenholm and that class of manufacturers, than with the cheap knives such as the Senator showed us, which are made for 18 cents a dozen and sold for 5 cents apiece, or those made for 56 cents a dozen and sold for 10 cents apiece, or those made for 83 cents a dozen and sold for a quarter of a dollar apiece. It is true they can compete better in the high-priced knives than in the low-priced knives, and if it were so that these same knives were to be made higher to the consumers, then there would be something in the Senator's argument; but I venture to say that with this duty the same knives which he wants the poor man of this country to get, and nine-tenths of which are a fraud upon the poor man anyway, will be sold to him without any increase in price. Simply this will happen: The New York jobber will not get 100 per cent. profit on his importation; there will not be 200 per cent. profit to be divided between the importer and the dealers; and therefore the great inducement which importers and jobbers have had to deal in German knives, which I think on every principle of fairness and honesty ought largely to be prohibited from coming into this country, will cease to exist.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, one of the witnesses who appeared before the Senator from Missouri and myself gave testimony concerning the impossibility of making a fair rate on cutlery by specific duties or by compound duties, and at our request he prepared a statement showing the impossibility of putting any fair rate of taxation upon cutlery in any other way than by ad valorem rates. I ask that this table, which is short, may be incorporated in the RECORD. I do not care to have it read unless Senators desire to hear it read.

Mr. PLATT. May I inquire whether that is a table which relates to the bill as it was originally drawn or to the proposed amendment of the committee?

Mr. VANCE. It is a table showing generally the impossibility of securing a fair rate of taxation by specific and compound duties, and it illustrates by taking the rates proposed by the substitute first, but for the general purpose any other rates might as well be taken. The table works out any given specific rate upon the cheaper article and upon the higher-priced article.

Mr. PLATT. It is not constructed, then, upon the plan of the amendment proposed by the Finance Committee?

Mr. VANCE. No, sir; but, as I have endeavored to explain, it will illustrate the general impossibility of a fair rate of taxation by specific and compound duties.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be printed as part of the Senator's remarks, if there be no objection.

The paper is as follows:

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] has told us what a difficult time the manufacturers of cutlery were having in this country, and that, out of some twenty-odd manufacturers, nine, I believe, had failed and gone out of business because they were undersold by the foreign cutlery, and so on.

Now, Mr. President, I have great respect for the Senator from Connecticut; I have great regard for his integrity of character, for his patriotism and honesty of purpose, as well as for his intelligence on matters pertaining to the science of political economy; and I want to ask him upon his conscience this question: If it is shown that a manufacturer, protected by a duty of more than 100 per cent. upon the cheaper articles used by the great mass of the people, can not make money and sustain himself and do business with that great protection, I ask the Senator if that manufacturer ought not to go out of business?

Mr. PLATT. Does the Senator want a reply now?

Mr. VANCE. In one moment. I also want to ask the Senator if he thinks it conduces to the accumulation of public wealth to tax the public at large at the rate of more than two for one in order to enable that man to continne in business?

Mr. PLATT. I will endeavor to answer the question, and to answer it fairly and squarely.

In the first place there is no 100 per cent. ad valorem duty to be placed on these articles except in a very rare instance. The duty of 12 cents a dozen or 36 cents a dozen being extended over goods of different prices, it is possible that one particular knife might run up to 100 or more per cent., but the average duty will be about 65 per cent., not higher than on woolen goods, not higher than on structural iron, not higher than on a very great variety of articles. So that premise can scarcely be one upon which the question ought to be answered. We should take perhaps the average ad valorem duty that will be imposed under this, and that is about 65 per cent. as shown by expert calculation.

Now, putting the question in that form, ought the American manufacturer to go out of business if he requires a duty of 65 per cent. to compete with foreigners, I say no, and I say that in my judgment and on my conscience—because the Senator asks me to answer on my conscience—it is better for the United States, it is better for the people of the United States, it is better for the people of North Carolina, that that business should be done in the United States than to have it done abroad, even though an average duty of 65 per cent. is required in order to enable the American manufacturer to maintain his business and to compete with the foreign manufacturers. That is my belief about it.

Secondly, I think that in this particular instance I have shown, and I believe it is capable of demonstration, that these goods will not be one penny higher to the consumer by reason of the increase of this duty, that no boy who buys a jack-knife and no lady who buys a penknife in North Carolina will pay one cent more for it. The result will be simply this: whereas the importer now has all the profit and all the opportunity to make money, and the people are taxed, if at all, to support the importer, there will be an opportunity for the manufacturer to make a little something and for the laborers employed to continue their employment; and upon the theory of the Senator from North Carolina (the correctness of which I utterly and absolutely deny), the tax instead of being paid to the importer of foreign goods will be paid to the American who makes them. I deny that there is any tax; but even upon the Senator's own theory that is all there is to it. No consumer is going to be asked to pay anything more for his knife.

Mr. VANCE. Well, Mr. President, the Senator has answered my question with the candor which I expected.

Many things in this schedule will be raised by the amendment of the committee largely in excess of 100 per cent., and if the Senator holds that it is good political economy to have those things manufactured here at a cost of 100 per cent. upon their value, I should like to know where there is to be any limit to that principle. If 100 per cent. can be justified, 200 can, 500 can, and a thousand can; and if in all that increase of taxes upon the article the price is still to remain the same to the consumer, I should be mightily pleased indeed to be let into the secret of how the manufacturer is to be benefited.

The Senator seems to think that the importer is getting all the profit, and if there is such a large margin of profit for the importer, it seems to me that there is the place where the manufacturer should come in and divide this profit with him.

But I will not undertake to enter into the mysteries of that great principle, that the more tax you put upon an article the cheaper it is to the consumer, and at the same time that the tax leads to the manufacturers' benefit. That is one of the mysteries of protection that I expect to die in utter ignorance of.

The great fact remains that this schedule upon cutlery, pocket-knives, table-knives, carving-knives, razors, and scissors is so arranged by this committee by the application of specific duties as to make the cheaper articles used by the great mass of the people bear one, two, and three hundred per cent. more than the highest-priced articles, as will be shown by the table which I have asked to be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VANCE. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. Suppose the duty were entirely taken off from that knife that costs 18 cents a dozen and that knife were let in free to this country, its value would be a cent and a half when it comes to our shores. Does the Senator suppose that that knife would be sold to a boy or girl in North Carolina at less than 5 cents?

Mr. VANCE. I suppose it would. The same argument, I remember, was made upon the reduction of the duty on matches, and it was stated that matches would remain at 5 cents a box no matter whether the duties were on or off.

Mr. DAWES. There was a tax on matches, not a duty. The tax was an internal-revenue tax. That is a burden put right on here.

Mr. VANCE. Yes, I see the distinction the Senator makes. The duty on matches—I am obliged to him for the correction—the tax on matches, the internal-revenue tax on matches, was what I was referring to. Now, I have got it correctly. We were told that a box of matches would be sold for 5 cents whether the tax was on or off; and yet we found in a very short time that we got two boxes of matches for 5 cents. Why should it not be the same under the influence of competition? Why should not the retail dealers in all the little establishments at every cross-roads in the United States soon learn to give a boy two knives for 5 cents instead of one knife? To say that the price will always be the same is to assume that the force of competition in trade amounts to nothing, which it seems to me will not do.

Therefore, without consuming further time on this subject of cutlery, it is sufficient for me to know and it is sufficient for the people of this country to know that whatever rate of duty is necessary even for the maintaining of the manufacturers of this country, the principle is violated at the expense of those who are least able to bear it, that instead of imposing the least burdens and the lightest burdens upon the weak, this bill and this amendment impose the heaviest burdens upon the weak and the lightest burdens upon the strong, who are able to bear them better.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I think the character of the criticisms of this bill which are made by the Senators on the other side of the Chamber is very well exemplified by the arguments which have been made upon the pending amendment.

I do not care to allude to what I understand to be the argument of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], that the American manufacturers of cutlery are not entitled to fair treatment on account of the imputation which the importers make that they are engaged in reprehensible practices, but will take a few minutes to examine another phase of the argument of the Senator from Missouri. He attempts to prove by the high ad valorem rates which he insists we have imposed on knives and razors the enormities of the bill in placing exorbitant duties upon articles in common use as distinguished from the duties placed upon luxuries.

In the testimony, or so-called testimony, of the New York Importers' Association, taken before the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Missouri, the importers stated that we imposed a specific duty of $1 a dozen on razors, and that one class of imported razors cost abroad 72 cents a dozen or 6 cents each. Of course a duty of $1 a dozen or 8⅓ cents on a razor worth 6 cents abroad would be equivalent to more than 100 per cent., to which an addition of 35 per cent. ad valorem is made. This statement is used by Senators on the other side to show that we have imposed enormous duties upon articles in common use.

Now, let us examine this particular statement from a practical standpoint. I recently visited a number of the principal hardware and cutlery stores of this city for the purpose of ascertaining the price at which this class of razors was sold. The lowest price at which I could purchase a razor in any one of these establishments was 40 cents, and I was told frankly by the proprietor of the store that this razor would not shave a man and he would advise me not to buy it; and that he would advise me not to buy one costing less than 75 cents. Aside from this one establishment the lowest-priced razor I could find was 50 cents.

We find, then, a razor imported, if we can believe the importers, at 72 cents a dozen, while the lowest price of any razor at retail in this country is 40 cents.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator permit me to ask a question?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. Did he find that any of those 40-cent razors were made in the United States?

Mr. ALDRICH. No, sir.

Mr. VEST. They were all imported?

Mr. ALDRICH. All imported.

Mr. VEST. Did the Senator examine into that point?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes, sir; I did.

Mr. VEST. Then, if they are not made in this country at all, why does the Senator want to put on them this duty in order to protect the American manufacturer?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not think myself that the question of the amount of duty we put on a 6-cent razor is at all material to the question at issue. That is the very point I desire to make, not only in regard to cheap razors, but in regard to cheap knives, that the Senators on the other side are making an argument which has no pertinency or practical application to the question at issue. For instance, the Senator from Missouri says that upon a certain grade of pocket-knives, which are valued at 17 cents a dozen abroad, we propose to put a specific duty of 12 cents a dozen and an additional ad valorem rate of 50 per cent., amounting to a very high ad valorem rate in the aggregate.

Mr. PLATT. One hundred and twenty per cent.

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; 120 per cent. ad valorem. The knives which are imported at that price, if any are so imported, are largely sold to consumers at 10 cents each, and the Senator from New Jersey and other Senators upon that side of the Chamber have expended much eloquence in demonstrating that we have imposed an enormous duty upon the 10-cent knife which the school-boy purchases.

Now, let us see whether the duty we have placed upon these grades of either knives or razors will impose any additional burden upon the masses of people of this country who purchase these articles.

Take a 6-cent razor, for instance, with a specific duty of 8⅓ cents, making a cost of 14⅓ cents, and then add the ad valorem rate, which would amount to 2 cents more, making under the provisions of the amendment the total cost of that razor 16⅓ cents. If razors of that kind should continue to be sold for 40 cents each to the American people, then you have a profit to the importer or the dealer of 150 per cent., or they could be sold with a reasonable profit at 25 cents each.

Take the 10-cent knife. Suppose that in addition to the foreign cost, which the Senator from Missouri says is less than a cent and a half, we add another cent for the specific duty and three-fourths of a cent for the ad valorem rate; then we have a total cost of 3¼ cents for a knife which sells to our boys at retail for 10 cents, or 200 per cent. profit to the importer or to the dealer or to both.

The importers of this class of goods are taking advantage of the present situation to impose worthless goods (which in many cases are branded with American names, or simulated American names) upon the American public at an enormous profit to themselves or to the persons through whom they are sold.

If Senators on the other side of the Chamber care to pose before the country as advocates of these gentlemen and their methods, I can not object, as it is a matter in which they must consult their own tastes and judgment; but do not try to deceive the American people into the belief that the rates of duties we impose, which are, we admit, equivalent to a large ad valorem rate upon these worthless goods, would increase their cost to consumers.

The duty could be doubled above the rates proposed by the amendment now under consideration and the cost of these goods would not be increased to the American consumer; that is, supposing that a reasonable profit was to be allowed to the importer and to the dealer.

The fact is, in regard to this paragraph and many other paragraphs in this bill, that the importers, who of course are desirous of breaking down every duty which results in the protection or encouragement of American industry, seek to mislead the public as to the character of the duties imposed. They can readily show, it is true, an enormous ad valorem rate upon inferior goods, which are imported greatly below their real value and sold to the American people greatly above their real value.

If razors are made anywhere in the world at 6 cents each, 8 cents specific duty is a large rate upon them, and it would be a still larger rate if 3 cents apiece, or 2 cents each, or 1 cent were taken as the price.

It is very easy for Senators on the other side of the Chamber, under the advice and guidance of the importers, to show the enormity of this bill in this peculiar manner. These Senators have repeatedly charged the committee with having prepared this bill under the dictation of the American manufacturers. This is quite as praiseworthy, I assume, as to attempt to amend it at the dictation of the importers of New York.

Senators say that these importers are American citizens. I venture to say that not one-tenth of them are American citizens.

The Senator from Missouri brings here the samples and the statements of these men to break down an American industry which now commands but one-third of the American market in value and one-sixth in number of pieces produced, and taking isolated cases of worthless goods, greatly undervalued, seeks to mislead the American people as to the true character of the rates imposed by the terms of this bill.

Mr. VANCE. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. VANCE. What is the possible undervaluation of anything that is worthless? The Senator has repeated time and again that worthless articles were greatly undervalued. I have a curiosity to know if a thing is worth nothing how can it be undervalued.

Mr. ALDRICH. Take the case of the razors to which I have alluded. These razors have a foreign market value; they certainly have a cost of production; still they are worthless to the purchaser for use. I did not use the word "worthless," which the Senator understands as well as I do, in connection with the value for the assessment of duties, but the value for actual use.

Mr. VANCE. How do they run out the American article? I can not understand why people would continue to buy them if they are worthless for actual use. They must shave somebody.

Mr. ALDRICH. Because of the ability of the people he represents here—the importers—to deceive the American people.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, as to the question of undervaluation, about which we have heard so much, in reference to these importers, particularly Alfred Field & Co.—and I never saw any of them, I never knew there was any such firm in existence until they came before the Senator from North Carolina and myself—I have simply to say that I have here their proposition in writing to the Secretary of the Treasury that he might send an agent to examine their books from the time they commenced business, and if any evidence of undervaluation was found in their importations they were willing to submit to any penalty, any increase of duties, or otherwise, that the Department might assess upon them.

Mr. PLATT. I want to say that I have seen—I had it in my possession until a day or two ago, but can not lay my hands upon it at this time—an affidavit made by one of these same people who testified before the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Missouri that Mr. Field's house undervalued cutlery 46 per cent. There is one of them testifying against the other, and that affidavit was filed in the Treasury Department and I have seen it and had a copy of it in my possession.

Mr. VEST. In this testimony is the statement of Mr. Saxton, whom I never saw before and whose manner and testimony impressed me that he was an honest man, that a worthless character whose name he gives—a vagabond—was employed by the Treasury Department, whose business it was to assail the importers, and who was dismissed afterward for drunkenness and misconduct by the Treasury Department. That is the man, I suppose, who made this charge.

Mr. PLATT. No, no; it was Mr. Taussig, one of your witnesses, and as regards this other man, I wish to say that I know him——

Mr. VANCE. Osborn?

Mr. PLATT. I know him, and have known him for years, and since he has been thus attacked by Mr. Saxton I desire to say that I believe he is as honorable a gentleman as Mr. Saxton is.

Mr. VEST. I have practiced law so long that I am not astonished at any statement of this sort. Every man stands by his own witness.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand he says that he is no worse than Mr. Field is.

Mr. VEST. My friend from New Hampshire is the contingent that always comes in on the homestretch; but I am quite through with it. Here is a letter about Mr. Taussig. I will read it:

DECEMBER 26, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Our Mr. Taussig was a member of the committee from the Wholesale Hardware Association who had a hearing before your committee on December 12, and stated to your committee that, as manufacturers of razors in this country, we were fully satisfied with the 50 per cent. protection afforded us by the present tariff. The main complaint made by manufacturers, as our Mr. Taussig understood, was that, owing to general undervaluation, the American manufacturers could not compete. The only other manufacturer of razors of any consequence in this country besides ourselves is Mr. J. R. Torrey, and we have learned that this manufacturer, who has been importing pocket-knives to sell in connection with his razors, has in several instances had his invoices advanced on account of being undervalued.

We simply desire to state to your honorable committee, in comment of above, that we cheerfully unite in the offer made by the president of the Wholesale Hardware Association as to the examination of our books, etc.,

And remain, very respectfully, yours,

WIEBUSCH & HILGER (Limited).

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
Chairman Finance Committee, Washington, D. C.

Mr. ALDRICH. I want to find out whether this is the same Mr. Taussig that the Senator from Connecticut has said had made an affidavit that the firm of Field & Co. undervalued their cutlery 46 per cent.?

Mr. VEST. I do not know, and I know nothing about that affidavit. This is addressed to Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON, chairman of the Finance Committee, and is the same proposition made by Alfred Field & Co., that the Secretary of the Treasury should have their books examined and if any undervaluations were found that such penalties should be imposed as he thought proper.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator from Missouri think that if these people were engaged in undervaluing their goods their books would show it?

Mr. VEST. I do not know what sort of testimony would be available in this matter, but they proposed to submit themselves to any test that might be suggested. I want to say to the Senator from Rhode Island that I am as impersonal in this debate as any one. I do not know the manufacturers; I do not know the importers; I do not know anybody in the matter except my constitutents and the other consumers of this country. I have no sort of personal interests or feelings and could not possibly have any.

Mr. ALDRICH. The thing which struck me as a little singular was that the importers should have appeared before two Senators in an informal way and given testimony, which was published by order of the Senate at their request, and that the other people, the manufacturers and the consumers, were not represented before that committee, and they have not cited and introduced any testimony here from them.

Mr. VEST. I think I can allay the virtuous fears of my friend from Rhode Island. I am not a member of the Finance Committee, but nothing is more natural than that I should hear from importers or the people whose interests are against these high protective duties. Is it very singular that the manufacturers should appear before the committee? It is an open secret that they could not be satisfied. They claim now that they elected Harrison and that they are entitled to any protection they ask.

There is no limit to their demand. Here are the manufacturers' organs, the Iron and Steel Bulletin, and the Philadelphia North American, and the Manufacturer, which I have here before me, all of them demanding in so many words that the manufacturers are to be protected to the full extent of their demands and not their necessities.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to state, if the Senator from Missouri will allow me, that we heard very fully Mr. Field and Mr. Saxton and all these gentlemen in the committee-room. Mr. Saxton had full opportunity to be heard. I think he was there on two different occasions.

Mr. VEST. I have not any doubt about it. My only connection with this matter is that after I took my public stand in the Senate Chamber against this increase of duty upon everything, I received communications from men whose interests—and I use the word advisedly—were not for high duties, giving me information so that I could fight this bill. I do not pretend to say that their motives were disinterested, and I do not care. I want the truth, let it come from one side or the other or from any source whatever. What do I know about these manufacturers? None of them would ever come to me. They would as soon go to the shade of a upas tree as to me to increase the duty.

Mr. PLATT. I think that is so.

Mr. VEST. The Senator says that is so. Yes, it is, because we have an enormous surplus in the Treasury, and I want to reduce it, and I want our Republican friends to make good their platform of 1884, that they intended to reduce the surplus and reform the inequalities of the tariff, instead of coming in with increases of duty upon everything. The Senator talks as if I wanted to strike down the industries of the country.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does not the Senator agree with the Finance Committee that the effect of our bill will be to reduce the revenue?

Mr. VEST. I do not know whether it would reduce it or not. I know it puts up duties. I know that it puts up the duty upon one grade of knives 100 per cent. (I am taking the average); upon two-blade knives, 70 per cent.—I am taking the amount of the amendment, not the substitute, for that is a great deal more; upon the three-bladed knives the increase is 60 per cent.; on the four-bladed knives 40 per cent., and upon razors 100 per cent.

If that reduces the revenue it is not my idea of the way to reduce it. I think when you put up the duties, and the goods come into this country, that increases the revenue. I have heard it intimated on this floor before that the Democratic party, myself particularly, wanted to strike down the manufacturing interests of the United States. Well, I think I can treat that with contempt as an American Senator and an American citizen. The men who make that sort of charge make it for political purposes. My State has more manufacturing interests than a majority of the New England States.

Mr. PLATT. More than Connecticut?

Mr. VEST. Not as much Connecticut, but more than New Hampshire, more than Maine, more than Vermont, and within three millions as much in value as Rhode Island, more than Indiana, and more than Maryland or Iowa. Missouri has $73,000,000 in manufactures, and I am advised that my course here will send a Republican Senator to this body in my place. If so, nobody will accept that result more cheerfully than myself, provided it is the august verdict of the people, but I will take their verdict and not that of my political opponents. I will wait to hear from them and from nobody else.

The Senator from Connecticut says that our platform in 1884 pledged the Democratic party to not reduce duties below that standard which would furnish protection sufficient to equalize the difference between the cost of labor in this country and abroad. I never wanted anything else. If our friends on the other side would content themselves with that platform, I would go with them.

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. VEST. Very good. I will put the Senator to the test. Here is cutlery. I read from the official report of the Treasury Department on the census of 1880:

Cutlery and edged tools, product of the United States	$11,661,370
Amount paid for hired labor	$4,447,349
Percentage of labor	38.1

And the Senator says himself the average duty in this cutlery schedule is 65 per cent. I say it is 75.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator of course desires to be entirely fair.

Mr. VEST. I do.

Mr. PLATT. And he must know that the cost of labor on pocket knives and the cost of labor on edged tools are not alike. They are all embraced in one column there. If he will think a moment about a pocket-knife and the extreme minimum of cost of the material, he will see that almost all of it must be labor. As a matter of fact, it is 85 per cent. labor, on an average.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I have again and again gone to the Treasury Department and attempted to get the difference in labor on specific articles in this country and abroad without success, and it is not accessible, and all that I can take are the official reports of the Treasury Department of the averages. I have this table here, and any Senator can obtain it; it is an official document furnished by the Treasury Department and shows the cost of labor in this country as to specific products. Of course that is the average, and here is cutlery, 38.1 per cent. as the cost of labor.

Mr. PLATT. Including edged tools of all sorts.

Mr. VEST. I can not help that. Here are razors with 100 per cent. advance in duty, and all these different grades of cutlery averaging from 40 up to 100 per cent. The Senator himself admits that the increase on an average is 65 per cent. Is it necessary to put 65 per cent. on razors and pocket-knives, and all edged tools, if you include them, in order to make up the difference between the cost of labor in this country and abroad?

Mr. PLATT. To 65, not of 65 per cent.

Mr. VEST. I say it is more than 65 per cent., and I have had the increases mathematically made out. They range from 40 to 100 per cent. in the amendment brought forward by the Finance Committee; and yet we are told that this enormous increase is necessary in order to make up the difference between 38 per cent., the cost of labor on this branch of industry in the United States, and the cost of labor abroad.

Now, Mr. President, let us look at the practical operation of this matter. Here is a knife—and I will take the average; if Senators will turn to the amendment they will see what I mean—a knife costing $2.62 per dozen, a four-bladed knife. The present duty is 50 per cent.; the Senate bill makes it 101 per cent.; and the amendment makes it 72.9 per cent. That four-bladed knife (which is the knife that goes into the consumption of the middle classes of the United States, not the extremely rich nor the extremely poor), and the subsequent knife, at $1.33 per dozen, on which the duty in the amendment is 77 per cent., constitute nearly 60 per cent of the importation.

The Senator from Rhode Island has told us they are almost worthless, that they are brought into this country and imposed upon American consumers, and that under the present tariff these foreign importers are robbing the people of the United States, and yet we have twenty-five cutlery establishments in the United States at the lowest calculation. The Senator from Connecticut is my authority.

Mr. PLATT. Seventeen.

Mr. VEST. Seventeen. We have had twenty-five; and yet with that duty of 50 per cent. the American citizen concludes it is to his interest to buy from the foreign importer. Why, to listen to the Senator from Rhode Island you would think that all the cutlery made in the United States was of greatly superior quality to any that is brought in from abroad.

There is a knife made in Connecticut which costs 30 cents a dozen, wholesale. It is not worth two-eighths of 1 cent, intrinsically. It is absolutely worthless. There is not any purpose to which it could be put except as an ornament for some boy to say "Here is my knife," without ever attempting to cut anything with it—the most worthless thing in the shape of a knife that I have ever seen. That is the American article; and yet my friend from Rhode Island is filled with virtuous indignation when he contemplates the foreign imported article which is used to rob the American people!

I do not want to go into a general debate, but my friend has taunted me with the fact of my association with the foreign importers. His association has been with the manufacturers, and the result of the association is shown in the substitute and in the amendment also.

These importers, I have not the slightest doubt about it, are actuated by self-interest. If there was ever a question on this earth that develops selfishness, greed, and rapacity, it is this, the tariff; and if a man undertakes to fight all of this rapacity as he must do on a plane of common justice and equality he is a very fortunate public man if he is not dragged down and befouled in the conflict. I want to show the spirit that animates these manufacturers. Here is the organ of the manufacturers. My attention was called a day or so since to an article in the Manufacturer, headed "Bad faith now means defeat." It is a lecture to our friends in charge of this substitute. It is the "handwriting on the wall" unless they give, give, give.

BAD FAITH NOW MEANS FUTURE DEFEAT.

It goes on to say that the Republican party was restored to power upon the distinct pledge of protecting all the industries of the United States.

Is there any reason for apprehending that the party will not keep faith with the people? We assert that there is and we base the assertion upon the conduct of the Republicans in the Senate with respect to the tariff bill now under discussion. These persons deliberately propose of their own motion—

There ought to be an amendment there, "These Senators;" it says "These persons"— deliberately propose of their own motion to reduce protective duties upon the products of certain industries, and they indicate a purpose to reduce others by means of a dicker for votes. The scheme for knocking off $27,000,000 from the sugar duties aims a blow at the sugar industries of Louisiana and Kansas, and at the beet-sugar business, which is just beginning to assume importance. It is true that compensation is to be offered in the shape of bounties to sugar-growers; but this is not in fact a compensation. In the first place it sacrifices the principle of tariff protection, and in the second place it compels the American people to pay the bounty instead of forcing foreigners to pay it. The bounty system is proposed because the Senators desire to retain the internal taxes upon spirits, which we alone pay; and the operation of the system is that we shall continue to collect from the people an exorbitant tax on alcohol, with the proceeds of which we shall pay the bounty to the sugar-grower.

On the other hand, a customs duty on sugar may be paid and probably is largely paid by the foreign producer as the price of admission to this market. And, if this is not in fact the case now, it certainly will be the case as soon as our domestic sugar industry begins to have large proportions. Meanwhile, the duties upon certain kinds of iron are to be cut down, although Republican orators won many votes in the iron districts with declarations that the duties would be more likely to go up than down. The rates on lumber are to be cut, the wool-growers are gravely dissatisfied with the wool schedules, and in some other cases there is to be either reduction or a failure to make such increase as is fairly required by the needs of the affected industries.

We are fully aware of the difficulties that beset the protectionists in the Senate. They work amid a clashing of interests, and it seems necessary to make some compromises if they are to accomplish anything. This want of harmony of opinion within the protectionist ranks is the greatest of all the obstacles to the success of the cause. The free-traders are united.

I never knew that before.

They all want the same thing and they stand resolutely together to fight for it. The protectionists are harassed by the cowardly selfishness of some of their own people. A Senator from Kansas is eager to strike down the iron-workers of Pennsylvania, but he waxes indignant when a proposition is made to touch the sugar duties. Michigan is resolute for maintenance of the lumber duties, but her representatives would rejoice to have a chance to expose the woolen and cotton manufacturers of the East to unequal rivalry from Europe. The antagonisms and jealousies within the Republican ranks were hushed during the campaign, but victory has quickened them into normal vigor, and they are now expressing themselves with as much vehemence as if the Republican party had gained, somehow or other, a lease of power which can never again be questioned.

But it will be questioned. It is questioned now by the iron-workers in the Schuylkill Valley, who perceive with amazement that Republican Senators appear to have forgotten all the glorious rhetoric of the campaign which exalted the value of the home market, the uses of the tariff as a producer of high wages, and the vital importance of sheltering American industry. It is questioned by the wool-growers, to whose resolute support of the Republican candidate his election was largely due; and all over the country other workmen who voted the whole ticket in their own interests and what they were taught to regard as the interests of the country are observing the dickering and the paltering in the Senate Chamber with indignation and disgust. If that body sacrifices the protective principle in any form it will hear from the people two years hence.

The mass of the voters, at least, were in earnest in November, and they will not bear to be trifled with now. What they want is a thoroughly protective tariff, and if the Republican party shall not keep its promise to give it to them, it will be held responsible for the neglect. If the present Senate can not frame a just bill it had far better drop the matter and permit the next House of Representatives to deal with it.

Mr. PLUMB. I wanted to know the mental disturbance which the Senator must have undergone when he found he was on the platform of that paper on the sugar duty and on the question of a bounty. He and the writer of that article seem to have been in exact accord upon that very important question, while he finds on the perusal of the article further that the manufacturers are utterly opposed to this tariff bill. I find myself some consolation in that, because I have been a little bit distrustful of any bill that absolutely met their requirements. I have a good many feelings in common with the Senator about some of these things, but I am a little distressed about the manner in which he appears to wobble just now.

Mr. VEST. No, Mr. President, there is no wobbling in me——

Mr. PLUMB. He is with these manufacturers against the sugar bounty; he is on all fours with them, though he is opposing this bill with about as much virulence as they do. If I can not carom on the Senator occasionally when I get to be a little less practical than some of my associates here, I do not know whom I can carom on.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am very glad the Senator from Missouri has placed upon the public record this statement of a paper which I understand to be the official organ of the manufacturers. It is the very best answer which could be made to the charge which is constantly repeated upon the other side that in the preparation of this bill we have acceded to the demand of every manufacturer who appeared before the committee.

Mr. VEST. As to what the Senator from Kansas has suggested, that the editor of this paper and myself agree about the bounty, I will confess that; but for some other considerations, it would give me a little trouble, that is, I should go into a strict self-examination if I believed this paper indorsed me on the tariff question, and I might find a Turkish bath and a little calomel necessary to reform my system politically. But to be against bounties is a very different proposition from being in favor of the illimitable increase of duty which that paper advocates consistently and persistently in all its editorials. Its cause for opposing the bounty is a very different one from mine. It opposes a bounty because it comes in the way of unlimited protection. I oppose the bounty because I am opposed to the principle of bounties, as I am opposed also to the principle of unlimited protection. It comes to its conclusion from very different motives to those which actuate me.

Mr. President, I may as well say just now, without going into a general debate, that I was very much astonished at a statement—not astonished, but I heard with some doubt the other day a statement by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]—that the first effect of increasing the duty as is proposed to do now in this cutlery schedule—and we have heard the same thing substantially in all this debate—was to increase prices, but that the ultimate result was to diminish them. That is a favorite assertion of the Republican party. We heard it everywhere in the last canvass. All their famous orators, from Mr. Blaine down, rehearsed it over the country that the effect of a high protective tariff was to decrease duties to the consumer by reason of the domestic competition. In other words, that the tariff was the prolific and bountiful source of cheap commodities to the American consumer.

If that be so, it would logically follow that in a free-trade country there would be no lessening of prices, because in the absence of a tariff that thing could not be brought about. If the tariff has diminished prices in the United States, then there ought not to have been any lessening of prices upon the same commodities in free-trade England, because the two propositions are utterly inconsistent; they can not stand together. I have here a statement which I intended but for the adjournment of the Senate to have read when the Senator from Ohio made that statement. I have here from Mr. Carroll D. Wright, Commissioner of Labor, a statement of prices in England for seven years, from 1878 to 1885: Value of cotton manufactures, piece goods, in 1873, 7 cents; in 1878, 5.6 cents; in 1880, 5.5, and in 1885, 4.7 cents.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PALMER in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. VEST. I should rather put in the table first, but the Senator can go on.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will wait.

Mr. VEST. The table is as follows:

Exports from Great Britain.

Articles.	Values per yard.
	1873.	1878.	1880.	1885.
Cotton manufactures:
Piece goods, plain	$0.070	$0.056	$0.055	$0.047
Piece goods, printed or colored	.097	.085	.077	.070
Linen:
Piece goods	.161	.146	.149	.129
Woolen manufactures:
Cloths, coatings, stuffs, etc.*	.830	.693	.655	.499
Worsted coatings and stuffs*	.245	.188	.185	.201
Carpets and druggets	.783	.616	.591	.520

*Prior to 1882 woolen "stuffs" were included with worsted stuffs.

The amounts and percentages of increase or decrease from 1878 to 1885 are as follows:

	Per cent.
Cotton manufactures:
Piece goods, plain, decrease per yard, $0.009	16.07
Piece goods, printed or colored, decrease per yard, $0.015	17.65
Linen:
Piece goods, decrease per yard, $0.017	11.64
Woolen manufactures:
Cloths, coatings, stuffs, etc., decrease per yard, $0.194	27.99
Worsted coatings and stuffs, increase per yard, $0.13	6.91
Carpets and druggets, decrease per yard, $0.096	15.58

That table I obtained from Mr. Carroll D. Wright. Now I will hear the Senator from New York.

Mr. HISCOCK. As I understand the Senator from Missouri, he states that if in a protected country the effect of protection is to decrease the price, in a free-trade country the effect of free trade would be to increase the price.

Mr. VEST. No; I did not say that.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understood the Senator to say that.

Mr. VEST. I did not say that. I said that if the tariff was the cause of decrease in the United States, then, there being no tariff in England, how can we explain the fact that there has been a decrease there?

Mr. HISCOCK. The Senator then did not assert what I have stated, but he seemed to indorse what I have stated. I will put it in this way——

Mr. VEST. No, I did not mean that.

Mr. HISCOCK. I can not understand him. The Senator said logically if protection decreased prices here, free trade should increase prices in England.

Mr. VEST. I misstated my proposition if I said that. What I meant to say was that the tariff has not decreased the price of commodities in the United States, because I point to free-trade England, where there is no tariff, and to a decrease there.

Mr. HISCOCK. As was stated in the discussion that we had the other day, the cause of the decrease of prices, as we claim, is that the large increase of the volume of the production on account of the stimulation by protection of the indutries in this country, thrown upon the market of the world, has the effect to decrease the price of commodities relatively everywhere the world over; that, as it was illustrated in the case of sugar, the sugar planting of beets equaling the cane-sugar planting and being added to it, has had the effect to decrease the price of sugar in the markets of the world the world over.

Mr. VEST. I might admit that. I heard the Senator make that statement in the former debate we had.

Mr. HISCOCK. I apprehend the Senator from Missouri must have made the statement a little stronger than he intended when I rose to question him. It seemed to me that that was too fallacious.

I will say further, if he will pardon me, that taking England with a given amount of plant with which perhaps she could supply her colonial market and her home market and supply the United States to a large extent, if you shut her out of the market of the United States her plant is forced to be idle or go down to a lower price of product there with a view of getting into our market or finding new markets.

Mr. VEST. I might admit all that the Senator has said, and still it does not affect the proposition that I am discussing. I have not any doubt but that if there were free trade all over the world the production would affect the price; that an immense production would diminish the price and a scarcity of articles would increase the price, on the familiar doctrine and principle of supply and demand.

But my friend from New York and his colleagues stand before the American people with a specific and isolated system of protection which is fast coming to the point of absolute exclusion. They make to the American people this argument in favor of a high protective tariff. They say "The free-traders," as they call us, "tell you that the duty is put on the cost of the article to the consumer, and therefore the higher the tariff the higher the price. We point you to the fact that under this high protective system, which we have had for twenty-odd years, the price of all these articles of consumption, necessaries of life, has gone down, and therefore"—and there is the fallacy of the whole thing—"the protective tariff has done it." I say the protective tariff has not done it. The prices of the same articles have gone down in spite of the tariff under natural causes.

Mr. HISCOCK. What we say with reference to it is that the price has gone down on account of the increased production and on account of the competition, and in accordance with the very law the Senator has stated, of supply and demand.

Mr. VEST. But the Senator does not allow that law to have free course, because he puts up the artificial barrier of the tariff between us and the rest of the world. He does not permit the entire product of the whole world to operate under natural and what I contend to be legitimate laws.

Mr. ALDRICH. But the effect of our protective legislation is to stimulate competition and stimulate increased production.

Mr. VEST. I understand the Senator claims that. The Senator and his party contend all the time that if you will shut out the whole world, then domestic competition will bring down the price to the consumer, when we know it does not do it, for the simple reason that as soon as you destroy foreign competition then the domestic manufacturers regulate the prices for themselves by means of combinations and trusts, and "sympathetic movements," as the witness on cotton-bagging called it.

Mr. HISCOCK. Do I understand from the Senator from Missouri that there are not many very remarkable or striking instances in which the effect of domestic competition has not forced down the price even lower than the foreign price?

Mr. VEST. I have simply to say that if domestic competition forced it down, then if you let in reasonably foreign competition it will still further put down the price to the consumer. If competition works inside of the tariff and you let in foreign competition and take away at least the exclusive tariff, then you have more of the same sort of result and the prices would still continue to go down.

Mr. PLATT. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. Does the Senator believe that if goods can be made more cheaply abroad than they can be made here we ought to suffer that to be done, or ought we to put on a duty here to equalize the cost of production?

Mr. VEST. I have simply to say in answer that I can not make my opinions any plainer than I have done. I am not discussing the question of absolute free trade, because it is not a question in the United States. It is absolutely impossible to have free trade here.

Mr. HISCOCK. If the Senator will pardon me, then modify the proposition or the question of the Senator from Connecticut. Does he think it would be wise in any case? Let us lay aside for the present all the immense profits that are talked of to manufacturers. Does the Senator believe that it is right and proper in any case to equalize the conditions in this country and in Europe in respect to labor alone and give the protection necessary to protect labor?

Mr. VEST. I would be perfectly willing, without any abstract principle about it, to agree to a compromise of that sort, if the manufacturers and their friends would be satisfied with it; but I know they will not be, and they are not, as to any item or schedule in this bill. The great vice in this protective system is that you can never satisfy the manufacturers.

Mr. HISCOCK. There is just this difference between myself and the Senator from Missouri. I do not believe that there is an item in the bill in which we have gone beyond that line.

Mr. VEST. Oh, well, that is just what we are discussing. That is just what I am here to try and prove to the American people is not true. I am willing to take the official report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and I will agree to put on a duty here that will be ample to equalize the difference between the cost of labor in this country and abroad.

Mr. HISCOCK. I want to make one qualification of my statement. On account of the difficulty in drawing the division lines between different rates for the same goods, there is no sort of doubt but that there may be some provisions in this bill which afford protection beyond that to cheaper grades of the same class of goods; but it does no harm for the reason that as to those goods we can compete with the world to-day. With that exception the bill is framed on that line.

Mr. VEST. Oh, there is article after article here where we have shown by the official export tables that the manufacturers supply the domestic market and then have a surplus to go abroad, and still our friends put up the duty, and they have put it up and kept it up on articles not one pound of which was imported into the United States.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALDRICH. I wish to say that neither the Treasury Department, nor the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department, nor the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the United States, nor any other official source, has ever furnished any statistics or made any statement of the comparative cost of production growing out of the cost of labor between articles produced in this country and in competing countries abroad. When that statement is furnished authoritatively and truthfully I am willing as one protectionist to make the rates of duty in every instance conform to that difference in conditions and make the rate of duty simply large enough to equalize the conditions between the two countries.

Mr. VEST. It may be true that in one document the cost of labor in the United States and the cost of labor abroad as to each specific article are not given, but I have before me an official statement, Washington, D. C., January 5, 1884, taken from the census of 1880, giving specific and enumerated articles and the cost of labor in the United States in their production.

Mr. HISCOCK. If the Senator will pardon me, if he will examine that statement he will find this, all that I have ever seen, that the more finished product is classified with the raw material which makes up the more finished product; and then again, in reference to those products taken as a whole, their raw materials are nowhere taken into account in making that statement. Take it in reference to the manufactures of steel, tracing it back to the coal, to the ore, and all those things, nothing of that kind has ever been done.

Mr. VEST. We will not go back into that. The Senator from New York and myself had that out before.

Mr. PLATT. I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but will he permit me right on this question of cutlery to state, and to illustrate it by a single knife, that we are not equalizing the cost of labor? This is in the testimony, and I have some means of knowing that it is accurate. Take a four-bladed knife, which cost in Germany $1.56 a dozen. I think that is pretty near what the Senator gave as the cost of his four-bladed knives.

Now, the labor in Germany costs $1.06. The manufacture of that same knife costs in America $5.45 a dozen, the labor cost in it being $4.23. We do not go back to the iron mines. That is the cost in making the knife. So the difference in the cost of labor in this country over Germany in the making of that knife is $3.17. By this bill, by the amendment which the Senator is attacking so, the duty is only $1.14. So we have not come to the difference in cost. We have not half come to it.

Mr. VEST. I have no doubt that isolated instances like that can be discovered, but we are bound to take the average through the whole schedule. It is beyond credibility that as to these cheaper knives the cost of labor should be in any such proportion as that stated by the Senator from Connecticut.

But I want to make this statement, for I do not want to go into a general debate. Throughout this whole discussion and in all the action of our friends on the other side, one single fact is absolutely beyond question, and it is that they have never looked to the question of labor to guide them in fixing their rates; they have looked to importations. I have called attention to this again and again. Wherever you see a large increase of duty, if you will turn over to the importations you will see a large importation.

Mr. HISCOCK. Allow me to say right here in reference to that—of course we know what we have done better than the Senator from Missouri——

Mr. VEST. I do not belong to the committee.

Mr. HISCOCK. In all cases we have investigated the question of labor. The importation, as a matter of course, is the most positive proof that the conditions as to labor have not been equalized. Else with all the capital that we have in this country, with the plant necessary for doing it all, our people would make the goods and the importation would not be continued. That is simply considered, and has been received as a bill of evidence.

Mr. VEST. I have not the honor to be a member of the Committee on Finance, but it is a most remarkable fact that the Senator from New York tells us they have examined this question of labor, and then advances the remarkable proposition that the amount of importations settles the amount of labor.

Mr. HISCOCK. I beg the Senator's pardon; I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. VEST. What did the Senator say?

Mr. HISCOCK. I simply said that it was received as corroborating evidence or as evidence of some sort on that question upon the process of reasoning that I have indicated; but it never has been received in the way in which the Senator seems to state that I said.

Mr. VEST. It is remarkable that whilst we have read as to almost every item the estimate of the Treasury Department giving the amount of labor put into the American product, in not one single instance have our friends on the committee told us what was the cost as to the same article of labor abroad. If they had that information they ought to have given it to us.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Connecticut within ten minutes has read within the hearing of the Senate that very statement.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Connecticut has as to one knife, but even that is brought here now for the first time in the debate.

Mr. PLATT. I referred to it this morning with reference to a great number of knives. I put the table in my remarks. It is published in the testimony.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is what I was going to say, that it appears in the testimony.

Mr. PLATT. It has not been questioned by any importer.

Mr. VEST. The Committee on Finance have not even given us the calculation of experts as to increases of duties in the bill or in any amendment that they have offered. They have given us no such calculation.

Mr. ALLISON. What is this statement here?

Mr. VEST. That is no statement of the ad valorem increase in your bill. It is the ad valorem duty under the existing law. Will the Senator point me to where they have done it?

Mr. HISCOCK. You can reach that result——

Mr. VEST. They have left us to go to experts whom we could find and to pick up information here and there from importers and others. They have never given us the calculation of the increase of duty or the change in duty by reason of the substitute that they have brought in here. If they have I should like to see it. We have a column here opposite each one of these items of ad valorem rates, but that is under existing law, because I worked it out after I acquired a little expert knowledge and was able to do it myself.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is fair the Senator should say that so far as the statement is concerned in all cases, usually at least, it gives the unit of value, and it is no great difficulty for him to work out the ad valorem himself.

Mr. VEST. It was done with a great deal of difficulty when I commenced this work.

Mr. HISCOCK. I wish to say another thing, that, in the main, so far as the items in this bill are concerned they were very largely prepared, practically agreed to, I would not say in all cases, without our having examined into the question of importations, and the question of non-importation was more frequently used against claims which were urged to have duties raised than it was in any other case.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I will not pursue the discussion, because we could not agree about it, and I apologize for having introduced anything which led to general debate. I will not do so any more. But I want to call attention to a statement for the benefit of my friend from New York, and then I am done. He has repeatedly alluded to the question of the product of the world as influencing the price of commodities. I have before me a very interesting pamphlet which I obtained from Mr. Carroll D. Wright. I have worked diligently to get from statistics (because this is one of the most interesting points in the whole tariff discussion) the effect of the tariff upon prices. I have at last obtained this little tract.

I suppose it will be discredited, for it comes from Michael G. Mulhall, F. S. S., a Fellow of the Scientific Society, I suppose, and the author of "The Dictionary of Statistics." It is entitled "Variations of Price Level since 1850," a pamphlet which belongs to the Government, and which I am to return; I will put the concluding portion of it in the RECORD. It takes twenty articles comprising 90 per cent. of all human industries, products, or manufactures, and runs out the product of the world with the general decrease of price since 1850. Here is the conclusion:

The above twenty items comprise 90 per cent. of all human industries as regards products or manufactures, and therefore enable us to arrive at the exact variations of price level for the whole world, that is, the rise or fall in the purchasing power of gold since 1850. The result is as follows:

Years.	Purchasing power.
1841–'50	100.0
1851–'60	104.7
1861–'70	111.1
1871–'80	105.7
1881–'84	94.7

We find, therefore, a fall of 5½ per cent. from the price-level of the decade ending 1850, or nearly 15 per cent. from that of 1861–'70. This is much less than people in England generally suppose, because it is the fault of Englishmen to limit their scope of observation to this island, when, by looking around at other nations, we might be better disposed to form a correct judgment.

As regards the causes which led to the fall in price-level I have nothing now to say, my present purpose having simply been to fix precisely the relative value of gold as compared with merchandise in the thirty-five years that have elapsed since the great discoveries of the precious metal in California and Australia.

I read this simply to show that there has been a fall of prices all over the world.

Mr. ALDRICH. Everybody admits that.

Mr. VEST. There is no doubt of it.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. VEST. When our friends claim, then, that the high protective tariff has caused the fall specifically in the United States, it is not sustained either by the facts in this country, or the facts in England, or the facts as to the whole world.

Mr. HISCOCK. I wish to make one suggestion in response to that. We will take iron and steel. Of iron America now, I think, is the largest producer in the world.

Mr. PLATT. It is.

Mr. HISCOCK. America is the largest producer in the world. Her immense product, added to the market of the world, has forced down the price of iron and steel goods the world over. That is the reason why we are in favor of protection. We believe in that policy. There is nothing which illustrates it more completely than the immense development of the iron and steel industry throughout the United States.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of prolonging this debate, but I know the Senator from Missouri would not desire to do an injury or an injustice to a Connecticut industry. He presented a knife here as an object lesson, which he said was the worst knife made in the world, absolutely good for nothing, and that it was made in Connecticut. I have a little pride in having the quality of Connecticut manufactures sustained, if it is possible, and therefore I will ask him if upon second thought he is sure that that knife was made in Connecticut, and whether on the whole he does not think it is one of those German knives that we have been talking about?

Mr. VEST. I might have taken up the wrong knife, but there is a knife here made in Connecticut almost exactly like it, which I will try to show to the Senator. I would not do any injustice to Connecticut or to any other State.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, a few days since the Senator from Missouri entertained the Senate for a good portion of a day upon the great enormity and crime of taxing salt. Those who heard the Senator at that time and had not taken the pains to look at the amount of the tax on salt, the production of salt, etc., and the importations, must necessarily have felt that there was great injustice being done to the people of the United States. The Senator grew warm in his denunciation of this robber system, as he called it, on one of the necessaries of life that everybody used, and, as I said before, on another occasion he grew somewhat pathetic over the sufferings of the great masses of the people in paying this great duty on salt. If all of the duty on salt were added to the price of salt in this country it would amount to 1 cent and one-tenth of a cent per capita to the people of the United States. Later the Senator discoursed at great length upon the enormity of the tax upon tin-plate because of the universal use of tin-plate or of articles manufactured from tin-plate.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. TELLER. I will yield to the Senator when I get through. I do not care about yielding now.

To-day the Senator from Missouri has spent some considerable time in discussing the great enormity of the tax on jack-knives, pen-knives, and razors, and the vast increase of expense to the people of the United States by means of the great duty now existing and the proposed duty on knives, razors, and that class of cutlery. If all the duty that has been collected on knives and razors and articles of that character should be added to the cost the sum total would be about 1½ cents per capita.

We have had denunciation by one Senator and another, but particularly by the Senator from Missouri, of a system that would enable the manufacturers thus to rob the people of the United States. When it was stated here that that which cost a mere fraction of a cent was sold for eight or ten times what it cost and the profits went into the pockets of the importers, the Senator had no denunciations for the importers and for their greed. Yesterday, when the sugar schedule was before the Senate; when, if the Senator is correct in his theory that all the duty is added to the cost of the article (and undoubtedly that is true on the sugar schedule, for we have not been able to manufacture sugar enough in this country to change the rule), $56,500,000 would be added, or more than 90 cents per capita for every man, woman, and child in the United States, young and old, great and small, the Senator was conveniently absent from that debate.

Mr. VEST. Why, Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. I expected then to see the Senator rise, as he indicated he would some days ago, and denounce that robbery; but I do not recollect to have heard him denouncing it yesterday at all.

Mr. VEST. I did not expect the Senator would do me the honor to recollect that I took any part in that discussion, but I opened the discussion against the bounty amendment.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that.

Mr. VEST. As to sugar itself there is a protection of nearly 50 per cent. upon sugar by the Senate bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Practically 50.

Mr. VEST. Practically 50 per cent., and because I did not say anything against that provision of the bill I am taken to task by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. I understood that the Senator had had the floor; I understood that he had had the opportunity; and I understood that he did not take advantage of the opportunity to say a word in favor of the proposed reduction of the tariff on sugar.

Mr. VEST. What opportunity or necessity was there?

Mr. TELLER. I understand that he was somewhat disturbed by the proposition to take off the tariff on sugar and make it up by a bounty. The only thing he was heard on yesterday was as to the enormity of increasing the production of sugar in this country by a bounty.

Mr. VEST. I am opposed to a bounty.

Mr. TELLER. He is opposed to the bounty. If there is any one thing that must be admitted in this debate it is that the Senator from Missouri is not a protectionist. He does not pretend to be. He says that we can not have free trade, yet he admits himself that if there was any way to have free trade he would be in favor of free trade. If the excise duties collected would run the Government without customs he would have free trade absolutely. He has denounced protection as a robbery system, as an unjust system, taking money from one person and putting it into the pocket of another. The Senator could not have been in favor of continuing the tariff on sugar because of its protective character. He has said over and over again on this floor that we did not need it for revenue.

What is the reason why he did not oppose it, Mr. President? Is it because it is in the Mills bill practically as it now stands, and that his party is committed to the Mills bill? If there is any other reason it must be because of the peculiar locality, geographically, of the industry, which I should not like to insinuate or intimate. The other day when I called his attention to the enormity of the provision of the existing law as to the duty on sugar, he intimated that he would be heard in denunciation of it. He has not been heard; he will not be heard, Mr. President.

I do not propose to go into a general debate on the tariff. I agree with the Senator from Missouri who got up here this morning and declared that the time was now too late for general debate, although he proceeded at considerable length to discuss the general tariff question. I do not intend to discuss it at length. I agree with the Senator that a general discussion of the tariff question is probably inopportune now; but when I hear the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], as I did a day or two ago, the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] who sits nearest to me, and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], and other Senators on that side speak of this tariff as an outrage, as a violation of constitutional law, I can not help but call the attention of those Senators to the fact that the American system is much older than any man on this floor. I can not help calling their attention to the fact that it came in with the very advent of the Government under which we live, and that the second statute put upon our statute-book was one declaring that it was the duty of the American Congress to encourage and protect American manufactures.

I do not think that it would be out of time or out of place for me to suggest that nearly one-third of the men who signed the Constitution and who participated in making it were members of that Congress, and every one of them supported that bill, which was a bill introduced by Mr. Madison and advocated on the floor of the House by Mr. Madison. Between that time and 1812 no less than twelve separate bills, every one of them clearly recognizing the American principle of protection to our manufactures, became laws with the approval of the class of men of whom I have spoken—George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, Alexander Hamilton, Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, and James Monroe, the two Adamses, and Andrew Jackson. All the leading men of that day were committed to the American system, not simply by their votes, but by their open and avowed declarations. Henry Clay, in the Senate of 1842, declared that the constitutionality of protection had never been questioned in the United States until 1820.

Yet in this late hour of the day, with innumerable statutes upon our statute-books that met the approval of the principal and leading men of our early history, and of our more matured growth—men like James Buchanan, Thomas H. Benton, and Silas Wright, who approved of the protective system—we are now told that when we advocate protection with revenue as incidental thereto instead of protection as incidental to revenue we are violators of the Constitution of the United States. In the House of Representatives in 1816, when Mr. Clay and Mr. Calhoun and the great strong men of that day took part in the discussion, not of the constitutional question, because it then had not been raised, it was declared that protection was the main thing and revenue was incidental thereto. It was upon that theory that the act of 1816 was passed with the approval and with the support on the floor both of Henry Clay and John C. Calhoun. And yet the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] tells us that we who still adhere to what the fathers declared was right are willful and open violators of the Constitution of the United States. I will take my law upon constitutional questions from Daniel Webster, from Silas Wright, from James Buchanan, from Thomas H. Benton, and from that class of statesmen, in preference to any modern light, whether sitting here or elsewhere.

Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss the constitutional question. It has passed beyond the domain of discussion. It is incorporated, as I say, in statute after statute that has had the approval of every President that we have ever had, unless it may be one or two of modern date. There is not a Democratic President, unless it be Grover Cleveland, who has not signed bills recognizing the correctness of the protective policy, for there never was a tariff bill passed that could be called a revenue bill alone. Only within the last week ten or twelve Senators sitting on the other side of the Chamber gave their votes in favor of the protective system when it was a question of placing a duty on coal.

As to the power of the General Government, I have discovered that the Senators on the other side who insist upon a strict construction of the Constitution have never found any difficulty when their local interests demanded their vote to satisfy their consciences that the power existed in the Government, whether it was to feed the sufferers on the Mississippi River who were suffering from high water, or whether it was to handle and keep out the dread scourge of yellow fever. Nay, more, even when drought had attacked some portions of the country a very large number on that side found the power for the Government of the United States to furnish seeds for the distressed settler, and the Democratic House at least found authority to send that kind of a bill here. So always, when there is a desire to exercise the power, they find it.

I want to say that in my judgment it is not because Senators on that side doubt the power of the Federal Government to pass laws of this character that they oppose this class of legislation, and I would not say that if it had not been so repeatedly declared that we were in open violation of the Constitution.

They oppose it, in my judgment, because they are hostile to the industries of a section of country of which they have not so many as they ought to have; for when it is a question of local protection to coal, or glass, or sugar, whether they say it is for revenue makes no difference; they are found then voting for the exercise of the power.

Everybody knows that we do not need $56,000,000 a year from sugar, every dollar of which comes out of the people of the United States, and yet there has been nobody on that side of the Chamber who has denounced that. They have saved their denunciations for the cent and one-tenth of a cent per capita on salt, the small increase on tin cups, or something of that character, and they have let this great big robbery, if they are right in their position, of more than 90 per cent. for every person living in the United States to go untouched and unchallenged.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. TELLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. VANCE. The Senator stated that every dollar of the sugar tax came out of the people of the United States, to which I agree, but I thought he contended that the foreigner paid that.

Mr. TELLER. The foreigner would pay it if we had a large production of sugar. He pays it on salt. Why? Because we manufacture enough salt in the United States to control the market. Whenever we manufacture enough sugar in the United States to control the market, then the foreigner will deduct the duty from his profits on sugar; but so long as he controls the market as he does, he fixes the price. That is the rule always on all commodities. If we send our wheat abroad in great quantities we may determine what the price is ourselves; but if we send it in small lots, then the other country determines the price. That is true of all products that come here. As soon as we get to manufacture in considerable quantities, then the prices go down. We have not yet got to manufacture sugar so that we can do that. There is no reason to believe that we ever shall do it with a duty and a duty alone. I have grave doubts whether even the bounty that we put upon sugar, if it shall become a law, will so stimulate its production in this country that we shall become self-supporting with reference to sugar, producing all that we need or anything like the amount we need in this country. We have so far failed to stimulate and encourage that industry. We can not afford to put more duty on it, and yet every Senator on that side is in favor of continuing the present duty, or, at least, the duty in the Mills bill, and in fact I think they are in favor of continuing the present duty. Not one, I believe, on that side of the Chamber is in favor of stimulating this industry except by the tariff. It will not do for Senators to say that it is a revenue duty.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. REAGAN. I will simply say that I have declared myself in favor of reducing the duty on sugar and rice below what it is in the present law.

Mr. TELLER. I believe the Senator did say he was in favor of reducing the duty on sugar below what it is. I suppose he is in favor of just what the Mills bill provided.

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator has no right to suppose what my opinion is until I express it, I suggest.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator did not say how much he was in favor of reducing it. He had no words of commendation for this provision of the bill that does reduce it one-half, and I do not know whether he is in favor of reducing it one mill. I do not know how much the Senator is in favor of reducing it. He can state if he chooses so to do.

The protective system, in my judgment, is a valuable system. I do not want to say anything unfair or harsh. I am entitled to my belief, and I am entitled to it without having any Senator on the other side, because I profess my belief in the protective system, to say I am a willful and open and knowing violator of the Constitution. I believe that the protective system is absolutely indispensable to the preservation of the liberties of the people of the United States. I do not believe you can maintain in this country a free government unless you protect the people who labor. I do not believe you can protect the people who labor in this country in any other method or manner than by the protective system. I believe if we shall be induced, which we are not likely to be, to abandon the protective system there would be want and distress and squalor and vice and crime in this country that would in the end destroy the character of the Government in which we have taken so much pride. If we can maintain the high character we maintained for many years for the laboring people of this country, we can always hope for the maintenance of the American Republic with all its institutions intact.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the question now before the Senate is not one relating to the abstract wisdom or unwisdom of a protective tariff. To consider that question properly we would have to enter into grounds of thought and information which are entirely different from those affecting the proper adjustment of the tariff. It may, however, be said in reference to much that has been said now and on previous occasions that the protective policy, as it was understood by Mr. Madison and those who originated it and advocated its constitutionality, was never intended to do away with the general principle of freedom of trade between the different countries of the world. That question was investigated with very great consideration by all the great statesmen of the country, originally by Mr. Jefferson, more notably by Mr. Madison and by his successors in the Presidency. It will be sufficient, however, for my purpose to refer very briefly to Mr. Madison's letter to Mr. Clay from Montpelier, written in April, 1824. He says:

> With views of the subject such as these, I am a friend to the general principle of a free industry as the basis of a sound system of political economy. On the other hand, I am not less a friend to the legal patronage of domestic manufactures, as far as they come within particular reasons for exceptions to the general rule, not derogating from its generality. If the friends of the tariff, some of them at least, maintain opinions subversive of the rule, there are among its opponents views taken of the subject which exclude the fair exceptions to it.
> For examples of these exceptions, I take—1. The case of articles necessary for national defense. 2. Articles of a use too indispensable to be subjected to foreign contingencies. 3. Cases where there may be sufficient certainty that a temporary encouragement will introduce a particular manufacture, which, once introduced, will flourish without that encouragement. That there are such cases is proved by the cotton manufacture introduced by the impulse of the war and the patronage of the law, without which it might not, for a considerable time, have effectually sprung up. It must not be forgotten, however, that the great success in this case was owing to the advantage in the raw material and to the extraordinary degree in which manual labor is abridged by mechanical agency. 4. A very important exception results from the frequency of wars among the manufacturing nations; the effect of a state of war on the price of their manufactures and the improbability that domestic substitutes will be provided by establishments which could not outlast occasions of such uncertain duration.

These are the exceptions to which Mr. Madison refers, of the general principle of free industry as the economic basis of legislation in all countries. It will not be forgotten that Mr. Madison was the great exponent of the constitutionality of the use of the power of taxation for the encouragement of manufactures. We have heard the suggestion made here that there was a distinction between the constitutionality of a duty for the encouragement of manufacture or of industry and a tax or a bounty. This opinion has no foundation in the construction of the Constitution as maintained by Mr. Madison and by the fathers of the Republic. In the letter of Mr. Madison to Mr. Cabell, and his notes upon that letter, on the 30th of October, 1828, he uses the following language:

It appears that the clause, as it originally stood, simply expressed "a power to lay taxes, duties, imposts, and excises" without pointing out the objects; and, of course, leaving them applicable in carrying into effect the other specified powers. It appears, further, that a solicitude to prevent any constructive danger to the validity of public debts contracted under the superseded form of government, led to the addition of the words "to pay the debts."

This phraseology having the appearance of an appropriation limited to the payment of debts, an express appropriation was added "for the expense of the Government, etc."

But even this was considered as short of the objects for which taxes, duties, imposts, and excises might be required; and the more comprehensive provision was made by substituting "for expenses of Government" the terms of the old Confederation, namely, "and provide for the common defense and general welfare," making duties and imposts, as well as taxes and excises, applicable not only to payment of debts, but to the common defense and general welfare.

The question, then, is, What is the import of that phrase, "common defense and general welfare," in its actual connection? The import which Virginia has always asserted and still contends for is that they are explained and limited to the enumerated objects subjoined to them, among which objects is the regulation of foreign commerce; as far, therefore, as a tariff of duties is necessary and proper in regulating foreign commerce for any of the usual purposes of such regulations it may be imposed by Congress, and consequently for the purpose of encouraging manufactures, which is a well-known purpose for which duties and imposts have been usually employed. This view of the clause providing for revenue instead of interfering with or excluding the power of regulating foreign trade corroborates the rightful exercise of power for the encouragment of domestic manufactures.

It will be seen that Mr. Madison in his construction of the Constitution, which has become the foundation of an established policy of the Government, lays down the proposition that the regulation of commerce is an enumerated object in the Constitution for the exercise of the taxing power either by duties on imports or by excises or taxes, and that within the term "the regulation of commerce" is the encouragement or the discouragement of domestic industry. The term "regulation of commerce," according to his elaborate argument many times repeated, which I have here before me, in different parts of both his official and private life and in his performance of public duties, includes the protection of the manifold industries and interests of the country, whether by taxation or whether by duties on imports. Therefore, so far as the question of power is concerned under the Constitution it has prevailed, commencing with General Washington and extending to the present time; the power of laying duties on imports, or of taxes, or of excises, rests upon precisely the same interpretation of the Constitution, and the same clause of the Constitution, as maintained by the Jeffersonian or Virginia rule of strict construction.

The power to lay duties upon imports for the purposes of the common defense and the general welfare, even in the strictest school of construction, was interpreted to be for the enumerated objects in the Constitution. The power of regulating commerce therefore being one of these specified objects, comes within the strictest rule of construction, and the power to levy taxes, equally with the power to impose duties, comes within the power of regulating commerce as construed from the beginning of the Government to the present time.

So that upon the mere question whether the power of encouragement of domestic industries or of manufactures is exercised by direct taxation, by excise, or by the imposition of duties, there is not any difference in the power. The power of appropriation for all purposes of regulating commerce is of course co-extensive with the necessities of the regulation of commerce. So that there can be no question that, as a matter of power, the levying of the taxes and the appropriation of the money for any legitimate purpose within the term "regulating commerce" are within this construction of the Constitution which has become historic and traditional in the country.

The material question here, as in the adjustment of all taxes, is only in reference to the amount and effect of the duty, and the extent of the tax should bear equally and fairly upon the country, for it is quite manifest that you may levy a tax in such a shape and on such amount and on such things as to build up a privileged order. It does not matter whether you call it the manufacturers of cutlery or the manufacturers of any other product; if you have given them a bounty, whether it is in the shape of a right to collect higher prices for their goods or by a direct payment from the Treasury—if you have placed them by legislation in any circumstances whatever which advantage them unduly and beyond the great mass of people of the country, you have created an aristocracy, and in doing so have impoverished the great mass of the people. The question, therefore, is in the extent of this imposition, in the character of it, in the fact whether or not it is a permanent imposition upon the country, whether it bears easily and fairly and equally upon all the people of the country and not unduly upon the poor and most destitute classes.

If we shall confine our investigations to this reasonable proposition we shall be enabled to arrive at some just conclusion. But in reference to all these sectional claims and sectional prejudice, or as to the consistency of this or that person, it has nothing to do with this great and important question.

We are now laying a system of taxation, for the idea never prevailed and has no force that the imposition of a duty, of a tax of any kind, is not borne by the consumer of the thing taxed. That is a proposition which is impossible in nature and unreasonable, having no kind of a foundation in reason. A tax upon consumption must be paid by the consumer, and the cost from the beginning to the end by a necessary law of political economy is borne by the consumer of the article. In all these discussions by Mr. Hamilton, by Mr. Madison, by Mr. Jefferson of the question of the effect and character of taxation this has been an admitted proposition. That it should be denied here and claimed that under any possible circumstances in any case, except a single exception here and there not germane to the proposition, as if a man should abandon his property should give it away—that there should be any discussion in this body that it was possible under any circumstances whatever for a tax upon consumption to be paid by any other person than the consumer or user, or that any part of it should be paid by any other person, is somewhat surprising because so entirely unreasonable. The productions of a country or a man must be used or consumed by some one, and he or they who use it must give in exchange for it something, otherwise there could be nothing but uncompensated and voluntary producing classes on one side and non-producing and consuming persons on the other.

Mr. President, we have heard much said here in regard to the question of a tax being laid; that it is a small amount on each individual; and we are told that salt pays but little; that each individual person contributes but a mite, a few cents; that the duty on knives, cutlery, and articles of that kind is an infinitesimal tax upon each person. It is true that all taxation must be upon the general consumption, and each person will pay but little. But suppose we investigate that proposition a little. I have here a treatise by Mr. Edward Atkinson, based upon an analysis, which I will read:

What I wish to bring out is this: Out of an estimated product of the present population, at the same ratio as that used in the treatise on wages, to wit, $11,400,000,000 in 1885, against $10,000,000,000 in the census year—

Food and drink take up, at the minimum, about	$5,000,000,000
Clothing, etc., at the maximum	1,500,000,000
Repairs, maintenance, and construction of dwellings for working people	460,000,000
Repairs and construction of dwellings for the well-to-do, at double rates	40,000,000
Accounted for	7,000,000,000

Leaving $4,400,000,000 to be accounted for in the consumption of all other articles aside from food, drink, clothing, and shelter. Out of the distribution of the remainder would come the luxuries of the rich, the comforts of the well-to-do, and all our additions to capital and to the savings of the people.

But in this analysis it will be observed that the proportion of the total expenditure assigned to food is far short of that which is the well-ascertained proportion in workmen's families, both in this country and in Europe, which is 50 per cent. of their income in respect to the better class and 60 per cent. in the lower grade. At 50 per cent. of our estimated gross income food and drink costs $5,700,000,000.

What, then, is the conclusion? Is it not that even in this sparsely-populated land, of almost unlimited potentiality in its production of grain and meat, more than one-half the struggle for life is still a mere struggle for food? Can this low plane of mere existence, which many fail even to attain, be attributed to monopoly of land, to institutions established by law, or to causes wholly remediable by legislation? If not, wherein do we fail, in spite of our much-vaunted civilization?

If this statement is true, and it is proved clearly, it behooves all wise men of every class to consider it carefully in imposing taxes. If more than one-half the struggle for life is still a mere struggle for food, which many fail even to attain, it is a fact which carries with it much of warning and wise suggestion.

We will perceive from this statement and from a further statement which will be found in this book, which I will not occupy time by reading, that 1 cent a day is the margin in this struggle for food, 1 cent a day the margin between want and suffering and comparative comfort to the greater number of our people.

When we are discussing questions of taxation and say that it is but a few cents per capita in the year, but a half-dollar for salt, or a few cents for knives, we forget the fact that we are legislating for 65,000,000 people, the larger portion of whom are engaged in a struggle for existence, for food, in which a cent a day means comfort or the loss of it starvation and want. We must not forget the fact that in the levy of the taxes in all nations and at all times they must be levied upon the great body of the people and upon those things which they consume most universally, for that is the law of taxation. Taxes must be paid out of production, not out of something that does not exist, and consumption is taxed simply as the means of levying upon production, and production can only be by the use and employment of all the labor, all the energy, in some form or other, of all the people.

But if we are insensible to the fact in the levy of a tax, and because it is a minimum, because it is an insignificant amount, we shall disregard it, we will destroy the great body of the people, and we must have consideration of that, first, because the people have a right to happiness and comfort, and second, because before a government reaches that point of oppression the people will turn and destroy it. Therefore Mr. Madison and Mr. Jefferson and these other great men, Mr. Adams and Mr. Hamilton himself, recognized the fact that the wrong of any system of taxation, be it a tariff or be it a direct levy of taxes, is in the oppressiveness of the tax upon the great body of the people, and you can not relieve that by any system which will exclude trade, which will forbid commercial intercourse between the nations of the world.

You will only enhance the sufferings of the people. You can not deny competition between one man and another, or one country and another, for competition is the same whether it be domestic or whether it be foreign, whether it be between great bodies of people and great organized industries or a few. The principle recognized by all people has been that free industry, free trade should be encouraged, as a rule, checked and limited only in instances by the exercise of this protective power so as to create and encourage by moderate taxes and to a limited extent the industries which may advantageously be pursued in a country. This power is subject to great abuse. It may be extended, like the taxing power, to everything; it may be exercised in such a manner as to destroy the people, to build up privileged classes, and that has been the history of the world, and amongst all the governments of ancient history it has been oppressively used, and has contributed to that accumulation of wealth in the hands of a few and that general poverty which has preceded their downfall.

Alexander Hamilton, in his report upon manufactures when Secretary of the Treasury, which with Mr. Madison's constitutional arguments and advocacy upon the subject may be said to have been the introduction into this country of this system, and the great source from which the ideas in its defense originated, says as follows in his report:

To these observations the following appears to be a satisfactory answer:

First. If the system of perfect liberty to industry and commerce were the prevailing system of nations, the arguments which dissuade a country in the predicament of the United States, from the zealous pursuit of manufactures would doubtless have great force. It will not be affirmed that they might not be permitted, with few exceptions, to serve as a rule of national conduct. In such a state of things each country would have the full benefit of its peculiar advantages to compensate for its deficiencies or disadvantages. If one nation were in a condition to supply manufactured articles, on better terms than another, that other might find an abundant indemnification in a superior capacity to furnish the produce of the soil, and a free exchange, mutually beneficial, of the commodities which each was able to supply, on the best terms, might be carried on between them, supporting, in full vigor, the industry of each. And though the circumstances which have been mentioned, and others which will be unfolded hereafter, render it probable that nations merely agricultural would not enjoy the same degree of opulence, in proportion to their numbers, as those which united manufactures with agriculture, yet the progressive improvement of the lands of the farmer might, in the end, atone for an inferior degree of opulence in the mean time; and in a case in which opposite considerations are pretty equally balanced, the option ought, perhaps, always to be in favor of leaving industry to its own direction.

But the system which has been mentioned is far from characterizing the general policy of nations. The prevalent one has been regulated by an opposite spirit. The consequence of it is that the United States are, to a certain extent, in the situation of a country precluded from foreign commerce. They can, indeed, without difficulty, obtain from abroad the manufactured supplies of which they are in want, but they experience numerous and very injurious impediments to the emission and rent of their own commodities. Nor is this the case in reference to a single foreign nation only. The regulations of several countries with which we have the most extensive intercourse throw serious obstructions in the way of the principal staples of the United States. In such a position of things the United States can not exchange with Europe on equal terms, and the want of reciprocity would render them the victim of a system which should induce them to confine their views to agriculture and refrain from manufactures. A constant and increasing necessity on their part for the commodities of Europe and only a partial and occasional demand for their own in return could not but expose them to a state of impoverishment, compared with the opulence to which their political and natural advantages authorize them to aspire.

All persons will perceive how foreign to this proposition have been the arguments that have been made upon this subject looking to an isolation of this country, looking to prohibitory or oppressive restrictions upon trade, maintaining the idea that this country should be independent of the commerce of the world, and that the theory of protection should go to the extent of preventing trade and commerce, instead of the reasonable and limited encouragement and stimulus which may be necessary to build up necessary and useful industries, which are necessary in time of war or necessary to secure the independence of the country, and which places us in a condition to stand fair competition with the other people of the world. The theory as maintained in the original legesiation upon this subject was limited strictly to this extent. If the argument be maintained that by bounties, by duties on imports, we are to develop and encourage the building up of every possible form of employment in this country which may be advisable, who are to pay for it while it is being done, and who are to maintain it after it shall have been done? Somebody must pay. This encouragement must be either by a prohibition or by a tax levied upon the thing imported. If the tax be sufficient to amount to a prohibition, we simply say that we will leave to the natural causes in our own country the production of these manufactures. Was that the idea of Mr. Hamilton? Let us see. He says:

The aid of foreign capital may safely, and with considerable latitude, be taken into calculation. Its instrumentality has been long experienced in our external commerce; and it has begun to be felt in various other modes. Not only our funds, but our agriculture, and other internal improvements, have been animated by it. It has already, in a few instances, extended even to our manufactures.

It is a well-known fact that there are parts of Europe which have more capital than profitable domestic objects of employment. Hence, among other proofs, the large loans continually furnished to foreign states. And it is equally certain that the capital of other parts may find more profitable employment in the United States than at home. And, notwithstanding there are weighty inducements to prefer the employment of capital at home, even at less profit, to an investment of it abroad, though with greater gain, yet these inducements are overruled, either by a deficiency of employment, or by a very material difference in profit. Both these causes operate to produce a transfer of foreign capital to the United States. It is certain that various objects in this country hold out advantages which are with difficulty to be equaled elsewhere; and under the increasingly favorable impressions which are entertained of our Government, the attractions will become more and more strong. These impressions will prove a rich mine of prosperity to the country, if they are confirmed and strengthened by the progress of our affairs. And to secure this advantage, little more is now necessary than to foster industry and cultivate order and tranquillity at home and abroad.

It is not impossible that there may be persons disposed to look with a jealous eye on the introduction of foreign capital as if it were an instrument to deprive our own citizens of our own industry; but, perhaps, there never could be a more unreasonable jealousy. Instead of being viewed as a rival, it ought to be considered as a most valuable auxiliary, conducing to put in motion a greater quantity of productive labor and a greater portion of useful enterprise than could exist without it. It is at least evident that in a country situated like the United States, with an infinite fund of resources yet to be unfolded, every farthing of foreign capital which is laid out in internal meliorations and in industrious establishments of a permanent nature is a precious acquisition.

And, whatever be the objects which originally attract foreign capital, when once introduced, it may be directed towards any purpose of beneficial exertion which is desired. And to detain it among us there can be no expedient so effectual as to enlarge the sphere within which it may be usefully employed. Though introduced merely with views to speculations in the funds it may afterwards be rendered subservient to the interests of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures. But the attraction of foreign capital for the direct purpose of manufactures ought not to be deemed a chimerical expectation. There are already examples of it, as remarked in another place. And the examples, if the disposition be cultivated, can hardly fail to multiply.

Mr. President, the object which Mr. Hamilton and others had in imposing this duty, this tariff in its protective features, was to invite the foreign capital of other countries; and such must always be its effect. This great man perceived that the natural effect of a privilege granted to a particular pursuit was to invite capital from abroad, and the persons, the laborers, who had the means to accomplish it, to the more favored country, and thus to produce an interest for this country in the employment of persons who might be there or might be brought there in increasing the subjects of taxation and increasing the amount of production. But we will perceive that this may be carried to a great extent. You may by legislation invite competition from abroad to come and build up these great interests here, and while that would have its advantages, you do not wish to give inducements to one class of persons by oppressive taxation imposed upon the great body of the people, for it does not matter in what form the imposition comes, it does not matter in what shape the people of the country furnish the inducement, it must be a moneyed inducement, it must be a profit of some kind and from some source as the result of your legislation, and your laws can affect only your own country.

You can not build up what you call a great protected system by oppressive impositions upon the great body of your own people. You must develop by gentle stimulation the natural opportunities and capacities of the country. Such was the law and such was the argument and such was the theory of those who maintained that there was a power in the Government, in the regulation of foreign commerce, to levy duties upon imports for the purpose of encouraging American industry and American manufacture.

Mr. President, it may not be uninteresting to us, while upon this subject, to give a little consideration to the systems of taxation which have prevailed in other countries and in former periods of time. We are not the only republic that has ever existed, and compared with some we are yet in our infancy. We may not live to see the long centuries pass which witnessed the duration of some other republics—Athens, the Grecian states, the Roman republic, the empire. The democracy of Athens was more completely a popular government than our own, and it is of interest to us to see how far their people were developed, how wise they were, how they had investigated all these subjects which we have been discussing here, with what profound and exhaustive thought they had considered the sources of taxation and the methods of it, and how they correspond with our own.

The ordinary revenues of the Athenian states—

Says this book, Ancient and Mediæval Republics, by Mann—

The ordinary revenues of the Athenian states were from customs and harbor duties, the excise on sales in the public market, the tax on aliens, the tax of 3 obols for every slave, which was likewise exacted from every freedman, court fees and fines, the rent of the public lands, and the income from the mines. Public lands, pasture and arable, as well as public buildings not needed for public use, were let to the highest bidder. Tributary states paid a sum equivalent to a 5 per cent. duty on all commodities exported and imported by them. In the flourishing period of the republic the annual revenue collected from these various sources amounted to about 2,000 talents.

About $2,440,000.

Extraordinary expenditures, rendered necessary by war or other exigency, were met by a tax on property which resembled in some respects the forced loans exacted by Italian republics in the middle ages.

We see, then, that this system of duties on imports from customs extended away back to the days of the Athenian democracy. We come on down to the days of the Roman republic and empire. The Roman empire resorted to it in order to meet the great expenses of administration.

The cost of supporting the legions was borne by the provinces in which they were quartered; but the expense of the pay and equipment of the troops stationed in Italy, and of the maintenance of the fleets which guarded the coasts and protected the commerce of the empire, was met from the general treasury. Other financial burdens of an imperial nature were the compensation of the numerous subordinate officials engaged in the various departments of the Roman civic government, the equipment of the vast army of slaves employed upon the public works, the cost of public shows and entertainments, and the expenditure for corn, wine, and oil, corn being given away to the poorer citizens, and wine and oil sold at an almost nominal price.

The ancient tax known as the tributum had fallen into disuse during the flourishing period of the commonwealth, when the treasuries of the world were being poured into the coffers of Rome and the public domain, having been allotted to veteran soldiers and other landless citizens, no longer yielded a revenue. In order to meet the greatly increased expenses of the imperial administration a capitation tax of a dual kind was imposed upon real property and upon polls. The soil of the provinces was divided into portions known as capita of the estimated value of 1,000 solidi in one such fiscal unit, so that one large proprietor might be rated as the owner of a number of capita, while the land of several small proprietors might be combined to form one caput. The classes who possessed no landed property paid a tax upon their personal effects. Common laborers and slaves, who owned nothing, were simply rated according to their polls, and the sum due was collected from their masters or employers. In some of the provinces, such as Africa and Egypt, the revenue was collected in kind for the purpose of supplying the capital with corn for public distribution, and, instead of a tithe of the produce being exacted, the landowner was required to deliver to the nearest imperial storehouse a fixed quantity of grain based upon an estimate of the productive nature of the soil.

In provinces not specially designated as granaries corn or other produce was accepted at its market value to an extent limited by the requirements of the government, but the demand was, as a rule, quite equivalent to the supply, for the provisions not needed for the sustenance of armies engaged in almost continual warfare and of the multitude of slaves in the public employ were readily disposed of to the Roman populace. The state continued, as in the republican age, to derive an income from gold, silver, and other metallic mines and quarries of marble and other valuable stone. The mines were let to contractors or associations of publicani, as during the commonwealth period, and the state supplied the contractors with the forced labor of convicted criminals, and sometimes with the reluctant industry of regular soldiers.

At a later period the population of mining districts, which probably included a large proportion of released convicts, was reduced to a sort of peonage, being bound to the soil and forbidden to emigrate, but allowed to hire out their own labor in the mines. Salt-works, fisheries, and forests were likewise farmed to contractors; but the state kept in its own hands the collection of duties on exports and imports, of the tolls and dues of cities, roads, and bridges, and of the numerous imposts with which the luxuries, and even the necessities, of life were burdened.

And in a foot-note the author goes on:

Augustus increased the duties on exports and imports, and also increased the number of articles liable to such duties. The ordinary rate of duty was one-fortieth of the value of the goods, but a person might import free of duty any article intended for his own use. Smuggling was common, and the means taken by agents of the customs to detect smuggling were as offensive and annoying to travelers as they are at the present day.

We perceive, therefore, that in those days of the Roman empire the amount of duty on imports was about 2½ per cent. instead of our duty of 47 per cent.; and so, if we go on, we find when we come to the Venetian republic, with Florence and Venice, and their twelve hundred years of existence, the same system prevailing, the same system of limited and moderate duties upon imports and exports; no theory of the exclusion of trade; no theory of enormous and oppressive and prohibitory rates of duty; and we must perceive that the maintenance of a system of this kind of extravagant taxation and of prohibitory duties is not only unwise, not only inconsistent with the general prosperity of the people, but will have the effect of building up immense privileged interests, of creating an aristocracy of wealth, as veritable and completely plutocratic government as if by law certain privileges were made hereditary in certain persons and in certain families, and the same result will come to us from the same cause as came to Venice and to Florence in the final periods of their twelve hundred years of existence.

But, Mr. President, these questions relate altogether to the care with which a system of duties may be and should be imposed. Mr. Madison, in his review of the different tariffs and in his letter to Mr. Clay, lays down the proposition that the abuse of this power of taxation, the abuse of a system of levies upon imports, is the great evil that is to be apprehended from its use—the increased duty, the exaggerated duty, the application of it to cases to which it should not be applied, to cases in which the foreign production is better for the interests of a country than the home production would be; and he urges that it should be limited to articles necessary for the thorough independence of a country in a time of war and to the articles absolutely necessary for human life which the natural capabilities of the country favored, all with the understanding that the system of trade and commerce is a necessity for all people, an economic necessity, and that nothing but absolute prohibition will prevent commerce between countries.

But, Mr. President, before I depart from this view of the subject as to the inefficiency of extravagant and prohibitory duties and the impossibility of their being imposed consistently with the public interests, I wish to call attention to another fact.

It is certainly true that any stimulus of any kind, either natural or artificial, to production which increases its quantity will diminish its exchangeable value if the demand does not correspondingly increase, provided the increased supply is accessible to the markets of the world. That is an inevitable law, unless artificial combinations prevent its operation, and any stimulus, either by prohibition or by bounty, or of encouragement by combination of associated capital and enterprise, may develop industries and production in one country or another, but there will be a surplus in every country. You can not adjust the wants and the production of a people to a precise equality. There must be a surplus somewhere, and that surplus can not be carried away, either from a man or a country, except by exchanging it for something else. I find that in the twenty-three years from 1860 to 1883 there were eight thousand millions of breadstuffs, provisions, and cotton exported and exchanged into foreign productions and imported into this country, and there were nearly seven hundred millions in the last report of the Treasury Department of imports into this country.

What do these facts signify—eight thousand millions in twenty-three years and seven hundred millions in the last year? They indicate that whatever is the amount of tax or duty you impose upon that eight thousand millions exchanged into an import—for it is only an export of a value or property of your own people converted into something else and brought back here, and the value is simply transferred and exchanged into another product—the import and the export represent only one value increased by transportation and exchange and still represents the original value exported and the persons who produced it; whatever it may be, if the amount that you impose upon it be 100 per cent., or if it be increased until you destroy its value entirely by placing it beyond the reach of the consumer, you have only destroyed that much of your own production and have laid it upon the class that produced it just as if you had burned at your seaports this $8,000,000,000 of production, and that is a law which you can not alter. The excess of a man or of a country's production—for it matters not which—must be exchanged into something else of value or destroyed. That is a natural law.

Therefore it is that, however true and however wise it may be to encourage new or to maintain old industries, however wise to create an independence in the country, however constitutional and lawful to exercise the power of taxation or of imposing duties on imports, it must be done with reference to the fact that an import is but an export and a production of your own converted into something else of value, and that the tax you impose upon it is in every form and necessarily a tax upon your own people, whether it be produced by poorly paid or well paid labor when you have purchased it with the wheat or tobacco or provisions of the United States—it is their value, their property, and the more you tax it by a high duty you lessen the value of the exchange, and you diminish the capacity of the home producers or home market to buy and pay for your home manufacture. Therefore it is evident that the interests of protection to home manufactures and productions forbid a high rate of duty and demand such a system as will permit an exportation of all surplus production, and as large an export of all kinds as is consistent with the encouragement of such manufactures and such productions as the independence of the country in time of war requires, and as the natural capacities of the country enable us to make with advantage.

Now, as to the practicability of such a system of encouragement as the section of this bill relating to sugar provides, namely, a system of bounties, as to its operation upon the people, its effect upon the people at large, it seems to me there can be no question that a specific tax applied to a specific purpose would be a lighter burden than a tax upon the general consumption of the country, and that it would avoid some of the more important objections to a system of high duties on imports, but if adopted, for one I can see no reason why it should not be adopted for all.

The encouragement by Government aid of home manufactures and home productions is one thing, and the methods by which it shall be done is another. The manner in which a tax shall be levied and the appropriation of it, and the reasons which govern each, are as distinct as any two things in nature.

One important difference between the two methods, that of direct appropriation and that of protection by a duty on imports, will be found in the free competition which the direct appropriation permits under the system of duties.

When you have stimulated the home production, or when you have created the domestic competition which may produce its natural effects, when you have produced it to such an extent as you desire, it is true it will have its effect upon the value of the thing produced unless artificial combination or causes which are within the creation of man are intervened to check this natural and necessary result, but all this time the people will be paying an oppressive tax.

We have had a proposition to change the form in which this method of encouragement or this stimulus to the development of new employments is applied from a duty on imports to an appropriation in the form of a bounty for one production only, and that one sugar, the best revenue subject. As I said in the beginning of my remarks, I can see no difference in the constitutionality of the appropriation of this money in the shape of a bounty or in the levying of a tax directly or in duties on imports. It matters not which, for it derives its validity from the fact of its being a lawful object of the power of levying taxes and from the fact of its being within the power to regulate commerce as construed by all the early Presidents of the country and the founders of the Constitution. Therefore, as to its constitutionality I think there can be no objection.

I have failed to see what necessary relation there was between the imposition of a tax upon the entire consumption of a country and the encouragement of a particular industry or employment. Why tax the whole people and give an unlimited range of higher prices to the founder of a new industry? It has been done in all ages. It was done in Rome, is was done in Athens, it was done in Venice, it was done in Florence, and it is a well-established policy in our own country and in all European countries, but it produced that distinction of classes there, and it will produce it everywhere. It is a bounty larger than the necessities or purposes to be accomplished require, and it places the whole consumption, the whole demand within the control of particular persons, of the persons who engage in an industry; and although it may be true that this inducement may carry many into it, and thus create competition, it is also true that that competition may be limited, and yet the burden be continued indefinitely on the people of the country.

As to the duty on sugar, the question should be, for purposes of protection, whether or not the tax should be laid upon the consumers of sugar equally with the consumers of manufactured goods, of woolen or of cotton goods, or of iron manufactures, so as to afford an equal rate of protection to each. While that is true, the question of proportioning this taxation for the encouragement of these industries, if they are to be promoted equally, leaves the sugar tax and the sugar interest to stand or fall upon the line of equality and encouragement with those other interests, and makes special provision in the nature of a duty and a bounty for it, but no account being taken of the fact that if we are to have a revenue duty, this is a revenue article and most suitable, and as tea or coffee would be, and better for the purposes of collecting a revenue than any other article.

It is upon this ground that the high duty on sugar has always been maintained and successfully defended, and for the purposes of revenue and protection combined there can be no doubt that it may claim a right to be placed in the highest scale of duties; and if we are to consider the protective feature and its application to the case, it should be that sugar should stand upon this fair and just equality of protection with any other protected article. As to the question which of the two forms of taxation, the tax by a duty or the tax by a bounty, is the easier for the people, there can be no question whatever upon that subject.

Mr. Hamilton said in his article:

> Bounties are sometimes not only the best but the only proper expedient for uniting the encouragement of a new object of agriculture with that of a new object of manufacture. It is the interest of the farmer to have the production of the raw material promoted by counteracting the interference of the foreign material of the same kind. It is the interest of the manufacturer to have the material abundant and cheap. If prior to the domestic production of the material in sufficient quantity to supply the manufacturer on good terms a duty be laid upon the importation of it from abroad, with a view to promote the raising of it at home, the interest both of the farmer and manufacturer will be disserved. By either destroying the requisite supply or raising the price of the article beyond what can be afforded to be given for it by the conductor of an infant manufacture, it is abandoned or fails, and there being no domestic manufactories to create a demand for the raw material, which is raised by the farmer, it is in vain that the competition of the like foreign article may have been destroyed.

Mr. President, it is quite plain that these observations, in some respects at least, are well founded, and that so far as raising the price is concerned the appropriation of a bounty has no effect whatever except the indirect effect of stimulating production. Until that object is attained there is no increase of price levied upon the people of the country by the appropriation of the bounty. I can therefore see that it would be a wise thing if all this encouragement to industries—except in extreme cases where for reasons of public policy temporary exclusion or prohibition should be necessary—was in the shape of a specific appropriation, in the form of a bounty, for it would relieve the people of the country of this oppressive and uncertain cloud which hangs over them of an excessive price for the necessaries and comforts of life; and that is the danger to be apprehended. It is not in the wise and reasonable exercise of the power to encourage domestic industries, manufactures or others, by Government aid, which has become an established policy in this country, but in the abuse of that power; and Mr. Jefferson's idea, as interpreted by Mr. Madison in his letter alluding to Mr. Jefferson's opinion upon the subject, in insisting that the power to promote and encourage the development of manufactures and industries was that it should be exercised upon the revenue basis so as to save it from abuse, and, as he says, to have a moderate and fair and equal imposition upon every portion of the country.

Therefore this bill and its provisions in which this tariff on some articles is run up to the extent of 60 and 100 per cent. is an unwise one; it is an unreasonable taxation; it is an excessive taxation, and that limit should be carefully observed which will confine the protection afforded to these different industries to such limited protection as will induce and preserve a competition between the productions of foreign nations, not a disadvantageous competition, but a fair and a just competition, as Mr. Madison said, as Alexander Hamilton said, as Mr. Jefferson said, the principle of all economic laws being that of free industry and free interchange, limited and checked only to the extent necessary for the encouragement and the development of special and particular interests in a country.

When there shall be reciprocal trade; when the nations of the earth shall learn that these restrictions are in all cases and everywhere a barrier in the way of the general comfort and the greater abundance of everything to every individual; when the nations of the world shall have learned that in unrestricted commerce with each other and upon fair and just terms, regulated by proper, by equal conditions, that in that commerce lies the hope of the comfort and abundance of each individual, of the progress of the arts and the higher civilization of mankind—a system looking to that as the final result, but still preserving independence and prosperity by reasonable and limited encouragement in such form as will be least burdensome to the tax-payers, is the just application of this system, which has become a part of the traditional public policy of this Government, and which Mr. Madison in the article which I have read supports and defends.

I will not detain the Senate upon this subject further than to say that all the early Presidents adopted this view of this power in the Constitution and of its exercise, and maintained while it should be exercised for its protective effect and purposes, it should be limited to a low rate of duty, and such a rate as should not be prohibitory of trade and commerce. The whole authority of the early history of the country is to that effect and only to that effect.

There has been frequent assertion in the debate on this bill that the Democratic party was a free-trade party, and the Republican party for protection and a friend of American industries and the workingmen. It will be of some interest to consider the true distinction between these two parties, as given by Mr. Jefferson in a letter to Mr. Adams, in the philosophic calm and retirement of the honored old age of these two great men.

From his home in Monticello, under date of June 27, 1813, Jefferson wrote to John Adams as follows:

> Men have differed in opinion, and been divided into parties by these opinions, from the first origin of societies, and in all governments where they have been permitted freely to think and to speak. The same political parties which now agitate the United States have existed through all time. Whether the power of the people or that of the αριστοι should prevail, were questions which kept the states of Greece and Rome in eternal convulsions, as they now schismatize every people whose minds and mouths are not shut up by the gag of a despot. And, in fact, the terms of Whig and Tory belong to natural as well as to civil history. They denote the temper and constitution of mind of different individuals.
> To come to our own country, and to the times when you and I became first acquainted, we well remember the violent parties which agitated the old Congress and their bitter contests. There you and I were together, and the Jays and the Dickinsons and other anti-independents were arrayed against us. They cherished the monarchy of England, and we the rights of our countrymen. When our present Government was in the mew, passing from Confederation to Union, how bitter was the schism between the Feds and Antis. Here you and I were together again. For although for a moment separated by the Atlantic from the scene of action, I favored the opinion that nine States should confirm the Constitution, in order to secure it, and the others hold off until certain amendments, deemed favorable to freedom, should be made. I rallied in the first instant to the wiser proposition of Massachusetts, that all should confirm, and then all instruct their delegates to urge those amendments. The amendments were made, and all were reconciled to the Government. But as soon as it was put into motion the line of division was again drawn. We broke into two parties, each wishing to give the Government a different direction; the one to strengthen the most popular branch, the other the more permanent branches, and to extend their permanence. Here you and I separated for the first time, and as we had been longer than most others on the public theater, and our names therefore were more familiar to our countrymen, the party which considered you as thinking with them placed your name at their head; the other, for the same reason, selected mine.

The people on one side; the αριστοι, the few, the privileged, on the other. This seems to be the perpetual contentions from age to age. The Democratic party the party of the people—others the αριστοι. How wise is it that this distinction shall not be pressed too far, and that neither of the two great political parties of this country shall be characterized as against the people by the laws which they enact. The taxing power, the grant of benefits by law to individuals for public purposes, real or pretended, while it has always been public policy in every state, has always been the ultimate cause of ruin to all governments, both free and despotic, because of its natural tendency to excessive and oppressive taxation in the interest of privileged classes and not for public objects. It will be wise in the Republican party, now controlling the public policy of this country, that this bill shall not be of this character, but that it shall largely reduce the oppressive and unnecessary taxation under which the people are now suffering. In all wise governments taxes should be imposed in such way as will be least burdensome to the people, and the chief object of every tax should be the collection of revenue. Therefore it was that in the early history of the country the protective effect of a tax, a duty, was regarded as the incident, and revenue as the object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VANCE. I offer the proviso which I send to the desk to come in at the close of the amendment just adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add:

> Provided, That no article mentioned in this paragraph and paragraph 172 shall pay a greater rate of duty than 65 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. VANCE. That is the rate that the Senators on the other side estimate the amount of duty under the amendment to the substitute just adopted would average. I propose to confine it to that, for the reason that the same kind of articles, as already explained, of the cheaper kind are over 100 per cent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE].

Mr. VANCE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. DAWES (when Mr. HOAR'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. HOAR] and the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] are paired.

Mr. PAYNE (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague [Mr. SHERMAN], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BLODGETT], but I am entirely willing that a transfer of the pair shall be made in order to keep up a quorum. If at liberty to vote, I should vote for the committee bill right straight through.

Mr. TURPIE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], and therefore decline to vote.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HALE. My pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is transferred to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], and I vote "nay."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota has voted.

Mr. HALE. I understood the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] to announce a pair with the Senator from Minnesota, and I arranged with the Senator from Indiana to transfer it.

Mr. TURPIE. I was not aware that the Senator from Minnesota had voted. Is his name recorded?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is recorded in the negative.

Mr. TURPIE. Then I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HALE. I withdraw my vote, and my pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] will stand.

Mr. CULLOM. I am paired with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], and will not cast my vote.

Mr. ALLISON. In the confusion I inadvertently voted, forgetting that I was paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. I now take the liberty of transferring that pair to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] and the pair has been transferred, as stated by the Senator from Iowa, and I now vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CALL (after having voted in the affirmative). I inadvertently voted. I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN].

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Florida that he transfer his pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], who is absent.

Mr. CALL. I will do that if there is no objection, and permit my vote to stand.

Mr. BATE. The junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. CULLOM. I understand the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] is absent and not paired. I will therefore transfer my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] to the Senator from Oregon, and vote "nay."

Mr. CHACE. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT]. If he were present he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I am advised that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] is not present, and that my pair has been transferred to him. If that be the case, I vote "nay."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia will be recorded in the negative.

Mr. EVARTS. I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. DANIEL. I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL]. If he were here, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS. I call the attention of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] to the fact that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] has just announced a pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL].

Mr. CULLOM. Then I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 23; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLISON. May I inquire of the Chair if paragraph 172 has been read? I have it marked as "passed over." I move to amend it by striking out "20" and inserting "15," in line 730.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paragraph has been read, and the amendment, in line 730, to strike out "20" and insert "15" is now pending.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for action on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 115, paragraph 172, line 730, after the word "pieces," it is proposed to strike out "20" and insert "15;" so as to read:

172. Table-knives, forks, steels, and all carving, butchers', cooks', hunting, kitchen, bread, butter, vegetable, fruit, cheese, plumbers', painters', palette, and artists' knives of all sizes, finished or unfinished, valued at not more than $1 per per dozen pieces, 15 cents per dozen; valued at more than $1 and not more than $3, 50 cents per dozen; valued at more than $3 and not more than $8, $1 per dozen; valued at more than $8, $2 per dozen; and in addition upon all the above-named articles 30 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 117, paragraph 181, I move an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In paragraph 181, line 760, page 117, it is proposed to strike out all after the word "guns" and insert:

Valued at not more than $6 each, $2 each; valued at more than $6 and not more than $12 each, $4 each; valued at more than $12 each, $6 each; and in addition thereto on all the above 35 per cent. ad valorem.

Single-barrel breech-loading shotguns, $1 each and 35 per cent. ad valorem.

Revolving pistols, valued at not more than $1.50 each, 40 cents each; valued at more than $1.50, $1 each; and in addition thereto on all the above pistols 35 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Paragraph 174 was passed over in the reading.

Mr. ALLISON. Let that be taken up, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paragraph will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

174. Gold-leaf, $2 per package of five hundred leaves.

Mr. ALLISON. I find paragraph 289 was passed over. Has that paragraph been read, I inquire? I have it marked as "passed over."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

Mr. HISCOCK. Was the amendment to paragraph 174 agreed to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was no amendment to paragraph 174. It was read and no amendment proposed.

Mr. ALLISON. I will ask if paragraph 289 has been read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

Mr. VANCE. It was not read originally, being passed over by request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So the Chair understood. It will now be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

289. Salt.—Salt in bags, sacks, barrels, or other packages, 12 cents per 100 pounds; in bulk, 8 cents per 100 pounds: Provided, That exporters of meats, whether packed or smoked, which have been cured in the United States with imported salt shall, upon satisfactory proof, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, that such meats have been cured with imported salt, have refunded to them from the Treasury the duties paid on the salt so used in curing such exported meats, in amounts not less than $100: And provided further, That imported salt in bond may be used in curing fish taken by vessels licensed to engage in curing fish on the shores of the navigable waters of the United States, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; and upon proof that the salt has been used for either of the purposes stated in this proviso the duties on the same shall be remitted.

Mr. ALLISON. That paragraph being read, I ask that paragraph 287, which I think was passed over without reading, be now read.

Mr. VEST. What was done with paragraph 289?

Mr. ALLISON. Nothing. It stands in the bill. I have no amendment to offer to it.

Mr. VANCE. We have made our record upon free salt while discussing the amendments on the free-list.

Mr. ALLISON. The record has been fully made up, I think, on the salt question.

Mr. VANCE. Yes, sir.

The Secretary read as follows:

287. Rice.—Cleaned, 1 cent per pound; uncleaned rice and rice flour and meal, one-half of 1 cent per pound; rice, broken, which will pass through a sieve known commercially as No. 12 wire sieve, and paddy, one-fourth of 1 cent per pound.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I desire to offer a substitute for that paragraph, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the figures "287" it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert:

Rice.—Cleaned, 2½ cents per pound; uncleaned, 1½ cents; paddy, 1½ cents. Broken rice or rice-flour which will pass through a sieve, commercially known as No. 12 wire sieve, 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, in providing revenue for this Government, I wouldnot collect a dollar not needed by the Government by any character or form of taxation for the purpose of protecting any American interest, either of capital or labor.

In other words, I would never collect by taxation a dollar not needed by the Government to protect any industry or anybody. I am not, therefore, a protectionist per se. But in the proper adjustment of the tariff I am a strong protectionist. Say the Government must raise $350,000,000 a year for its economical support and to meet its obligations, which is about what will be necessary, I suppose, for the ensuing year. Now, I would raise this sum and all other sums necessary to the economical support of the Government by tariff taxation at the custom-houses, and I would repeal absolutely the internal-revenue laws, with all their abominations, iniquities, oppressions, and domiciliary vexations.

In raising the money by tariff taxation for the economical support of the Government I would so adjust it as to give all the reasonable protection in my power to American capital and American labor, in preference to foreign capital and foreign labor. I would generally admit such articles as are raised in foreign countries and are not raised in this country duty free, because the tariff assessed upon articles of this character could protect nobody in this country, as nobody here either raises or manufactures such articles.

TEA AND COFFEE FREE.

For instance, I would put tea and coffee on the free-list. We can raise neither tea nor coffee in this country to any profitable extent, and we certainly can not raise coffee. Therefore, the tariff imposed upon coffee or tea would protect no American capital and no American labor, as neither American capital nor American labor is employed in the culture of either commodity.

PROTECTION FOR WOOL AND COTTON FABRICS.

It follows, therefore, that I would impose the tax upon such articles imported from abroad as are produced in this country, so as to give to American capital invested, and American labor employed in producing such articles, whatever protection may result from the tariff imposed upon such articles. While I would put coffee and tea on the free-list, I would put manufactured fabrics, both of wool and cotton, and other like commodities, upon the dutiable-list, because, while wool and cotton are manufactured abroad and the product introduced into this country, wool and cotton are also manufactured in this country, and there is at least an incidental protection to the manufacturer of wool or cotton when a tariff is imposed upon those commodities imported from abroad; and this incidental protection is advantageous to the American manufacturers until the encouragement afforded them by tariff taxation has built up enough of establishments in our country to produce all the commodities of that character which are needed by our people. In other words, until the home competition has regulated the price independently of the tariff law or the foreign importation; or till our factories have reached a point where competition among themselves regulates prices.

It has been said in ridicule, that our infant industries in this country are now hoary with old age, that the New England factories are almost as old as the English factories, and that it is a deception when it is claimed that they must be aided by the Government as infant industries.

SOUTHERN INDUSTRIES ARE YOUNG AND NEED PROTECTION.

It is not my purpose at present to discuss the question as to the age or maturity of New England factories. It is enough for me to know that they are much further advanced than the manufacturing industries of the South. In other words, if the manufacturing interests of New England have passed the stage of infancy and reached mature manhood, it can not be denied that in the main the industries of the South are still in their infancy and need protection. It is only since the abolition of slavery that the spirit of development has taken hold of the South, and manufacturing interests are springing up in every direction.

The high protective tariff, as it is usually called, has been a main motive power in producing this result; and while there may be some few articles, as in case of coarse cotton cloths, that can be manufactured successfully without the protection growing out of tariff taxation, in the main it is not so, and it is only a question with us whether we shall continue a high tariff as it is termed, and continue to build up under it until the Southern manufacturers have large investments in their establishments, have skilled labor, and are prepared to compete with New England and with Old England, and have built up home markets for our planters. The infant industries of this country so far as the manufacturers are concerned are to be found mainly in the South, and that section of this Union is more interested to-day in maintaining the doctrine of reasonable incidental protection, both in theory and in practice, than any other section of this Union.

Repeal the tariff and strike down the protection now afforded to the Southern manufacturing industries in their infancy, and they will fall with a general crash, and our people will be remitted back to the position of planters and farmers, who must buy their manufactured articles from New England, which is further advanced and has more capital, and from Old England, which is still more hoary with age and better supplied with capital and skilled labor. As a Southern Senator, therefore, I protest against such legislation as will destroy or seriously cripple the great manufacturing interests of my own section, which, if sustained, are soon to become the leading wealth-producing agencies of that great section of the Union.

Strike down the factories of various characters and those now engaged in operating them must seek other employment, and as nothing else would offer, they will be obliged to return to the cultivation of the soil. Take a half million of people out of the factories and out of the different mines and other branches of industry and put them in the cotton and corn fields and you will produce a larger supply of these commodities than is needed for home consumption and a larger supply than can find ready market abroad.

You would therefore reduce the price of the farmer's production by increasing the quantity produced beyond the necessary consumption. On the other hand, if you can induce half a million more of the population of the South to leave the agricultural fields and go into manufacturing, to that extent you lessen the amount of agricultural production, and you to that extent increase the price paid the farmers for the smaller quantity which will be produced and put upon the market. I desire that the people of my State and my section shall diversify their interest and their labor as much as possible and build up a healthy industry and healthy competition in every department. To do this we must continue to give reasonable protection to our infant or youthful industries.

NEW ENGLAND'S EXAMPLE.

It is said that New England has made immense sums of money and grown very rich by the benefits of protection in manufacturing. If New England has made enormous sums of money by her manufacturing industries, and the South, as will be admitted, has a more genial climate, more water-power, and more coal for steam purposes, with immensely greater natural resources than New England, why should not the South imitate the example of New England and move forward energetically and grandly on the same line until she has accumulated much greater wealth than New England has been able to amass?

New England manufacturers may have not only grown rich, but her manufacturing establishments in towns and cities have also enriched her agricultural population by affording a ready home market for their productions at the highest price, and very greatly enhancing the value of their plantations and other real estate. Instead of sitting down and complaining that our neighbors are growing rich, let us adopt the same line of policy that has made them rich, and press forward until we have built up our own section in wealth and power as one of the most favored in the United States.

I think I may safely say that no section of the Union is making as rapid strides in development and in the establishment of factories of all characters as the Southern States.

PROTECTION VALUABLE TO THE SOUTH.

Without the protection afforded by the tariff laws this rapid development would have been impossible. Therefore no section of the Union has been for a number of years or is likely to be as much benefited by protection as the Southern section. No section has so much dependent upon the continuation of protection for its future prosperity and development.

PROTECTION FOR THE RICE INDUSTRY.

But, Mr. President, I intended to confine myself mainly to the rice culture, and to the tariff upon rice. It may be said that rice culture is not an infant industry. Rice as cultivated by slave labor was an old industry and a profitable one, but rice cultivated by free labor is an infant industry, and one that is not able without protection to sustain itself. What will be the result of permitting it to be crushed out by withdrawing the necessary protection? None other than the re-establishment of a monopoly in the hands of the Asiatic rice-planters, who will control our market and dictate their own prices so soon as our planters have been driven to abandon the business. This I will illustrate before I close my remarks.

I will now address myself more particularly to the rice interests involved in the debate. The present duty on cleaned rice is 2½ cents per pound; on uncleaned rice, 1½ cents; on paddy, 1½ cents; on granulated rice, 20 per cent. ad valorem.

The Mills bill proposes to reduce the tariff on cleaned rice to 2 cents per pound, on uncleaned rice to 1½ cents, on paddy to 1 cent, and on granulated rice to 15 per cent. ad valorem. The Senate bill now under consideration proposes to reduce cleaned rice to 1 cent per pound; uncleaned rice and rice flour and meal, one-half of 1 cent per pound; rice broken, which will pass through a sieve, known commercially as No. 12 wire sieve, and paddy, one-fourth of 1 cent per pound.

As a justification for this ruinous reduction it is claimed that rice is an agricultural production, and that the present tariff on rice is much higher than the tariff on any other agricultural production, and that it ought therefore to be reduced. We must not forget, however, that cleaned rice in the market ready for use is not only an agricultural production, but a manufactured product. Let us see what are the different stages through which it passes. The rough rice, or grain with the chaff on, as it is thrashed from the straw, is called paddy. The grain having the outer chaff removed, but with the inner cuticle and flour remaining on it, is called uncleaned rice.

The grain, after it has been run through the proper machinery, and the inner cuticle and flour which is on the grain in the rough state are removed, and the grain has been polished, is called cleaned rice. It is then fit for food. It costs about 28 per cent. of the value of the paddy to clean with proper machinery and prepare for market the rough rice.

The other class of rice upon which there is at present a tariff of 20 per cent. ad valorem is known as granulated rice, which is the rice that is broken or crushed in the cleaning or otherwise, and is not suitable for family use, but is used mostly by the brewers.

WHY RICE SHOULD BE ESPECIALLY PROTECTED.

The fact that it costs 28 per cent. of the value of the paddy to prepare it in the proper mills for use, shows clearly that rice is not an ordinary article of agricultural production. It is more than that. It is an agricultural production manufactured into the proper condition for use, the cost of manufacturing being more than one-fourth of the value. For this reason, if for no other, it ought to be made an exception to the general rule applicable to agricultural productions.

But there is another cogent reason why the rule or per cent. of tariff applying to other home productions should not apply to rice. The reason grows out of the necessary exception which exists in the case of the culture of rice. In the preparation of the soil and the mode of culture it is not like other crops, and it is much more subject to disaster than the ordinary crops. The great bulk of our rice is grown on reclaimed swamp land, which has to be traversed in every direction by banks, canals, and ditches. Most of this work is necessarily performed by hand labor, and not by machinery. Embankments have to be built and kept in repair, and the canals and ditches kept open with a spade. They are obliged to be opened at least once a year, and probably oftener. The cultivation of rice is done mainly with a hoe, and it is harvested with a sickle. The nature of the production and the exceptional style of its culture forbid to any considerable extent the use of machinery in its cultivation.

Our most intelligent rice-planters, in connection with our most skilled mechanics, have for years studied the problem of the application of machinery to rice culture, and with the exception of horse-power used in drilling or planting the rice and the ordinary machinery used in thrashing the grain or paddy from the straw, the culture must be conducted by hand labor entirely.

After the crop is made it is prepared for market in rice-mills, with appropriate machinery for cleansing the rough rice. The machinery for preparing the rice is, however, very expensive.

There is nearly half a million dollars invested in rice-mills in Savannah, and a still larger sum in New Orleans and Charleston. But you may ask why is it necessary to reclaim swamp lands and to cut canals and ditches and build embankments all through the rice-fields. The reply is that the crop passes through certain periods when it must necessarily be flooded to make a successful crop, and at other periods the water must be drawn off, and the hand culture to which I have referred must be applied. To use the water by letting it on when it is needed, and draining it off when it is not needed, main ditches or canals, and side ditches, with draws and gates, must be provided, that the water may be used according to the exigencies of the crop.

If a freshet occurs in the river or stream upon which the land is located at any critical period of the crop, and breaks the dams and overflows the land, the crop is ruined. Besides, it is subject to several other contingencies that may very seriously interfere with its success.

But it may be said if the rice crop is subject to so many contingencies, why not abandon it, and raise other farm products on the lands known as rice lands, where the rice crop is now cultivated? Many of our most intelligent planters, and as a class no other is more intelligent, are anxiously desiring to find some means of using their rice lands to advantage in the cultivation of other crops less uncertain. But it is found impossible to do so. The lands used for rice culture, as already stated, are swamp lands. They are very rich, but they lie very low, and they lack the necessary fall to drain them sufficiently for other crops.

The rice crop can be best produced on such land because it needs flooding at different periods of the culture and does best on low, damp land. In a word, the lands in question, and there are large tracts of them, seem by nature to have been better adapted to rice culture than to the culture of any other crop.

RICE DEMANDS AT LEAST 2 CENTS A POUND TARIFF.

I am informed by some of our most intelligent rice-planters who are gentlemen of honor and veracity, that taking the run of the seasons one with another, and counting good crops and bad crops, it actually costs them 4 cents a pound to produce and prepare for the market the entire rice crop of the South, and that in this calculation no estimate is made for the interest on the money invested in the plantation, but that is the actual cost, taking one year with another, of the rice on the plantation and preparing it for the market.

If this be true, and I have no doubt about the fact, then the planters of the South must be protected by a tariff high enough to prevent foreign planters from bringing their crops into our markets and selling them for less than 4 cents a pound. It has been claimed by some persons that our rice is of superior quality and therefore does not need protection to the extent that would make foreign rice in the market cost as much per pound as ours costs.

I am informed that in fact a great deal of the foreign rice is every way the equal of ours. There is nothing in the soil, climate, or culture of China that causes the rice there to be inferior to ours. Sometimes it is damaged by the long voyage at sea, which those in charge of it have to make to reach our ports, but this applies only to sailing-vessels, and as the growing tendency is towards steam transportation, that difficulty will doubtlessly very soon be overcome. Then our tariff must make foreign rice cost the consumer as much in the market as it costs our planters to make rice and prepare it for the market, or our planters must abandon the business and retire from the field of competition, and rice culture in the United States must come to an end.

What are the facts as to the cost of foreign rice laid down in our ports? According to the United States Treasury reports, the import value of the average foreign clean rice is 2 cents per pound. The actual cost counting no interest on the plantation of the average American rice is, say, 4 cents per pound. The present tariff is 2½ cents per pound. This gives the American planter one-fourth of 1 cent per pound the advantage in the market. The Mills bill proposes to reduce the tariff to 2 cents a pound. This puts foreign rice and home-produced rice in the market on terms of equality so far as price is concerned. In other words, the price of home and foreign rice in the market would be the same, each 4 cents per pound after the tariff was put upon the foreign rice. The Senate bill proposes to reduce cleaned rice to 1 cent a pound. This gives an advantage to the foreign importer who pays the tariff of 1 cent a pound in the market, which must inevitably drive the American planter out of the business.

But it may be asked why this great difference exists, as the Southern planters prior to the war produced rice as cheaply as it was produced anywhere, that they held the home market almost exclusively to themselves on a 20 per cent. ad valorem duty, and that they furnished a large part of the European supply. This, I understand, is true. With slave labor the Southern planter produced rice almost as cheaply as it could be produced in China, and with the advantage of distance, the transportation being then conducted by sail vessels, and the occasional injury to rice during the long voyage, they were able to compete successfully and hold their own market. Now the whole matter is changed. Slave labor can no longer be used in the cultivation of rice. White men as a rule can not work in the rice plantations in the summer any considerable length of time without being down with fever. Colored labor only is adapted to the culture, and large numbers of our colored people who as slaves labored on the rice plantations have left them and gone into other pursuits, and it is difficult, many a time, for the planters to secure the necessary labor to cultivate the crop.

I am informed by Hon. Houstoun Clinch, a highly intelligent and honorable rice-planter of Savannah, Ga., that the wages paid day laborers on the rice plantations vary from 40 to 60 cents. Their work is not computed by the hour, but by the amount done (the task), and is mostly done by women. The more active hands have generally completed their task by mid-day, and it is seldom that they are at work as late as 2 o'clock p. m. The foremen, carpenters, teamsters, and trunk-minders are hired by the year. They work as farm laborers do elsewhere, from sunrise to sunset, with the usual intermission for meals. They receive from one hundred and eighty to three hundred dollars a year, with rations, a house, and land to cultivate, free of cost, when they are not serving the employer.

As a rule they each own a horse, and most of them some cattle and hogs, as do the day laborers, who usually reside on and cultivate places of their own in the vicinity of the large plantations. Take the day laborer who gets 40 cents a day. This, counting three hundred days to the year, would be $120 per annum. The day laborer who gets 60 cents a day receives $180 per annum. The class of foremen, carpenters, teamsters, and trunk-minders get $300 per annum, making the average say about $180 per annum which the rice-planter pays each laborer.

And I am informed by Col. John Scriven, one of the most distinguished rice-planters in the Southern country, that 75 per cent. of the whole cost of raising the rice and preparing it for market is the cost of the labor. Colonel Scriven has been for forty years a rice-planter and has looked into this question with great care, and doubtless speaks with great accuracy. The cost of labor in Georgia per annum in the rice plantation is therefore an average of say $180 per annum. The rice-planter comes in competition with the laborers of China and other Eastern countries where the imported rice is raised.

RICE LABOR FAR HIGHER IN AMERICA THAN IN CHINA.

Now let us see what is the difference between the price paid in Georgia for labor on the rice-fields and the price paid in China. We learn from the report of the United States minister at Peking (Reports from Consuls of the United States, September, 1887, No. 83, page 498), that labor in the rice-fields of China is paid about as follows: The average wages of an able-bodied young man is $12 per annum, with food, straw shoes, and free shaving. Deducting $4 for his clothing, he saves $8 only, or may do so. Ten years' saving will enable him to buy one-third of an acre of land, value per acre, $150, and necessary implements by which he can obtain by his own labor a subsistence. In twenty years he can become possessor of two-thirds of an acre and one-third of a buffalo, and with six years' more saving he may purchase a wife, with whose assistance he can maintain himself on his own land, in his own hut, and rear children.

In Japan field hands receive their food and lodging with wages from $8.60 to $12.96 per annum. The wages of females are about $6 per annum. (See the United States Consular Reports, No. 48, December, 1884, page 732.) In British India we learn from the British Indian famine report, 1871–'81, that in Delhi labor is paid for—males, per diem, 6 cents; for females, 1½ cents.

Colonel Scriven, to whom reference is already made as a distinguished rice-planter, estimates the cost of a hand on his rice plantation at $168 per annum, while the wages of a hand in China, as already stated, is $12 per annum.

AMERICAN RICE LABOR FOURTEEN TIMES HIGHER THAN ASIATIC.

Colonel Scriven says:

The American is therefore paid fourteen times more than the Asiatic laborer, and his wages constitute 75 per cent. of the field cost. If the difference in the cost of production should be the measure of protection, it is clear that the present duty on rice is not only not excessive, but in fact inadequate. Any alleged excess is only in sound, and this is amply substantiated by the fact that 36 per cent. of the rice consumed in the United States in the past five years is Asiatic and Hawaiian. There is nothing prohibitory in the present duty. It merely equalizes the prime cost of introducing the Asiatic and producing the American rice.

After that the ordinary elements governing the price of commodities will fix the price of each kind.

If, then, the rule agreed to by both political parties in their platforms, that the difference in the cost of introduction and of production should be the measure of protection, it is clear that the present duty on rice is not as high as it ought to be, and the provision in the Mills bill which cuts off a quarter of a cent a pound is erroneous and improper, and the provision in the Senate bill which will cut down cleaned rice to a cent a pound is a ruinous stab at rice culture in the United States.

The Senate substitute, if passed, reduces the tariff on cleaned rice from 2¼ cents to 1 cent per pound. On uncleaned rice from 1½ to one-half a cent per pound. And it proposes to reduce paddy from 1½ to one-quarter of 1 cent per pound, or to one-fifth of the present tariff. I believe this is the heaviest and most ruinous reduction proposed by the bill on any commodity. The bill proposes to take off four-fifths of the present tariff on paddy, while it increases other articles over 100 per cent. Why this fatal stab at this struggling agricultural interest? Why should a Republican Senate crush it by withholding the protection indispensable to its existence?

I am aware that there are patriotic gentlemen who would say in this case, as they say in case of any other protection of American capital or American industry, that if the business can not sustain itself without high protection, it should be left to its fate, and our planters reduced to bankruptcy, should be compelled to discontinue their business.

Intelligent persons may without emotion speak of striking down a great American industry, rather than afford the protection necessary to its very existence. What will be the effect of such a policy when carried out? Let the experience of the people of the United States, and especially of the Northern section of the Union, within the last twenty-five years, answer the question.

THE LESSON OF THE WAR AS TO RICE PROTECTION.

Prior to the war, rice-planters, with slave labor, were able to make all the rice needed by the people of the United States, who were much less numerous then than now, and to sell the rice at from two to four dollars per 100 pounds.

The dark clouds of war gathered in our horizon, and the storm burst upon the country in 1861. The fortunes of war and the superior strength of one of the contending parties soon environed the Southern States in a blockade, and commerce between the two sections was virtually prohibited. Many of the negroes were taken from the rice plantations by their owners, under order of the military, and instead of cultivating rice were employed in building fortifications. The rice fields were greatly neglected, and no more rice was made than was necessary to supply the needs of the Confederacy. The result was that the Northern people could not get rice from the South, either for their daily use, as a necessity or luxury, and they could not even get it for their army hospitals. What was the result? The Asiatic planters very soon discovered the advantage which they possessed, and the price of rice was at once raised in our market, and it went upward and upward until it reached at last $14 per 100 pounds, and in exceptional cases $15.50 per 100 pounds, which was paid by the American people, and especially the Northern section of the American people, for rice, whether used for daily subsistence, or luxury, or in the hospitals.

PROTECTION CHECKS FOREIGN EXTORTION.

By reference to the American Almanac for 1888, which gives a tabulated statement of the price in New York for each year from 1825 until 1886, inclusive, a period of sixty-one years, it will be seen that the average price for the first thirty-seven years was $3.75 per hundred pounds. And from 1861 to 1869, when the market of New York was supplied almost exclusively by foreign rice, the price averaged 9.83½ cents, or nearly $10 per hundred pounds. The difference between $3.75, the average price paid for thirty-seven years, and within a fraction of $10 per hundred pounds, the price paid for eight years, including the war period, is very marked. Foreigners were taking their revenge, or rather reaping their harvest, growing out of our folly in destroying at home this great interest.

Strike down the present tariff upon rice, or strike it down so low that it will destroy the culture, and it will be but a few years till rice will again reach in our market $10 per hundred pounds and possibly run to a higher figure. It is much cheaper therefore to deal justly by this great interest and give it such protection as will keep it in existence and interpose it as a constant barrier to the extortions of foreign rice-planters, who, if our culture is destroyed, will have us perpetually at their mercy, as they will then have a monopoly of the business and can dictate their own terms.

PRACTICAL IDEAS CONNECTED WITH RICE CULTURE.

Before concluding my remarks I desire to present some points taken from the report made by a committee of planters to the Rice Association of Savannah, which was prepared with a great deal of care. In doing so I shall adopt the ideas presented in the report and shall make no apology for the reproduction of it, though it may be done partly in the very language used by the committee itself. They speak of three periods in the rice culture.

The first extended down to the year 1860, or the commencement of the war. With the year 1860 ended the first period, which was distinctive in the absence of the importation of foreign rice, in maximum home production, in low prices, and in exportation, which controlled the markets of foreign countries and made them large contributors to American prosperity and wealth.

The second period began in 1861 and ended in 1866, with characteristics the reverse of those which distinguished the first period. In 1860 there was no import of foreign rice, and the export of domestic rice reached 75,373,000 pounds; but in 1861, the first year of the Confederate war, there were imported 148,550 pounds, and there were exported 39,683,000 pounds. The blockade of the Southern ports was begun in 1861, and from this time the Government record of domestic rice could have been partial only, and therefore affords no criterion of the amount of production or of the capacity of the country to export for that year. But the following year, 1862, the statistics are decisive; domestic production and consumption of the domestic product were almost exclusively confined to the Southern States, and the Government statistics show that in 1862 there were imported 56,961,317 pounds of foreign rice and that there were exported only 3,552,000 pounds, the latter being doubtless foreign rice reshipped for lack of a market.

THE GREAT GROWTH OF FOREIGN RICE IMPORTS.

In the first year of the third period, 1865–'66, the domestic production was 11,592,600 pounds, and the foreign rice imported was 60,407,756 pounds. As early as the fifth year the domestic production, under a tariff of 2½ cents per pound, had swelled to 53,937,000 pounds, showing an increase of nearly 365 per cent., indeed overlapping the foreign importation; but still the gross importation (292,909,944 pounds) in the first five years exceeds the gross domestic production (which was 119,122,120 pounds) by 183,780,824 pounds.

These facts show conclusively that the consumption of the foreign import has greatly increased, though not in the same volume, as that of the domestic product; but it is clear that at no time since 1866 has the duty been so onerous as to impede the demand for foreign rice, or to prevent its importation, while a large surplus is always in bond in the United States custom-houses held against any exigencies of the market, and decisively restricting the price of American rice. It has been seen that the domestic production increased 130 per cent. in twenty years from 1840 to 1860.

During this period the duty on foreign rice was 20 per cent. ad valorem. In all the rice-producing division of the country slave labor was then employed, and no foreign rice was imported; quite contrary to the present experience, when so little domestic rice is exported as to be inappreciable in the marketing of the crops. More than 147,000,000 pounds were exported in 1850, and 112,000,000 pounds in 1860. In the former year the average price of rice in the New York market was $3.18½, in the latter year $4.20 per hundred pounds. The average price of the whole period from 1850 to 1860 was materially increased by the great storm of 1854, which swept away a greater part of the crop of that year, and by the draft made on the labor of the South Atlantic States by the emigration to the West and the Southwest.

But it may be stated as an evidence of the cheapness of production, not long anterior to this period, that in January, 1854, prime rice sold in the Savannah market for $1.50 to $1.75 per hundred pounds.

The per diem of slave labor did not much, if at all, exceed 20 cents, and on this basis the cost of cultivating rice was about 110 cents per hundred.

In 1862 the importation of foreign rice was 56,961,317 pounds. Except for the internal supply of the Southern States the cultivation of rice was then rapidly diminishing. The rice-fields, which lay chiefly in the great tidal deltas, the first to be reached in the military operations against the South, were soon laid waste and abandoned. The planters retreated with their slaves into the interior. The result was that in 1865 the crop had dwindled from 187,000,000 pounds in 1860, with an exportation of 75,000,000 pounds, to 12,000,000 pounds production, with an importation of 45,000,000 pounds. Indeed, the importation for 1864 was nearly 100,000,000 pounds and the production naught.

FOREIGN RICE CAPTURED OUR COUNTRY.

In short, Asiatic rice had taken entire possession of the American markets, except within the Confederate military lines, and at this time, despite the immense volume of importations, the price in the New York market ranged as high as from $12 to $14.50, and in some exceptional instances as high as fifteen to sixteen dollars per hundred. The duty on cleaned rice had been raised in 1862 to 1½ cents per pound. In 1864 it was again increased, to 2½ cents per pound.

This duty was imposed in time of war, but why may it not be continued in time of peace? In time of war it was contributory to the cost of the war, but it was also a tax on a foreign monopoly. In time of peace it remains a tax on a foreign imported commodity undiminished in volume, and contributory to the maintenance of the Government, while it is a necessary prevention against the re-establishment of a foreign monopoly and a protection alike to the American producer and consumer. At no time since 1865 could rice have been cultivated as a staple product without the protection afforded by the import duty on foreign grain.

In 1885 the inland rice crop and those on the short streams of South Carolina and Georgia were destroyed by excessive rains and inundations, and again in 1887 those on the greater streams, as the Savannah and Altamaha, were swept away by freshets; and from similar causes great losses were suffered in Louisiana; and on some longer streams, especially the Savannah, the freshet of 1888 has been still more destructive.

The main bulk of rice other than granulated has hitherto been brought into the United States from China at an import value of only 2 cents per pound, while the cost of the American product is not less than three and a half cents per pound without taking into consideration the peculiar hazards of the industry by freshets and otherwise, or the interest on the capital invested in lands and improvements. The present duty on cleaned rice is two and a quarter cents per pound, so that foreign rice should bring four and a quarter cents per pound. This leaves a very small margin to the American producer, all of which may be swept away in the signal casualties to which the rice-fields are peculiarly and always exposed.

Prior to the war, when we used slave labor, rice lands were worth from seventy-five to two hundred dollars per acre. Their value is now greatly reduced, and a large acreage, especially of lands most exposed to floods and storms, has been abandoned. This diminution of value and of acreage is not due to casualties alone, but in great degree to the impoverishment of the planters from other causes. The American producer labors, too, under the disadvantage of the import of rice free of duty from the Hawaiian Islands. Although it seems to me there is no adequate commercial benefit derived by the United States from the Hawaiian reciprocity treaty, an annual average of 9,000,000 pounds with a maximum of 12,000,000 pounds of rice has been imported in the past five years from those islands. Unlike the Asiatic rice annually remaining in bond, although approximating it in amount, the Hawaiian import is not only a check but a direct and unconditional participant in the freedom of the market pari passu with the home product, is produced by Asiatic labor, and shares none of the burdens of government borne by the home producer.

THE HOME RICE PRODUCT INCREASES.

Notwithstanding the disadvantages under which our rice-planters have labored, such has been their persistent effort that with the aid of the tariff an extraordinary increase in the home product in twenty-one years has been seen. Since the culture was resumed in 1865–'66, it has sprung from about 12,000,000 pounds to 156,000,000 pounds annually. This has been accompanied by a decline in prices so marked as to correspond with those existing for several years anterior to the war. These conditions have resulted from the adjustment of the import tax so as to encourage the home industry without discouraging the foreign import. Remaining undiminished, the duty forbids monopoly to either.

Diminished so as to become ineffective as a means of healthy growth to the domestic industry, the domestic competition will be weakened and finally abandoned, and monopoly practically created in favor of the foreign product. When such a foreign monopoly existed, from 1863 to 1866, the prices of rice were higher than had ever been known in its history before or since in this country. Such consequences following upon an import duty ineffective to promote the home industry, its abandonment may be expected, and the lands remanded to nature.

There are now cultivated in rice, approximately, 200,000 acres of rich lands, yielding 156,000,000 pounds of commercial rice per annum, and supporting a laboring population alone of about 200,000 persons, without including proprietors, mill-men, mercantile agents, and others engaged in the commercial organism of the rice industry. Abandonment would entail great suffering upon all of these, but most upon the proprietors and laborers; upon the former a total loss of investment, for, extraordinary as it may appear, experience has demonstrated that the rice lands of the tidal regions are incapable of any other profitable culture. On the laborers, now sufficiently tried, before a generation has survived the throes of recent emancipation, such a change would fall with cruel severity.

CONCLUSION.

Mr. President, in the name of a liberal and just incidental protection; in the name of one of the most useful branches of industry in the whole country; in the name of a large number of honorable, intelligent, and useful citizens, who in former days and under different circumstances have in good faith invested their money in this great interest, and in the name of two hundred thousand men, women, and children (a large proportion of them colored citizens of the United States) engaged in this culture, who would be turned out of employment without the means of making a comfortable support, and in the name of the whole people of every section of the Union, who would be injured by the re-establishment of the Asiatic rice monopoly, which would more than double the price to the consumer, I protest against any legislation which strikes down or seriously cripples the production of this indispensable and very valuable commodity and brings ruin alike to the capital invested and the labor employed.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is especially unfortunate, I think, that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], who addressed the Senate on this subject the other day, is now absent from his seat, as there seems to be a radical difference of opinion between these representatives of two rice-producing States as to the necessity of protection on this article. The Senator from South Carolina stated the other day that there was no necessity for any duty on it, that it could be produced as cheaply here as anywhere in the world, while the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] now thinks that the present rate, which is 113 per cent. ad valorem, is inadequate for the protection of rice in the State of Georgia. Perhaps this item had better go over until we see whether an agreement can not be reached as to the facts between the Senators specially interested in the question.

Mr. EUSTIS. Do I understand the Senator from Rhode Island to suggest that we do not take a vote on this to-night?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think it would be better not to take a vote on it until the Senator from South Carolina can be present.

Mr. ALLISON. If we can have an understanding that this matter may go over until Monday morning I should like to offer a few amendments that will not, probably, be specially objected to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DAWES in the chair). Is there objection to letting the rice matter go over? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ALLISON. In paragraph 107, on page 98, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. In paragraph 107, on page 98, under the heading "Glass," it is proposed to amend as follows: In lines 286, 287, 289, 291, and 292, strike out the word "plain" wherever it occurs in those lines, and in line 290, after the word "lime," insert "bottle."

Mr. HARRIS. How will the paragraph read as amended?

Mr. ALLISON. It simply strikes out the word "plain." It will mean glass bottles. The word "plain" there is liable to two constructions. It was intended to cover the ordinary glassware, but a plain bottle might have an initial or a name upon it and still be plain glassware in the sense of the original proposition.

Mr. HARRIS. Very well.

Mr. ALLISON. It is only to make more certain the intent and purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In paragraph 158, line 669, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend paragraph 158 as follows: In line 669, after the word "from," insert "tin-plate or the;" in line 670, after the word "steel," insert "or tin-plate;" in line 671, after the word "such," insert "tin-plate;" in line 673, after the word "the," insert "tin-plate or the;" and in line 675, after the word "or," insert "of," and after the word "which" insert "they."

Mr. ALLISON. That is made necessary, I will say to the Senate, by the adoption of the tin-plate amendment.

Mr. VANCE. I would like to hear how the paragraph will read when amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the paragraph as it is proposed to be amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

158. All articles not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, wholly or partly manufactured, made from tin-plate, or the sheet, plate, hoop, band, or scroll iron or steel or tin-plate herein provided for, or of which such tin-plate sheet, plate, hoop, band, or scroll iron or steel shall be the material of chief value, shall not pay a lower rate of duty than that imposed on the tin-plate or the sheet, plate, hoop, band, or scroll iron or steel from which they are made or of which they shall be the material of chief value.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to add as a new paragraph, after paragraph 434, what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed new paragraph will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Print-rollers suitable for use in printing wall-paper or floor-cloths, $10 per roller of 2½ feet.

Mr. ALLISON. That amendment may be considered as pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be passed over.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say a word after the remarks of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] respecting Mr. Mulhall's pamphlet as to the decline in prices, as I had not the opportunity of looking at the pamphlet until I got it in the Reporter's room. Before we adjourn I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to one or two things in this pamphlet that he may have overlooked. The particular thing to which I would call his attention is that certain articles known as agricultural products have largely increased in price during this time—which he inadvertently omitted to state.

Mr. VEST. I only read the concluding portion of the paragraph.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Mulhall says:

The same quantities of products and merchandise consumed annually from 1881 to 1884 would have cost in previous periods—

That is, the period from 1841 to 1850—

at the prices then ruling, as follows.

Then Mr. Mulhall's figures show that the price between 1841 and 1850 on meats amounted to £560,000,000 sterling, and that the same quantity if bought between 1881 and 1884 would have cost £830,000,000 sterling, showing a very large advance in meat products during those thirty-five or forty years.

The same is true of dairy products, which were £236,000,000 sterling between 1840 and 1850 and £340,000,000 sterling between 1881 and 1884, showing a large increase in the value of dairy products. The same is also true of potatoes, the periods comparing as follows: £115,000,000 sterling from 1841 to 1850 and £181,000,000 sterling from 1881 to 1884. Raw cotton for the period 1841 to 1850 was £76,000,000 sterling, while for the period from 1881 to 1884 it was £87,000,000 sterling.

Mr. STEWART. How is it as to the period from 1871 to 1875?

Mr. ALLISON. I have not that table here. So raw cotton has advanced largely between 1850 and 1884.

Take another article—tobacco. The price has increased from 1850 to the period of 1881–'84 as 29 to 37.

Now, take manufactured products, as in this bill. I find hardware, a very large article of consumption, showing a consumption in 1850 of £576,000,000 sterling, while the same articles in the period from 1881 to 1884 cost £384,000,000 sterling, showing a large reduction in the price of those articles. The same is true of cotton and woolen goods. So while this is true of manufactured products, the reverse is true of the great agricultural products that are consumed in our country and in every other civilized country.

I wanted to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that according to this estimate of prices on these twenty great articles of production, these great articles of agricultural production have largely advanced, instead of declined, during this period. So whatever may be said of the oppression of our agricultural class during this period, it is true that those articles they produced have largely advanced. I wished that statement to accompany the statement of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. VEST. I had not overlooked that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. ALLISON. I yield.

Mr. VEST. I thought the Senator from Iowa had concluded his remarks. I had not overlooked those statements, and I am obliged to the Senator from Iowa for calling my attention to them.

We are always met, in a discussion of the tariff question, with the statement that the tariff has reduced the prices. Now, what Mr. Mulhall says strengthens our position, which is, that the improvements in machinery, in mechanical skill, and in experience have reduced the prices of commodities manufactured, but as to the vegetable products, as to meat and wheat and cotton and corn, as a matter of course, improvements in machinery do not affect them, and the increase of population and the increased demand have put up the prices, whereas the immense advantages which the improvements in machinery have given to the manufacturer have brought down the prices of manufactured goods; and that is the solution of this whole question. It is not the tariff that brings down the prices of commodities.

Mr. ALLISON. No one has ever disputed the fact that new inventions, such as the Bessemer process in steel and other similar processes, have reduced the price of iron. Nobody has ever denied that machinery has tended to reduce the prices of articles. I have never heard anybody say that those improvements in manufacture have not had a tendency to reduce the prices of manufactured articles. But what I want to call attention to is the fact that the agricultural interests of this country have not been depressed by means of this tariff system of which the Senator speaks.

Mr. ALDRICH. In paragraph 473, line 1905, I should like——

Mr. GEORGE. Before going on to that I would like to make one remark.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to offer a formal amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. ALDRICH. I would like to finish my offer.

Mr. GEORGE. I would simply like to correct a statement of the Senator from Iowa as to cotton.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to offer this amendment?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. In paragraph 473, on page 163, line 1905, it is proposed to add:

And bird-skins prepared for preservation, but not further advanced in manufacture.

Mr. GEORGE. On what page is that?

Mr. ALDRICH. On page 163. It is paragraph 473. The amendment is to add to that paragraph:

And bird-skins prepared for preservation, but not further advanced in manufacture.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have another amendment relating to the leather paragraph, which I will offer and let it be considered as pending.

Mr. VEST. Let it be printed. I will ask that these amendments be all printed.

Mr. ALDRICH. They have all been adopted except this one.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Iowa offered one that was to go over.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, yes.

Mr. VEST. Let this be printed and go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to have the attention of the Senator from Iowa if I can secure it. I do not know that I understood exactly what the Senator said with reference to the price of cotton between 1840 and 1850. Will the Senator kindly repeat that?

Mr. ALLISON. I stated that there had been an advance in the price of cotton comparing the period 1841–'50 with the period 1881–'84, and the relative amount of that advance I stated. I have not the book now before me, but I think it is about 15 per cent.

Mr. STEWART. I would like to inquire of the Senator from Iowa or anybody else——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi has the floor. Does that Senator yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir; I do not. I want to dispose of this cotton matter. Then I will yield.

Mr. ALLISON. According to this statement quoted by the Senator from Missouri, $76,000,000 would have purchased as much raw cotton in the period from 1841 to 1850 as $87,000,000 would have purchased in the period from 1881 to 1884, showing a relative advance in the proportion that $76,000,000 bears to $87,000,000.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, that statement, if true, is misleading. In 1840, 1841, 1842 (especially 1842), 1843, and 1844, from causes well known to every person acquainted with the financial history of the country, there was very great depression, especially in the Southern States, with reference to all agricultural products, and especially with reference to cotton. I remember, sir, that in 1844 I sold some cotton in New Orleans at 4 cents per pound, so that in making the aggregate of which the Senator speaks, the years 1841, 1842, 1843, 1844, and 1845, as I understand, are embraced within the period, which therefore renders the relative price for the years 1846, 1847, 1848, 1849, and 1850 very much lower.

Mr. STEWART. Now will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. Just one moment. I undertake to say that the price of cotton was very much depressed—very largely lower than it has ever been since—during the first four or five years of the decade from 1840 to 1850. After the passage of the tariff act of 1846 there was a very rapid and very large increase in the price of cotton, so that in the year 1850 the planting and raising of cotton was very remunerative. I undertake to say that the average price of cotton for the years succeeding the going into effect of the tariff act of 1846, up to and including the year 1850, exceeded the average price of cotton at the present time, including the last five years preceding this. I understand from the Senator from North Carolina, who has made some averages on this subject, that the average price of cotton from some period between 1840, 1846, and 1850, leaving out the lower years 1841, 1842, 1843, and 1844, was 9.8 cents per pound.

Mr. CHACE. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir; I do not, because I shall get through directly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. GEORGE. The average price now in New Orleans of middling cotton for this season is less that 9½ cents.

Mr. STEWART. I think there is an entire misapprehension here as to what affects prices. From 1810 to 1850 there was a money famine. The total product of gold and silver reached an annual average of about $40,000,000. From 1850 to 1875 we had a good supply of money and prices rose. Can any man show me any article of farm produce or anything else that has increased in value—unless there was some local cause for it—between 1875 and the present time?

This question of the rise and fall of prices was very extensively considered, and a very large number of witnesses were examined upon it before the royal commission, and there was a unanimous concurrence on all hands that the principal reason for the fall of prices during the last fourteen years, particularly in farming products, was the demonetization of silver. Some of them thought that it was a good thing because they wanted cheap food in England, and they wanted to be relieved of being tributaries to America, but they all concurred that the principal element in the fall of prices from 1875 until now was the demonetization of silver.

As to the dairy product, there is an obvious reason why it should rise in value, because your prairies, where cattle could run wild, have been exhausted, and there are local reasons for some variation in particular articles. But the general decline of prices has always occurred when there was a money famine. Up to the period of the demonetization of silver we had for some years been having an average of nearly $200,000,000 per annum. Since then we have had only about $100,000,000, because we abandoned one of the precious metals. That fact is having its effect, and there never will be any increase in prices until we have more money.

Mr. BLAIR. A question was raised here yesterday with reference to the relative cost of living in this country and in England, and another question, which was still further discussed this forenoon by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], as to the effect of the protective tariff on wages in this country. I find in my mail to-day the Daily Press, of Manchester, in my own State, in which there is the verdict and finding of a gentleman who was sent to this country by an association of British laborers to investigate these two points and report for their benefit. I send to the Secretary that he may read it the finding of this gentleman who was intrusted with this important mission by British laborers, in order to settle to their satisfaction these two all-important points. I ask the Secretary to read the article that I send up.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[Daily Press, Manchester, N. H.]

PETTIFER'S CONCLUSIONS.

H. J. Pettifer, the Englishman who came over last year to investigate the relative cost of living in this country and in Great Britain for workingmen, with a view to making an unprejudiced statement of the facts to an association of British laboring men, has run counter to Sir Lyon Playfair, who made a similar investigation through the medium of first-class hotels and restaurants. In a recent issue of the London journal called Fair Trade Mr. Pettifer says this:

"I also have lately returned from America, and while there have had exceptional opportunities of studying this question, having addressed thirty large meetings, every one in a prominent manufacturing town, scattered over six different States. In each town I either visited the mills or factories personally, or else received deputations of workingmen engaged in the different industries, with a view of obtaining all the information possible upon the question of protection and its effect upon the wage-earning class. I was also allowed in I think every case, when visiting a mill or factory, to inspect the time-sheet and wages-book; and not only this, but both this year and last (for this is my fourth visit to America) I got all the information I could as to the price of food, clothing, rent, etc., and the conclusions I have come to are directly opposed to those of Sir Lyon Playfair. His opinion is that as far as America is concerned protection is a gigantic failure when it claims to be the source of high wages.

"My opinion is that as far as America is concerned protection is a gigantic success when it claims to be the source of high wages.

"But now comes the most vital part of the whole question. Can a man live, as far as food is concerned, any cheaper in Great Britain than he can in the United States? I assert that he can not; that is to say, if he has to live up to the same standard. The very fact that a great proportion of the bread and beef, pork, bacon, cheese, etc., that we consume in this country comes from America clearly proves that it must fetch at least as high a price here as it does in America. Poor, foolish fellow as Sir Lyon evidently thinks the Yankee is in the matter of protection, we must surely give him credit for selling where he can get the best price, and if flour, meat, bacon, cheese, etc., fetched a higher price in America than they do here he would never send them at all, and if he gets as high a price or a bit higher (to pay for carriage) in this country than he does at home, how can we buy these articles any cheaper here than we can buy them in America."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, each with an amendment in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (S. 332) granting a pension to Harrison Wagner; and

A bill (S. 3116) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Wynne.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3112) granting an increase of pension to William H. Marston.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5870) to amend the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, for the protection of girls, and for the punishment of the crime of rape.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 185) to provide for the admission of the State of South Dakota into the Union, and for the organization of the Territory of North Dakota, with amendments in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ADMISSION OF DAKOTA.

Mr. PLATT. I should like the bill for the admission of the Territories to be laid before the Senate at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 185) to provide for the admission of the State of South Dakota into the Union, and for the organization of the Territory of North Dakota.

Mr. PLATT. I move that the bill, with the amendments, be referred to the Committee on Territories and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. DOLPH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SAWYER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PUNISHMENT OF RAPE.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask leave to present a conference report in reference to a bill the conference report on which has been adopted by the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received.

The Chief Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5870) to amend the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, for the protection of girls and for the punishment of the crime of rape, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with amendments as follows:

Strike out, before the word "District," in line 4, the words "any Territory" and insert the word "the;" in line 5, after the word "place," insert "except the Territories;" in line 8, after the word "State," insert the words "or Territory;" in line 11, before the word "years," strike out "five" and insert "fifteen;" in the same line, after the word "and," strike out the words "for the second or other" and insert "each subsequent," and in line 13, before the word "years," strike out "ten" and insert "thirty;" so as to read:

"That every person who shall carnally and unlawfully know any female under the age of sixteen years, or who shall be accessory to such carnal and unlawful knowledge before the fact in the District of Columbia, or other place except the Territories, over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction, or on any vessel within the admiralty or maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and out of the jurisdiction of any State or Territory, shall be guilty of a felony, and when convicted thereof shall be punished by imprisonment at hard labor for the first offense for not more than fifteen years, and for each subsequent offense, for not more than thirty years."

And the Senate agree to the same.

The committee further recommend that the title of the bill be amended so as to read:

"A bill to punish, as a felony, the carnal and unlawful knowing of any female under the age of sixteen years."

CHAS. J. FAULKNER,
JNO. C. SPOONER,
C. B. FARWELL,
Conferees on the part of the Senate.

JNO. J. HEMPHILL,
BARNES COMPTON,
WILLIAM W. GROUT,
Conferees on the part of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CALL. I think that had better lie upon the table. That is a criminal law and one imposing severe penalities.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator object to the present consideration of the report?

Mr. CALL. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rules require that that question must be determined immediately and without debate. It can be waived by unanimous consent. Is there objection to the report lying upon the table and being printed? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not know the object and purpose of the objection the Senator makes. So far as the objection that he suggests is concerned, it is certainly better than the original bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CALL. I think it ought to be examined; that is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will lie on the table and be printed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 19, 1889.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

VETO MESSAGES.

The following veto messages were severally laid before the House, read, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions and ordered to be printed.

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 9173, entitled "An act granting a pension to Mary J. Drake."

It is proposed by this bill to pension the beneficiary therein named as the widow of Newton E. Drake, who served as a soldier from August 1, 1863, to January 18, 1865.

The records do not show that he suffered from any disability during his term of service.

He filed an application for pension September 23, 1879, claiming that he contracted rheumatism about October, 1864.

He died June 7, 1881, and there does not appear to have been any evidence produced as to the cause of his death or establishing, except by the allegations of his own application, that he contracted any disease or disability in the service.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 18, 1889.

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 9252, entitled "An act granting a pension to Mrs. Catherine Barberick, of Watertown."

The beneficiary named in this bill is the mother of William Barberick, who enlisted February 19, 1862, and died of small-pox August 2, 1864, at his home while on veteran furlough.

It is not claimed that the soldier contracted the fatal disease while in the Army. On the contrary, the testimony taken upon his mother's application for pension to the Pension Bureau shows that he was taken sick after his arrival at his home on furlough, and that several of his family had died of the contagious disease to which he fell a victim before he was taken sick with it.

In these circumstances, unless there is to be a complete departure from the principle that pensions are to be granted for death or disability in some way related to the military service, this bill should not become a law.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 18, 1889.

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 9296, entitled "An act granting a pension to Bridget Carroll."

This bill proposes to pension the beneficiary therein named as the dependent mother of Patrick Carroll, who was enrolled as a sergeant in the regular Army in 1881, this being, as it is stated, his second term of enlistment.

In September, 1886, being absent from his command at Fort Warren, Massachusetts, he was drowned while sailing in a small boat with two companions.

The beneficiary is aged and in need of assistance, but there is no pretense that the soldier's death was in the least degree related to his military service.

I am sure no one could fail to be gratified by an opportunity to join in according aid to this dependent old mother of a faithful soldier, but I can not believe that such a departure as is proposed should be made from the just principles upon which pension legislation ought to be predicated.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 18, 1889.

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 9175, entitled "An act granting a pension to George Wallen."

The beneficiary named in this bill filed an application for pension in June, 1873, alleging as his disability a fracture of his right arm.

In a subsequent affidavit filed in 1883 he alleged deafness, which appears to be the disability upon which the special act proposed for his relief is based.

The records establish that he enlisted July 27, 1861; that he deserted April 25, 1862, and returned February 20, 1863, after an absence of about ten months, and that he deserted again April 30, 1864. I am informed that his record shows two enlistments, and desertion during each. He was discharged December 31, 1864.

An application to remove the charge of desertion against him was denied.

Without specially discussing the question of disability chargeable to military service, it seems to me that a soldier with such a record should not be pensioned.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 18, 1889.
